

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

J
301
H21

HANSARD'S
PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

THIRD SERIES:

COMMENCING WITH THE ACCESSION OF

WILLIAM IV.

51 VICTORIÆ, 1888.

VOL. CCCXXVI.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM

THE ELEVENTH DAY OF MAY, 1888,

TO

THE TWELFTH DAY OF JUNE, 1888.

Fifth Volume of the Session.

LONDON:

PUBLISHED BY CORNELIUS BUCK & SON, AT THE OFFICE FOR "HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES," 22, PATERNOSTER ROW. [E.C.]

1888.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Page

COMMONS, FRIDAY, MAY 11.

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION—

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, owing to the continuance of his indisposition:—

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

MOTIONS.

Local Government Provisional Orders (Highways) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie); presented, and read the first time [Bill 258]	27
Local Government Provisional Order (Port) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie); presented, and read the first time [Bill 259]	28

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

City of London (Fire Inquests) Bill—
Order for Third Reading read	28
Bill read the third time, and passed.

QUESTIONS.

ARMY (INDIA)—“COLONELS’ ALLOWANCES”—Question, Mr. King; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) ..	28
NAVAL COURTS MARTIAL—NAVAL MEDICAL OFFICERS—Question, Dr. Tanner; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	29
CHARITY COMMISSIONERS—MILTON ABBAS SCHOOLS—Question, Mr. Kelly; Answer, Mr. J. W. Lowther	30
WAR OFFICE (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)—THE SMALL ARMS FACTORY AT SPARKBROOK—Question, Mr. Kenrick; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	31
DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICES—CONSULAR OFFICIAL AT MASSOWAH—Question, Mr. King; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	31
EXCISE DUTIES (LOCAL PURPOSES) BILL—THE CART AND WHEEL DUTIES—FARMERS’ LOCOMOTIVES—MARKET GARDENERS—Questions, Major Rasch, The Marquess of Carmarthen; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)	32
PRISONS (SCOTLAND)—PRISON SURGEONS—Questions, Dr. Clark; Answers, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	33
EGYPT—THE SUEZ CANAL—REGISTER AND TONNAGE OF STEAM VESSELS—Question, Captain Colomb; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Baron Henry de Worms)	34
IRISH LAND COMMISSION—JUDICIAL RENTS—ACREAGE—Question, Mr. J. E. Ellis; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Madden) ..	34

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 11.]

Page

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL RESOLUTIONS—DUTY ON FOREIGN WINES—Question, Dr. Tanner; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) ..	35
IRISH LAND COMMISSION—SUB-COMMISSION COURT AT DOWNPATRICK—Question, Mr. Macartney; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	35
LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)—BOW STREET AND MARLBOROUGH STREET POLICE COURTS—Question, Mr. Lawson; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) ..	35
CUSTOMS—IMPORTATION OF UNWHOLESOME TEA—COFFEIN—Question, Mr. Bartley; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) ..	36
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—ALLEGED INSURANCE FRAUDS AT BELFAST—Question, Mr. Carew; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Madden) ..	36
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—DISTRICT COUNCILS—CREMATION—Question, Mr. J. E. Ellis; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) ..	37
MERCHANT SHIPPING—THE MAIL STEAMER "ARIZONA"—DUNMANUS BAY—Questions, Dr. Tanner; Answers, The President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) ..	37
PORTUGAL—BOMBARDMENT OF MINENGANI—COMPENSATION—Questions, Mr. Buchanan; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) ..	38
EUROPEAN TURKEY—REPORTED INSURRECTIONARY DISTURBANCES IN MACEDONIA—Question, Mr. Bryce; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) ..	38
ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—CAMP ALLOWANCE TO VOLUNTEERS—Question, Mr. Howard Vincent; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	38
CUSTOMS HOUSE OFFICERS—HOURS OF ATTENDANCE—Question, Mr. Forrest Fulton; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) ..	39
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—ASSAULT ON POLICE SERGEANT O'SHEA, AT MACROOM—Questions, Dr. Tanner, Mr. Flynn; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	39
CHARITY COMMISSIONERS—UNITED WESTMINSTER SCHOOLS CHARITY—SALE OF LANDS—Question, Mr. Bartley; Answer, Mr. J. W. Lowther ..	41
ADMIRALTY—"A DANGER IN THE PACIFIC"—Question, Mr. Seton-Karr; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) ..	41
IMPERIAL DEFENCE—THE ISLAND OF ASCENSION—Question, Mr. Conybeare; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) ..	42
PRIVATE BUSINESS—COMMITTEE ON THE "HYDERABAD DECCAN COMPANY"—Question, Sir Roper Lethbridge; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) ..	43
WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL RESOLUTIONS—THE WHEEL TAX—MARKET GARDENERS—Question, Mr. Smith Barry; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) ..	43
WAR OFFICE—COMMITTEE ON EXPLOSIVES—Question, Captain Colomh; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	43
CROFTERS—COLONIZATION—Questions, Mr. A. Sutherland, Dr. Clark; Answers, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) ..	44
CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF RICHARD WALFORD AND HENRY HARDWICK—DOUBTFUL CONVICTIONS—Question, Mr. Bernard Coleridge; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	44
METROPOLITAN POLICE—DISTURBANCE IN TRAPALGAR SQUARE—Questions, Mr. Cunninghame Graham, Mr. Conybeare; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	43

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 11.]	Page
HOUSE OF COMMONS — ADMISSION OF STRANGERS — Question, Mr. Marjoribanks; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	48
IRELAND—RUMOURED ESTABLISHMENT OF A CATHOLIC COLLEGE—Question, Mr. Waddy; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	49
BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—Questions, Mr. John Morley, Mr. H. Gardner, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	49

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed,
 “That Mr. Deputy Speaker do now leave the Chair :”—

NEW MEMBER TAKING HIS SEAT—RESOLUTION—

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “on a new Member presenting himself with his introducers below the Bar, at the time and under the conditions specified in the Standing Order 86, Mr. Speaker, unless the House otherwise resolve, shall forthwith call such Member to the Table for the purpose of taking his seat,”—(Mr. Bradlaugh),—instead thereof .. 52

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :”—After short debate, Question put :—The House divided; Ayes 147, Noes 152; Majority 5.—(Div. List, No. 103.)

Question proposed,

“That the words ‘on a new Member presenting himself with his introducers below the Bar, at the time and under the conditions specified in the Standing Order 86, Mr. Speaker, unless the House otherwise resolve, shall forthwith call such Member to the Table for the purpose of taking his seat,’ be there added.”

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out the words “unless the House otherwise resolve.”—(Sir Henry James.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment :”—After short debate, Question put, and negatived.

Question proposed,

“That the words ‘on a new Member presenting himself with his introducers below the Bar, at the time and under the conditions specified in the Standing Order 86, Mr. Speaker shall forthwith call such Member to the Table for the purpose of taking his seat,’ be there added.”

After short debate, Question put :—The House divided; Ayes 152, Noes 180; Majority 28.

Division List, Ayes and Noes 69

Amendment proposed, after the word “That,” in the Original Question, to add the words, “this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply,”—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

Amendment agreed to :—Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Deputy Speaker do now leave the Chair :”—

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 11.]

Page

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA IN CATTLE—RESOLUTION—

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "no Committee of Inquiry into Pleuro-pneumonia in Cattle will be satisfactory which is not specially empowered to conduct practical experiments, with the view of ascertaining the value of inoculation, and the characteristics of the disease,"—
(Mr. Hozier) 71

Question proposed, "That those words be there added :"—After debate, [House counted out] [7.40.]

LORDS, MONDAY, MAY 14.

THE NATIONAL DEFENCES—Personal Explanation, Viscount Wolseley :—
Short Debate thereon 91

PUBLIC HEALTH—SUPPRESSION OF RABIES IN DOGS—Question, Observations, The Earl of Carnarvon, Lord Mount Temple; Reply, The Lord President of the Council (Viscount Cranbrook); Observations, The Earl of Feversham 110

METROPOLIS—NEW BUILDINGS—Question, Observations, Lord Lamington; Reply, Lord Henniker :—Short Debate thereon 112

Tithe Rentcharge Recovery and Variation Bill (No. 99)—
Amendments reported (according to Order) 117
Further Amendments made; and Bill to be read 3^d To-morrow.

Local Government (England and Wales) Electors Bill—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d,"—(The Lord Balfour) .. 118
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow; and Standing Order No. XXXV. to be considered in order to its being dispensed with.

Pharmacy Act (Ireland), 1875, Amendment Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Earl of Milltown); read 1st (No. 112) 120
[7.45.]

COMMONS, MONDAY, MAY 14.

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION—

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, owing to the continuance of his indisposition :—

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

—o—

Cork and Brandon Railway Bill—

Order for Consideration, as amended, read 121
Bill, as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 14.]

Page

Ulster Canal and Tyrons Navigation Bill [Lords]—

Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Sir James Corry)	122
Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Biggar :)—After short debate, Question put :—The House divided ; Ayes 101, Noes 158; Majority 57.—(Div. List, No. 105.)
Original Question again proposed	133
After short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed .

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887 (CONVICTION OF MR. CONDON)—Letter received by Mr. Deputy Speaker ..	139
CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887 (CONVICTION OF MR. DILLON)—Letter received by Mr. Deputy Speaker ..	139

QUESTIONS.

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—DILL MILL FARM CROFTERS—APPEAL—Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald)	140
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—SCHEDULE 4—MUNICIPAL BOROUGH (TRANSFER OF POWERS, &c.)—Question, Mr. Henry H. Fowler; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	141
IRISH LAND COMMISSION—SUB-COMMISSIONERS' AND CIVIL BILL COURTS—FAIR RENT—Question, Mr. Flynn; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Madden)	141
NEWTOWNLAND SALMON FISHERIES—FRENCH ENCROACHMENTS—Question, Mr. Samuelson; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	142
EDUCATION (IRELAND)—CATHOLIC SCHOOL AT ANNALITTON, CO. MONAGHAN—Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	143
SOUTH AFRICA—SOUTH AFRICAN (TRANSVAAL) REPUBLIC AND THE NEW REPUBLIC—TREATY OF UNION—Question, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	144
SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL GOVERNMENT—RAILWAY CONCESSION—Question, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	144
GREAT BRITAIN AND THE COLONIES—TREATY OBLIGATIONS—Question, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	145
TRADE AND COMMERCE—INVOICES ON SHIPMENTS FROM GERMANY TO THE UNITED STATES—CONSULAR FEES—Questions, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	145
LOTTERIES—PRIZE DRAWING FOR FUND OF CATHEDRAL OF SAINT MACARTAN, MONAGHAN—Questions, Colonel Waring, Mr. M'Cartan; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	145
IRISH LAND COMMISSION—INCREASE OF EXPENSES—Question, Colonel Waring; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	146
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—IMPROPER CONVICTION AT LOUGHREA COURT-HOUSE—COLONEL TYNTE, R.M.—Questions, Mr. J. E. Ellis, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour); Question, Sir John Swinburne [No reply]	146

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 14.]

Page

GAME ACTS—SALE OF RUSSIAN PARTRIDGES AND HARES— Question, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	147
CHARITY COMMISSIONERS—CHRIST'S HOSPITAL SCHEME— Question, Mr. Mundella; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke)	148
IRISH INDUSTRIES—LECTURES IN LACEMAKING— Question, Mr. R. Power; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	149
LUNATIC ASYLUMS—DARENTH ASYLUM— Question, Mr. Firth; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	149
LAND COMMISSION OFFICE, DUBLIN—PAYMENT OF FEES IN STAMPS— Question, Mr. M'Cartan; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	150
RIOTS, &c. (IRELAND)—CAPTAIN L. S. PAYNE AT FERMOY—REMOVAL OF BANNERS, &c.— Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, Sir Herbert Maxwell (A Lord of the Treasury)	150
WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL RESOLUTIONS—THE HORSE TAX—INCUMBENTS OF PARISHES— Question, Sir John Mowbray; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)	152
INLAND REVENUE—MEDICINE STAMPS TAX—LEGISLATION— Question, Dr. Farquharson; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)	152
WALES—RATES ON TITHE RENTCHARGE—THE VICAR OF LLANFIHANGEL, DENBIGHSHIRE— Question, Mr. T. E. Ellis; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	152
BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND)—ADVANCES TO THE MACGILLYCUDDY OF THE REEKES— Question, Mr. Kilbride; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	153
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES)—INSTRUCTION IN THRIFT— Question, Sir Joseph Bailey; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke)	153
VACCINATION ACT, 1871—HALESOWEN PETTY SESSIONS— Question, Mr. Channing; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	154
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—CLAUSE 3—TOWN COUNCILS— Question, Mr. Hulse; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	155
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—JOHN S. DEANS, OF THE ENNIS POLICE FORCE— Questions, Mr. Conybeare; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	156
PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT (INDIA)—OFFICIALS IN SERVICE OF PRIVATE COMPANIES— Question, Mr. Mallock; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	156
IRISH LAND COMMISSION—SITTINGS AT CARRIGALLAN— Question, Mr. Hayden; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	156
INLAND REVENUE—EXCISE—BREWERS' HOUSES— Question, Mr. Handel Cossham; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley)	156
THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL (INDIA)—THE CALCUTTA MUNICIPALITY BILL— Question, Mr. Arthur Williams; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	157
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT—OFFICERS, &c.— Question, Mr. Firth; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	158
POST OFFICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE—PROMOTIONS— Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	158

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 14.]	Page
THE TRUCK ACT—BRISTOL—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	159
DISPENSARIES (IRELAND)—LOCAL DISPENSARIES COMMITTEE, CLONES UNION — JOSEPH GRAYDON — Questions, Mr. H. Campbell, Mr. Edward Harrington, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	160
WAR OFFICE—"FORTRESS AND RAILWAY ENGINEER CORPS" FOR EDINBURGH AND LEITH—Question, Mr. Buchanan; Answer, Sir Herbert Maxwell (A Lord of the Treasury)	161
TURKEY (ASIATIC PROVINCES)—ARMENIA—PERSECUTION OF THE CHRISTIANS —Question, Mr. Mundella; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	162
ISLANDS OF THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC — SAMOA — Question, Mr. W. A. M'Arthur; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	163
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES)—SECONDARY SCHOOLS — REGISTRATION OF TEACHERS—Question, Sir Richard Temple; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) ..	164
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY — PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT — Question, Mr. Harris; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	165
PRISONS (ENGLAND AND WALES)—CHELMSFORD GAOL—Question, Major Rasch; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	165
WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL RESOLUTIONS—HAWKERS' LICENCES — Question, Mr. Jacoby; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)	166
INLAND REVENUE—EXCISE—LICENCES TO BREWERS' HOUSES—Questions, Mr. Caleb Wright, Mr. T. W. Russell; Answers, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	166
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—THE SUNDAY CLOSING ACT—MR. A. E. FLEURY AT LISBURN—Question, Mr. P. M'Donald; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	167
POST OFFICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—RECEIVING HOUSE FOR PICCADILLY— Question, Mr. W. Beckett; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	168
IRISH LAND COMMISSION—COMPENSATION FOR IMPROVEMENTS—Question, Mr. Maurice Healy; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Madden)	168
RIOTS, &c. (IRELAND)—THE MITCHELSTOWN INQUEST — Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour); Question, Mr. Conybeare [No reply]	169
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—ALLEGED INSURANCE FRAUDS AT BELFAST— Question, Mr. Tuite; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Madden)	170
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) ELECTORS BILL — RATING OF OCCUPIERS—Question, Mr. Handel Cosham; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster)	171
THE SWEATING SYSTEM—THE LORDS' COMMITTEE—Question, Mr. Kenrick; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	171
METROPOLITAN POLICE—ALLEGED BLACKMAILING—Question, Mr. Darling; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith); Observations, Mr. Firth	171
THE EARL OF CARNARVON AND MR. PARNELL—PRIVATE CORRESPONDENCE— Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	174

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 14.]	Page
WAR OFFICE—MANUFACTURE OF GUNS—Question, Mr. Hoyle; Answer, Sir Herbert Maxwell (A Lord of the Treasury) ..	175
NEW MEMBER TAKING HIS SEAT—MR. BRADLAUGH'S MOTION ON FRIDAY—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	175
BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—Observations, Question, Mr. John Morley; Reply, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) ..	176

P R I V I L E G E.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE—RESOLUTION—

Moved , "That the letter of Mr. Thomas Hamilton, Resident Magistrate, dated the 12th May, addressed to Mr. Speaker, is a Breach of the Privilege of this House, as containing an untruthful statement regarding the arrest and conviction of a Member of this House,"—(Mr. T. M. Healy)	176
After debate, Question put :—The House divided ; Ayes 189, Noes 250; Majority 61.—(Div. List, No. 106.)

Q U E S T I O N S.

EAST INDIA (CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS)—CAMP FOLLOWERS—Question, Mr. Stansfeld; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	207
SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS—Question, Dr. Clark; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	207

O R D E R S O F T H E D A Y.

Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland Bill [Bill 201]—

Bill considered in Committee	208
After some time spent therein, it being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to report Progress :—Committee to sit again To-morrow .

IMPERIAL DEFENCE [EXPENSES]—

Order for Committee read	264
Committee deferred till To-morrow .

Employers' Liability for Injuries to Workmen Bill [Bill 145]

Order for Second Reading read	264
Second Reading deferred till Thursday .

National Debt (Supplemental) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Jackson); presented, and read the first time [Bill 264] ..

265
[12.15.]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Page

LORDS, TUESDAY, MAY 15.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES—

Moved, "That the Earl of Selborne do take the Chair in all Committees upon Private Bills this day, in the absence of the Duke of Buckingham and Chandos from illness, unless where it shall have been otherwise directed by this House,"—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Motion agreed to.

Moved, "That the Lord Knutsford be appointed to take the Chair in the Committees of the Whole House, in the absence of the Duke of Buckingham and Chandos from illness,"—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE AND PROVISIONAL ORDER CONFIRMATION BILLS—

Ordered, That Standing Orders Nos. 92 and 93 be suspended; and that the time for depositing petitions praying to be heard against Private and Provisional Order Confirmation Bills, which would otherwise expire during the adjournment of the House at Whitsuntide, be extended to the first day on which the House shall sit after the recess.

EAST INDIA (CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS)—Question, The Marquess of Ripon; Answer, The Secretary of State for India (Viscount Cross) .. 266

Local Government (England and Wales) Electors Bill—

House in Committee (according to Order) 267

Bill reported, without Amendment.

Moved, "That Standing Order No. XXXV. be considered (according to order) and dispensed with,"—(The Lord Balfour :)—After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 3^a, and passed.

Lloyd's Signal Stations Bill (No. 84)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Earl of Onslow) .. 277

Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2^a accordingly.

Factory and Workshops Act (1878) Amendment (Scotland) Bill (No. 76)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Earl of Aberdeen) .. 277

After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2^a accordingly.

Local Bankruptcy (Ireland) Bill (No. 93)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Lord Ashbourne) .. 279

Moved, "That the further Debate be adjourned,"—(The Lord Fitzgerald :)—After short debate, on Question? Resolved in the negative; Then the original Motion was agreed to; and Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday the 8th of June next.

Glebe Lands Bill (No. 100)—

House in Committee (according to Order) 285

Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Monday the 4th of June next; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 119.)

Coroners Bill (No. 36)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Lord Chancellor) .. 287

After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2^a accordingly.

SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS—Observation, The Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (The Marquess of Salisbury) 290

[8.0.]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Page

COMMONS, TUESDAY, MAY 15.

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION—

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, owing to the continuance of his indisposition :—

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Ulster Canal and Tyrone Navigation Bill [Lords].—

Moved, “That the Order [14th May] for Committee be read and discharged, and that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee,”—(Mr. T. M. Healy) 291

After short debate, Question put, and agreed to:—Ordered, That the Committee do consist of Seven Members.

Ordered, That Four Members of the Committee be nominated by the House.

Ordered, That Three Members of the Committee be nominated by the Committee of Selection.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum.

QUESTIONS.

IMPERIAL DEFENCES AT HOME AND ABROAD—Questions, Mr. Gourley; Answers, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) . .	301
IMPERIAL DEFENCES—THE COALING STATIONS—Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) . .	302
WAR OFFICE—ROYAL COMMISSION ON WARLIKE STORES—Question, Major Rasch; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) . .	302
LAND COURT (IRELAND)—FAIR RENTS—MR. J. J. HICKEY, OF CULLIN, MILLSTREET, CO. CORK—Questions, Dr. Tanner; Answers, The Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Madden) . .	303
WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL RESOLUTIONS—BOTTLED WINES—Question, Mr. King; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) . .	304
POST OFFICE (EDINBURGH)—SURVEYOR OF THE MIDLAND DISTRICT—Question, Mr. Wallace; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) . .	305
ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS OF ENGLAND—THE CHARTERS—Question, Dr. Farquharson; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) . .	306
ASIATIC TURKEY—BRITISH HOSPITAL AT SMYRNA—RETURNS—Question, Mr. H. F. Pease; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) . .	307
THE CONSULAR SERVICE—THE HOSPITALS AT CONSTANTINOPLE AND SMYRNA—FEES—Question, Colonel Hill; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) . .	307
THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—BATTERSEA PARK—DISCHARGED WORKMEN—Question, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answer, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) . .	307

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 15.]	Page
POSTMASTER GENERAL—CONVEYANCE OF LETTERS "PER RAIL"—Question, Mr. D. A. Thomas; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	308
IRISH LAND COMMISSION—SUB-COMMISSION COURT AT DOWNPATRICK—Question, Mr. Macartney; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	309
PRISON RULES (IRELAND)—REFUSAL OF "THE NATION" AND "UNITED IRELAND" AT DERRY GAOL—Questions, Mr. O'Hanlon, Mr. Edward Harrington; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour); Question, Mr. Flynn [No reply] ..	309
THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—UNPAID MAGISTRATES AND PETTY SESSIONS—MR. JOHN BYRNE—Question, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour); Questions, Dr. Tanner, Mr. Flynn [No reply] ..	310
POST OFFICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—DETENTION OF PRINTED MATTER BY WARRANT OF THE HOME SECRETARY—Question, Mr. Cunninghame Graham; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	312
CONDITION OF THE WORKING CLASSES (METROPOLIS)—DEATHS FROM STARVATION—PROSTITUTES—Question, Mr. Cunninghame Graham; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	313
THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—HYDE PARK—ACCIDENTS IN ROTTEN ROW—Questions, Baron de Rothschild, Sir Algernon Borthwick; Answers, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) ..	313
COAL MINES, &c. REGULATION ACT, 1887—EXAMINATIONS FOR COMPETENCY—Questions, Mr. Pickard, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	314
THE SWEATING SYSTEM—THE FACTORY ACTS—Question, Mr. Norris; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	315
SAVINGS BANKS—THE SEVENOAKS TRUSTEE SAVINGS BANK—Question, Mr. Howell; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) ..	315
NAVY ESTIMATES—THE NAVAL RESERVE—Questions, Lord Charles Beresford; Answers, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) ..	316
WAR OFFICE—FERMOY BARRACKS—SANITARY CONDITION—Question, Mr. Flynn; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	317
POST OFFICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—CLOSED POSTAL CARDS—Question, Mr. Labouchere; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	317
THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—BUSHEY, HAMPTON COURT, AND RICHMOND PARKS—Question, Mr. Labouchere; Answer, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) ..	317
LICENSING LAWS—LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—LICENSING CLAUSES—Question, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) ..	318
POST OFFICE (CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE)—PAY OF CLERKS—Question, Mr. Fenwick; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	318
LAND COMMISSION COURT—FAIR RENTS—JUDGMENT OF COUNTY COURT JUDGE CURRAN—Question, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	319
WAR OFFICE—STORAGE OF POWDER IN BARGES AT WOOLWICH—Question, Colonel Hughes; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	320
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—PORTUMNA BOARD OF GUARDIANS—Question, Mr. Harris; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	321
RIOTS, &c. (IRELAND)—CAPTAIN L. S. PAYNE AT FERMOY—REMOVAL OF BANNERS, &c.—Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	321

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 15.]

Page

LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)—PROPOSED MEETING IN TRAFALGAR SQUARE—Questions, Mr. Conybeare; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	322
LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)—INTERFERENCE IN BERMONDSEY—Question, Mr. Cunningham Graham; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	323
NATIONAL DEFENCE BILL—THE FIRST SCHEDULE—ALLOWANCE TO VOLUNTEERS—Question, Colonel Laurie; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	323
INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIVER BANN—LEGISLATION—Question, Sir Charles Lewis; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	324
INDIA—THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY—THE PROPOSED DISMEMBERMENT—Question, Sir Richard Temple; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	324
CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—TRIAL AND SENTENCE ON MR. DILLON, M.P.—Question, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Madden)	325
METROPOLITAN BUILDING ACT—NEW BUILDING AT ALBERT GATE—EXCESSIVE HEIGHT—Questions, Sir Algernon Borthwick, Mr. W. Beckett; Answers, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket)	325
METROPOLIS—OPEN SPACES—VACANT GROUND ADJOINING THE ROYAL COURTS OF JUSTICE—Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answer, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket)	326
PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—ST. STEPHEN'S CHAPEL—Question, Mr. Conybeare; Answer, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket)	326
OFFICIAL TRUSTEE BILL—LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Hobhouse; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster)	327
LAW OF AGISTMENT AND DISTRAINT—Question, Major Rasch; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster)	327
PERPETUAL PENSIONS—ACTION OF THE EXECUTIVE—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	327
BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—WHITSUNTIDE—Questions, Mr. J. E. Ellis, Mr. T. M. Healy, Sir Richard Paget; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	328
LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANIES—RECENT JUDGMENT OF THE LORDS JUSTICES OF APPEAL—Question, Mr. Watt; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	329
SUGAR BOUNTIES—THE INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION—Question, Mr. J. O. Bolton; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) [Further Questions thereon]	329
LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART—ROYAL NORMAL SCHOOL AT KENSINGTON—Question, Sir Henry Roscoe; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	331
WALES—INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION—LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. T. E. Ellis; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	332
CROFTERS' COLONIZATION—Questions, Dr. R. Macdonald, Mr. Hunter, Dr. Clark; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	332
AUSTRALIA—CHINESE IMMIGRANTS—Question, Mr. Henniker Heaton; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Baron Henry de Worms)	333
CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887 (PERSONS PROSECUTED AGAINST, &c.)—RETURN—Question, Mr. John Morley; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	333
AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL—CONSTITUTION—Question, Mr. Munro-Ferguson; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	334

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 15.]

Page

MOTION.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (NOTICES OF MOTION)—RESOLUTION—

Moved, "That the Order of the Day for the Committee on Imperial Defence [Expenses] have precedence this day of the Notices of Motion and other Orders of the Day,"—
(Mr. William Henry Smith) 334

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House is not prepared to surrender this day to the Government, in view of the fact that the Government has already pledged itself to arrange to enable the Member for the West Division of Nottingham to bring on this evening the Motion that stands in his name, and Her Majesty's Ministers yesterday devoted the time at their disposal to a stage of the Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland Salary Bill, which time would otherwise have been at their disposal for the purposes for which they are now asking for the time of private Members,"—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After debate, Moved, "That the Question be now put,"—(Mr. Labouchere):—Question put, and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—The House divided; Ayes 290, Noes 187; Majority 103.

Division List, Ayes and Noes 356

Main Question put, and agreed to.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

IMPERIAL DEFENCES [EXPENSES]—

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Moved, "That it is expedient to ratify an Agreement for Naval Defence made between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of Her Majesty's Australasian Colonies,"—(Mr. W. H. Smith) 359

After debate, Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 85, Noes 37; Majority 48.—(Div. List, No. 111.)

Moved, "That it is expedient to authorise the issue out of the Consolidated Fund of such sums, not exceeding £850,000, as may be required for building, arming, and completing the vessels mentioned in the Agreement,"—(Mr. William Henry Smith) 399

After debate, Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 92, Noes 48; Majority 44.—(Div. List, No. 112.)

Moved, "That the sums so issued shall be repaid to the Consolidated Fund, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament for Naval Services, by an annuity of such amount as will repay the same, with interest at three per cent per annum, within twelve years,"—(Mr. William Henry Smith) 411

After short debate, Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the Treasury to raise such sums by means of terminable annuities charged on the Consolidated Fund.

Moved, "That it is expedient to authorise the issue, out of the Consolidated Fund, of such sums not exceeding £2,600,000 as may be required for the defence of certain Ports and Coaling Stations, and making further provisions for Imperial Defence,"—
(Mr. William Henry Smith) 412

After debate, it being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to report Progress.

Resolutions to be reported upon Thursday; Committee to sit again upon Thursday.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
[May 15.]
INDIA—IMMORAL PRACTICES—Observations, Sir John Kennaway ..	444
<hr style="width: 20%; margin: 10px auto;"/>
COMMITTEE OF SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES) (SPECIAL REPORT)—
Ordered, That the Committee of Selection have leave to make a Special Report	445
Report to lie upon the Table. [12.15.]

LORDS, WEDNESDAY, MAY 16.

Their Lordships met;—and having gone through the Business on the Paper without debate, [House adjourned] [2.15.]

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, MAY 16.

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION—

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, owing to the continuance of his indisposition :—

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—o—

Small Holdings Bill [Bill 9]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Jesse Collings) 447

After long debate, Moved, "That the Question be now put,"—(Sir Walter Foster :)—Question put :—The House divided; Ayes 135, Noes 194; Majority 59.—(Div. List, No. 113.)

Original Question again proposed 514

It being half-an-hour after Five of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned :—Debate to be resumed To-morrow.

M O T I O N S.

—o—

Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 5) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie); presented, and read the first time [Bill 265] 515

Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 6) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie); presented, and read the first time [Bill 266] 515

Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 7) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie); presented, and read the first time [Bill 267] 515

Municipal Boundaries (Dublin) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Murphy, Mr. T. D. Sullivan, Mr. Timothy Harrington, Mr. Chance); presented, and read the first time [Bill 268] 515
[5.35.]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Page

COMMONS, THURSDAY, MAY 17.

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION—

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, owing to the continuance of his indisposition:—

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

—o—

EAST INDIA (HYDERABAD DECCAN MINING COMPANY) (FIRST REPORT)—

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 177.]

Moved, "That the Select Committee on East India (Hyderabad Deccan Mining Company) have leave to hear Counsel (to such extent as they shall think fit) upon the matters referred to them,"—(Sir Henry James) 517

Question put, and agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

—o—

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—IRISH SUNDAY CLOSING ACT—A. E. FLEURY, DISTRICT INSPECTOR OF LISBURN—Questions, Mr. P. M'Donald; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	517
VENEZUELA—INSULTING NEWSPAPER ARTICLES—Question, Mr. Watt; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	518
SCOTLAND—ORDNANCE SURVEY—Questions, Sir George Campbell; Answers, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket)	519
COAL MINES REGULATION ACT, 1887—THE BANK HALL AND OTHER COLLIERIES—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	519
LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—CLERK OF PETTY SESSIONS, BALLYMENA—Question, Mr. Edward Harrington; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	520
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—DEFALCATIONS IN BALLYMENA UNION—Questions, Mr. Edward Harrington; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	521
NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS (IRELAND)—THOMAS SWEENEY—Question, Mr. D. Sullivan; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	522
LAW AND JUSTICE—CONFESSION OF MURDER—THE KIDBROOKE LANE MURDER (1871)—Question, Mr. Boord; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	523
RIOTS AND DISTURBANCES (IRELAND)—TENT SERVICES OF THE IRISH EVANGELIZATION SOCIETY—Question, Mr. Lea; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	524
TORQUAY IMPROVEMENT ACT—STREET PROCESSIONS—Questions, Mr. Henry H. Fowler, Mr. Schwann, Mr. Winterbotham, Mr. Conybeare; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews), The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	524
INLAND REVENUE—LAND COMMISSION OFFICE—STAMP DISTRIBUTOR—Question, Mr D. Sullivan; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	526

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 17.]

Page

WAR OFFICE—POWDER AND AMMUNITION BARGES IN THE RIVER THAMES— Question, Colonel Hughes; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	550
TRADE AND COMMERCE—THE AUSTRIAN TARIFF—DUTY ON BICYCLES, &c.— Question, Mr. Ernest Spencer; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	551
ISLANDS OF THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC—SAMOA—HARBOUR OF PAGO PAGO— Question, Mr. Howard Vincent; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	551
ISLANDS OF THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC—SAMOA—Question, Mr. W. A. M'Arthur; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	552
POOR LAW GUARDIANS—VISITING COMMITTEES—Question, Mr. Atherley- Jones; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	553
VENEZUELA—THE UNITED STATES—Question, Sir George Baden-Powell; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	554
ADMIRALTY—CASE OF G. L. GROVER, LATE MIDSHIPMAN OF H.M.S. "BACCHANTE"—Question, Mr. Whitmore; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	554
METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS—EMPLOYMENT OF COUNSEL—Question, Mr. Labouchere; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	555
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—BOARDS OF GUARDIANS —TRANSFER OF POWERS—Question, Mr. Paulton; Answer, The Presi- dent of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	555
ADMIRALTY—THE DOCKS AT HAULBOWLINE—Questions, Dr. Fox, Dr. Tanner; Answers, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	556
THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—RE-APPOINTMENT OF MR. H. EGAN— TULLAMORE—Questions, Dr. Fox, Mr. T. W. Russell; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	556
MARGARINE ACT, 1887—SEIZURE OF DUTCH MARGARINE—Question, Mr. Maclure; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	557
BARNARD'S INN—SALE OF THE INN—Question, Mr. Brookfield; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster)	558
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—THE LICENSING CLAUSES—LEGAL RIGHT TO RENEWAL—Question, Mr. Summers; An- swer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) [Further Questions thereon]	558
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—THE FISH TRADE— THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL AND THE GREATER MUNICIPAL COUNCILS —Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	561
UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND) BILL—THE COMMISSIONERS—Question, Mr. Bryce; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	562
SCOTLAND—INSPECTION OF MINES—APPOINTMENTS—Question, Mr. J. W. Philipps; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	562
ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE MILITIA (IRELAND)—INSUBORDINATION— Questions, Colonel Waring, Mr. Conybeare; Answers, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	563
AUSTRALIA—CHINESE IMMIGRANTS—Question, Mr. Henniker Heaton; An- swer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	563

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 17.]

Page

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—SERVICE OF MAILS, NEWPORT, CO. TIPPERARY — Question, Mr. J. O'Connor; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	537
IRISH LAND COMMISSION—SUB-COMMISSION AT CARLOW—Question, Mr. J. O'Connor; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	537
THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. J. J. TERRY, J.P.—Questions, Dr. Tanner; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	537
POST OFFICE — PROVINCIAL POSTMASTERSHIPS — Question, Mr. T. W. Russell; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	538
THE CROFTERS—EMIGRATION FROM STORNOWAY—Questions, Mr. A. Sutherland, Mr. Hunter, Mr. Anderson; Answers, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald)	538
AGRICULTURE — THE VOTE FOR DAIRY INVESTIGATION — Question, Mr. Eslemont; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald)	540
EMIGRATION—ASSISTED EMIGRATION FROM SCOTLAND—Question, Mr. Eslemont; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald)	540
LAW AND JUSTICE—SENTENCES OF FLOGGING AT LIVERPOOL ASSIZES—Question, Mr. Pickersgill; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	540
CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS—Question, Mr. Provand; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	541
ADMIRALTY—DEVONPORT DOCKYARD—EMPLOYMENT OF SEAMEN IN PRIVATE DUTIES—Question, Mr. Conybeare; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton); Question, Mr. P. Stanhope [No reply]	541
EAST INDIA (CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS)—REPEAL—Questions, Mr. James Stuart, Mr. Stansfeld; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	542
INDIA—PROTECTION OF YOUNG GIRLS—Question, Mr. James Stuart; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	544
IRISH LAND COMMISSION—SUB-COMMISSIONERS, CO. WICKLOW—FAIR RENTS — Question, Mr. Byrne; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	545
WAR OFFICE—THE INNISKILLING FUSILIERS—Question, Mr. Cunninghamham Graham; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	545
CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—CONVICTION OF JAMES M'KEON FOR RE-ENTRY — Questions, Mr. Conway; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	546
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—JUDICIAL OATHS—THE PRESBYTERIANS—Question, Mr. Sinclair; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Madden)	547
PRISONS (SCOTLAND)—DISCHARGE OF PRISONERS FROM BARLINNIE PRISON—Question, Mr. D. Crawford; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald)	548
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—ALLEGED MAINTENANCE OF CROWN WITNESSES—Question, Mr. Conybeare; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	548
ADMIRALTY — DEVONPORT DOCKYARD — THE FIREMEN — Question, Mr. Conybeare; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	549
WAR OFFICE — COMPETITIONS FOR SUBALTERNS OF MILITIA — Question, Colonel Waring; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	549
WAR OFFICE—THE "FIELD EXERCISES"—Question, Colonel Waring; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	550

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 17.]

Page

WAR OFFICE—POWDER AND AMMUNITION BARGES IN THE RIVER THAMES— Question, Colonel Hughes; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	550
TRADE AND COMMERCE—THE AUSTRIAN TARIFF—DUTY ON BICYCLES, &c.— Question, Mr. Ernest Spencer; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	551
ISLANDS OF THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC—SAMOA—HARBOUR OF PAGO PAGO— Question, Mr. Howard Vincent; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	551
ISLANDS OF THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC—SAMOA—Question, Mr. W. A. McArthur; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	552
POOR LAW GUARDIANS—VISITING COMMITTEES—Question, Mr. Atherley- Jones; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	553
VENEZUELA—THE UNITED STATES—Question, Sir George Baden-Powell; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	554
ADMIRALTY—CASE OF G. L. GROVER, LATE MIDSHIPMAN OF H.M.S. "BACCHANTE"—Question, Mr. Whitmore; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	554
METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS—EMPLOYMENT OF COUNSEL—Question, Mr. Labouchere; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	555
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—BOARDS OF GUARDIANS —TRANSFER OF POWERS—Question, Mr. Paulton; Answer, The Presi- dent of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	555
ADMIRALTY—THE DOCKS AT HAULBOWLINE—Questions, Dr. Fox, Dr. Tanner; Answers, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	556
THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—RE-APPOINTMENT OF MR. H. EGAN— TULLAMORE—Questions, Dr. Fox, Mr. T. W. Russell; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	556
MARGARINE ACT, 1887—SEIZURE OF DUTCH MARGARINE—Question, Mr. Maclure; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	557
BARNARD'S INN—SALE OF THE INN—Question, Mr. Brookfield; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster)	558
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—THE LICENSING CLAUSES—LEGAL RIGHT TO RENEWAL—Question, Mr. Summers; An- swer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) [Further Questions thereon]	558
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—THE FISH TRADE— THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL AND THE GREATER MUNICIPAL COUNCILS —Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	561
UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND) BILL—THE COMMISSIONERS—Question, Mr. Bryce; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	562
SCOTLAND—INSPECTION OF MINES—APPOINTMENTS—Question, Mr. J. W. Philipps; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	562
ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE MILITIA (IRELAND)—INSUBORDINATION— Questions, Colonel Waring, Mr. Conybeare; Answers, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	563
AUSTRALIA—CHINESE IMMIGRANTS—Question, Mr. Henniker Heaton; An- swer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	563

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 17.]	Page
BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE WHITSUNTIDE HOLIDAYS—Questions, Sir Walter B. Barttelot, Dr. Farquharson, Mr. Illingworth; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	563
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE AFFRAY AT MITCHELSTOWN IN SEPTEMBER LAST—THE CORONER'S INQUEST—Questions, Mr. Summers, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	564
INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIVER BANN — LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Lea; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	565
WAR OFFICE—NAVAL AND MILITARY ORGANIZATION—THE ROYAL MARINE FORCE—Question, Captain Colomb; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	566
NATIONAL DEFENCE BILL—Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	566
RULES OF DEBATE—QUESTIONS—Question, Mr. Bartley; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	566
FRIENDLY SOCIETIES—RETURN—Question, Dr. Clark; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	567

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—

(In the Committee.)

VOTE ON ACCOUNT, No. 2.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a further sum, not exceeding £4,205,300, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the following Charge for Civil Services and Revenue Departments for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889," viz.:— [Then the several Services are set forth] 567

After debate, Moved, "That the Item of £1,000, for the Secretary for Scotland, be reduced by the sum of £100,"—(Mr. Hunter:.)—After further debate, Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 37, Noes 88; Majority 51.—(Div. List, No. 114.)

Original Question again proposed 625

After short debate, Moved, "That the Question be now put,"—(Mr. M'Innes:.)—Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 103, Noes 13; Majority 90.—(Div. List, No. 115.)

Original Question put accordingly, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported upon Thursday 31st May; Committee to sit again upon Thursday 31st May.

Employers' Liability for Injuries to Workmen Bill [Bill 145]

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Secretary Mathews) 635

After debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Fenwick:.)—After further short debate, Question put, and agreed to:—Debate adjourned till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

National Debt (Supplemental) Bill [Bill 264]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer) 672

It being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned:—Debate to be resumed upon Thursday 31st May.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
[May 17.]
National Defence Bill [Bill 235]—
Moved , "That the Committee be deferred till Monday 4th June,"—(Mr. Jackson)	673
Motion agreed to.

M O T I O N S .

SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS—
Moved , "That this House, at its rising To-morrow, do adjourn till Thursday 31st May,"—(Mr. W. H. Smith)	673
[Question not put]

PRIVATE BILLS—

Ordered, That Standing Orders 39 and 129 be suspended, and that the time for depositing Petitions against Private Bills, or against any Bill to confirm any Provisional Order, or Provisional Certificate, and for depositing duplicates of any Documents relating to any Bill to confirm any Provisional Order, or Provisional Certificate, be extended to Thursday, 31st May, —(The Chairman of Ways and Means.)

ULSTER CANAL AND TYRONE NAVIGATION BILL [Lords]

Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Macartney, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, and Colonel Saunderson nominated Members of the Select Committee (with Three Members to be added by the Committee of Selection).

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES) (SPECIAL REPORT)—

Ordered , That the Committee of Selection have leave to make a Special Report	676
Ordered , That the Report do lie upon the Table.

Court of Session and Bill Chamber (Scotland) (Clerks) Bill—Ordered (The Lord Advocate, Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 269]	676
--	-----

Technical Instruction Bill—Ordered (Sir William Hart Dyke, Mr. Jackson) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 270]	676
	[12.15.]

COMMONS, FRIDAY, MAY 18.

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION—

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, owing to the continuance of his indisposition :—

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table ; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Q U E S T I O N S .

LABOURERS' (IRELAND) ACTS—BANDON BOARD OF GUARDIANS—Questions, Dr. Tanner ; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	677
FISHERY PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—ROSSCARRERY PIER—Questions, Dr. Tanner ; Answers, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	678
TURKEY (ASIATIC PROVINCES)—ARMENIA — Question, Dr. Tanner ; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	679

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 18.]	Page
WESTERN AUSTRALIA — SIR F. NAPIER BROOME AND CHIEF JUSTICE ONSLOW—Question, Dr. Tanner; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	680
POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—POSTAL DELIVERY AT CROOKSTOWN, CO. CORK— Question, Dr. Tanner; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	681
PRISONS DEPARTMENT—CONVICT LABOUR AT DOVER—MAT-MAKING—Ques- tion, Mr. Quilter; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	681
FRIENDLY SOCIETIES AND INDUSTRIAL ASSURANCE COMPANIES—A SELECT COMMITTEE—Question, Dr. Clark; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)	681
SCOTLAND—GRANTS IN AID OF LOCAL TAXATION—Questions, Mr. Mark Stewart, Mr. Hunter; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)	682
METROPOLITAN POLICE — CONSTABLE ALFRED WATSON, B. DIVISION — Questions, Mr. Cunninghame Graham; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	683
THE ROYAL MINT—LEASE OF THE REFINERY TO BARON A. DE ROTHSCHILD —Question, Mr. Cunninghame Graham; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)	684
TORQUAY HARBOUR AND DISTRICT ACT, 1886 — TOWN COUNCIL OF COLCHESTER—RELIGIOUS STREET PROCESSIONS—Question, Mr. Cony- beare; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	684
WAR OFFICE—ARMY PENSIONERS IN GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS—Question, Mr. Conybeare; Answer, The Financial Secretary, War Department (Mr. Brodrick)	685
LOTTERIES—FOREIGN LOTTERIES—Question, Mr. Conybeare; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster)	686
THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS OF ENGLAND — Question, Dr. Farqu- harson; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke)	686
RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC BILL—Question, Sir Roper Lethbridge; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	687

MOTION.

—o—

SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS— Moved , “That this House, at its rising this day, do adjourn till Thursday 31st May,”—(Mr. William Henry Smith)	687
After debate, Moved , “That the Question be now put,”—(Dr. Tanner :) —Question put, and agreed to .
Question put accordingly, and agreed to :— Resolved , That this House, at its rising this day, do adjourn until Thursday 31st May.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—o—

Employers' Liability for Injuries to Workmen Bill [Bill 145]— SECOND READING [ADJOURNED DEBATE]—
Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [17th May], “That the Bill be now read a second time :”—Question again pro- posed :—Debate resumed	702
After debate, Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday 31st May .

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 18.]

Page

MOTIONS.

Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 8) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie); presented, and read the first time [Bill 271]	..	745
Local Government Provisional Order (Poor Law) (No. 7) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie); presented, and read the first time [Bill 272]	..	745
		[6.5].

COMMONS, THURSDAY, MAY 31.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887 (IMPRISONMENT OF MR. CONDON)—Letter received by Mr. Speaker	..	746
--	----	-----

QUESTIONS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS (IRELAND)—ALLEGED REFUSAL OF A PUBLIC HALL AT NEWTOWNARDS TO MR. JOHN DILLON—Question, Mr. J. E. Ellis; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	..	746
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—IMPRISONMENT OF MR. THOMAS MORONEY, OF HERBERTSTOWN, FOR CONTEMPT OF COURT—Questions, Mr. J. E. Ellis; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	..	747
BURMAH—THE IRRAWADDY FLOTILLA COMPANY AND THE STAMP DUTIES—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	..	748
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—LODGING AND MAINTENANCE OF CROWN WITNESSES—Question, Mr. Conybeare; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	..	748
PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—ST. STEPHEN'S CHAPEL—VISITATION BY MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE AND FRIENDS—Question, Mr. Conybeare; Answer, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket)	..	749
EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO WORKMEN BILL—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	..	750
LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (IRELAND)—SUPERVISION OF THE BALLINASLOE BOARD OF GUARDIANS—Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	..	750
METROPOLITAN POLICE—CASES OF ASSAULT ON THE PUBLIC—THE RETURN—Questions, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley), The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	..	750
AUSTRALIA—NEW SOUTH WALES—CHINESE IMMIGRANTS—Question, Mr. Henniker Heaton; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	..	751
BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ORDER OF PUBLIC BUSINESS—Questions, Mr. Baumann, Mr. Herbert Gardner, Mr. Biggar; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	..	752

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—REPORT—Resolution [17th May] reported	..	752
Moved, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution"	..	753
Amendment proposed, to leave out "£4,205,800," in order to insert "£4,195,300,"—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor,)—instead thereof.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[May 31.]

Page

SUPPLY—REPORT—continued.

Question proposed, "That '£4,205,300' stand part of the Resolution : "

—After short debate, Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution agreed to.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—

(In the Committee.)

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £4,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889, for the Extension of Admiralty Buildings"

759

After debate, Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 144, Noes 85; Majority 59.—(Div. List, No. 116.)

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £46,073, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs"

792

Moved, "That a sum, not exceeding £45,573, be granted for the said Service,"—(Sir George Campbell :)—After debate, Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 55, Noes 103; Majority 48.—(Div. List, No. 117.)

Original Question again proposed 808

After debate, Moved, "That a sum, not exceeding £45,073, be granted for the said Service,"—(Mr. Anderson :)—Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 62, Noes 111; Majority 49.—(Div. List, No. 118.)

Original Question again proposed 856

After debate, Moved, "That a sum, not exceeding £45,773, be granted for the said Service,"—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor :)—Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 43, Noes 126; Majority 81.—(Div. List, No. 119.)

Original Question again proposed 872

Moved, "That the Question be now put,"—(Mr. W. H. Smith :)—Question put, and agreed to.

Original Question put accordingly, and agreed to.

It being after Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to report the Resolutions to the House.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

Reformatory Schools Act (1866) Amendment Bill [Bill 161]—

Bill considered in Committee 873

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

Electric Lighting Act (1882) Amendment Bill [Lords] [Bill 233]

Bill considered in Committee 878

After short time spent therein, Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Chairman left the Chair to report Progress :—Committee also report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

Waltham Abbey Gunpowder Factory Bill—Ordered (Mr. Brodrick, Mr. Secretary Stanhope); presented, and read the first time [Bill 273] 877

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC [SALARIES, &C.]—

Resolution considered in Committee 877

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

[12.35.]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Page

COMMONS, FRIDAY, JUNE 1.

QUESTIONS.

BRITISH GUIANA—CONSTRUCTION OF A RAILWAY FROM GUACIPATI TO THE ORINOCO—Question, Mr. Watt; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	878
BRITISH GUIANA—PROTECTION OF INDIANS—Question, Mr. Watt; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Baron Henry de Worms)	878
BRITISH GUIANA—DETENTION OF MR. M'TURK—Question, Mr. King; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	878
POST OFFICE—LOSSES OF LETTERS IN THE NEW CROSS DISTRICT—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	879
METROPOLITAN PARISHES—VESTRY MEETING IN THE PARISH OF ST. GILES-IN-THE-FIELDS—Questions, Mr. Conybeare; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	880
EAST INDIA (CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS)—Question, Mr. M'Laren; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	880
ARMY (SMALL ARMS)—REMOVAL OF MANUFACTORY FROM SPARKBROOK, BIRMINGHAM, TO ENFIELD—Question, Mr. Dugdale; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	881
METROPOLIS—THE FATAL FIRE IN EDGWARE ROAD—Postponement of Question, Mr. Seager Hunt	882
HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (CHANCERY DIVISION)—APPOINTMENT OF AN ADDITIONAL JUDGE—Question, Mr. Warmington; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster)	883
LOTTERY ACTS—Questions, Mr. Bradlaugh, Mr. Conybeare; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews), The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster)	883
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—INCREASE OF SENTENCES ON APPEAL—Question, Mr. John Morley; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	885
LUNACY ACTS AMENDMENT BILL—Question, Dr. Farquharson; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	886
WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL RESOLUTIONS—THE VAN AND WHEEL TAX—Questions, Mr. Causton; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	886
WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL RESOLUTIONS—THE DUTIES ON BOTTLED WINE—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)	887
LAW AND JUSTICE (METROPOLIS)—MOLESTATION OF FEMALES—CASE OF MR. ROWDEN—Questions, Mr. Darling; Answers, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster)	887

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—

TRUSTEE SAVINGS BANKS—RESOLUTION—

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the relationship subsisting between Trustee

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 1.]

Page

TRUSTEE SAVINGS BANKS—continued.

Savings Banks and the State is unsatisfactory, and ought to be revised; that Trustees and Managers should be restrained from using the words 'Government Security,' 'Government Savings Bank,' or other words implying more than the Law rightfully authorises, in connection with such Banks, the use of which is calculated to deceive depositors, create a false impression of security, and damage the cause of thrift; and that the Trustees and Managers of such Banks should, as formerly, be made responsible for the safe custody of the deposits committed to their care in connection with such Trustee Banks,"—(Mr. Howell),—instead thereof .. 888

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—After debate, Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," again proposed :—

PUBLIC HEALTH—SPREAD OF SMALL POX IN SHEFFIELD—Observations, Mr. Picton :—Debate thereon .. 928

SCOTLAND—SOUTH-EAST COAST FISHERMEN—RIGHTS AS TO MUSSEL BEDS—Observations, Mr. Anderson :—Debate thereon .. 953

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES— (In the Committee.)

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £27,968, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies, including certain Expenses connected with Emigration " 974

After debate, Moved, "That a sum, not exceeding £22,968, be granted for the said Service,"—(Mr. Edmund Robertson :)—Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 56, Noes 103; Majority 47.—(Div. List, No. 120.)

Original Question again proposed .. 990

Moved, "That a sum, not exceeding £27,718, be granted for the said Service,"—(Mr. Labouchere :)—Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 59, Noes 114; Majority 55.—(Div. List, No. 121.)

Original Question again proposed .. 991

After short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £37,356, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council and Subordinate Departments " 995

After short debate, Moved, "That a sum, not exceeding £32,356, be granted for the said Service,"—(Mr. Bradlaugh :)—Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 34, Noes 130; Majority 96.—(Div. List, No. 122.)

Original Question again proposed .. 999

It being after Midnight, the Chairman rose to interrupt the Business, Whereupon Moved, "That the Question be now put,"—(Mr. W. H. Smith :)—Question put :—The Committee divided; Ayes 121, Noes 40; Majority 81.—(Div. List, No. 123.)

Original Question put accordingly :—The Committee divided; Ayes 128, Noes 32; Majority 96.—(Div. List, No. 124.)

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next; Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 1.]	Page
Fishery Acts Amendment (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill [Bill 260]—
Order for Second Reading read	1000
Second Reading deferred till Thursday 21st June.

MOTIONS.

Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 9) Bill — Ordered (Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie); presented, and read the first time [Bill 274]	1001
Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 10) Bill — Ordered (Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie); presented, and read the first time [Bill 275]	1001
Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 11) Bill — Ordered (Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie); presented, and read the first time [Bill 276]	1001
	[12.30.]

LORDS, MONDAY, JUNE 4.

PUBLIC BUSINESS —STANDING ORDERS—Postponement of Motion, The Lord Privy Seal (Earl Cadogan)	1001
Rochester Bishopric Bill (No. 98) —
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Lord Bishop of Rochester)	1002
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday the 12th instant.
Clergy Discipline Bill (No. 118) —
Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read	1006
Third Reading put off to Tuesday the 12th instant.
UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND) BILL —Observations, The Secretary for Scotland (The Marquess of Lothian), The Earl of Camperdown	1006
West Loch Tarbert Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Order Confirmation Bill [H.L.]— Presented (The Lord Ker, M. Lothian); read 1^a, and referred to the Examiners (No. 126)	1007
	[5.15.]

COMMONS, MONDAY, JUNE 4.

QUESTIONS.

BANKRUPTCY ACT —HORTICULTURAL COMPANY (JOHN WILLS, LIMITED)—
Question, Mr. J. Chamberlain; Answer, The President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach)	1007
IRISH LAND COMMISSION —COLONEL KING-HARMAN'S ESTATES—FAIR RENTS
—Question, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1008
EXCISE —LICENCES FOR SALE OF SWEET OR MADE WINES (SCOTLAND)—
Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	1009

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
[June 4.]
NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—TRAINING COLLEGES—PROBATIONERS— Question, Mr. P. M'Donald; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1009
INLAND REVENUE—INHABITED HOUSE DUTY—SMALL TENEMENTED HOUSES —Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	1010
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—THE LICENSING AND COMPENSATION CLAUSES—Question, Mr. Summers; Answer, The Pre- sident of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	1011
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—BORROWING POWERS OF COUNTY COUNCILS—Questions, Mr. Stephens, Mr. Firth; Answers, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	1011
NORTH AMERICAN FISHERIES—BEHRING'S STRAITS—Questions, Mr. Gourley; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	1013
VENEZUELA—ENCROACHMENTS ON BRITISH GUIANA—Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	1013
DEPRESSION OF TRADE—THE NAILMAKERS OF WORCESTER AND STAFFORD- SHIRE—Question, Mr. Brooke Robinson; Answer, The President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach)	1014
TRUCK ACTS—ALLEGED BREACHES—Questions, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1014
EGYPT—EXPENDITURE—CIVIL AND MILITARY—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)	1015
ARMY—THE QUEEN'S REGULATIONS—SALUTING AUXILIARY FORCES—Ques- tion, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	1016
THE CAPE COLONY—OFFICES OF HIGH COMMISSIONER AND GOVERNOR— Question, Mr. J. Chamberlain; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Baron Henry De Worms)	1016
COLLIERY EXPLOSIONS—THE ST. HELEN'S COLLIERY—THE INQUEST— Question, Mr. W. Crawford; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1017
NAVY (SHIPBUILDING)—THE "BARRACOUTA"—Question, Lord Charles Beresford; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	1017
POST OFFICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—FIRST-CLASS TELEGRAPHISTS—Ques- tion, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	1018
CHARITY COMMISSIONERS—THE ROYAL HOLLOWAY COLLEGE—Question, Mr. Courtney Kenny; Answer, Mr. J. W. Lowther	1018
LAW AND JUSTICE—DR. BURKE, CONVICTED OF MURDER—COMMUTATION OF SENTENCE—Question, Mr. Courtney Kenny; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1019
LAND COURTS (IRELAND)—FAIR RENTS, CO. WICKLOW—Question, Mr. Byrne; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1019
ARMY—THE ROYAL FUSILIERS—PROMOTION—Question, Sir John Colomb; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	1020
WALES—THE TITHE AGITATION—DISTURBANCES AT LLANEFYDD—Question, Mr. T. E. Ellis; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1021
WALES—THE TITHE AGITATION—THE DENBIGHSHIRE MAGISTRATES—Ques- tions, Mr. Bowen Rowlands, Mr. T. E. Ellis; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1022
LEGACY AND SUCCESSION DUTIES ACT—THE COLONIES—Question, Sir George Baden-Powell; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)	1022

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 4.]

Page

THE CHANNEL ISLANDS—THE MINQUIER ISLETS—Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	1024
IRISH LAND COMMISSION—APPLICATION FOR LOANS—Question, Mr. Tuite; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1024
WAR OFFICE (AUXILIARY FORCES)—CINQUE PORTS DIVISION, ROYAL ARTILLERY—Question, Mr. Halley Stewart; Answer, The Financial Secretary, War Department (Mr. Brodrick)	1024
EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—COLONEL KING-HARMAN'S ESTATE, CO. LONGFORD—Question, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1025
LAW AND POLICE—SUICIDES FROM THE CLIFTON SUSPENSION BRIDGE—Question, Mr. Pickersgill; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1026
CROWN RENTS AND ROYALTIES—GOLD AND SILVER MINES—Questions, Mr. Watt, Mr. Howell; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)	1027
INLAND REVENUE—EXEMPTIONS FROM INCOME TAX—THE CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY—Question, Sir John Kennaway; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)	1028
COAL MINES, &c. REGULATION ACT—STOPES COLLIERY, BOLTON—Questions, Mr. Leake, Mr. Fenwick; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1028
SEA FISHERIES—REPORT OF THE INSPECTOR—Question, Mr. Rowntree; Answer, The President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach)	1030
LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—THE DUDLEY COUNTY COURT—FEES—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster)	1030
LEGAL PROCEEDINGS (REPORTS) BILL—Question, Mr. S. Smith; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1030
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES)—INSPECTED SCHOOLS—AVERAGE ATTENDANCE, &c.—RETURNS—Question, Mr. Hoyle; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1031
SCOTLAND—GOLD DISCOVERIES—Questions, Mr. Watt, Sir George Campbell; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1031
THE MAURITIUS—SUSPENSION OF THE GOVERNOR, SIR JOHN POPE HENNESSY—Question, Mr. Baumann; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Baron Henry de Worms)	1032
CHARITY COMMISSION—CHRIST'S HOSPITAL SCHEME—Question, Mr. Mundella; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1032
WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL RESOLUTIONS—THE WINE DUTIES—Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)	1033

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC [SALARIES, &c.]—
Resolution considered in Committee	1033
Resolution to be reported To-morrow .
IMPERIAL DEFENCE [EXPENSES]—
Matter considered in Committee [Progress 15th May]	1033

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 4.]

Page

IMPERIAL DEFENCE [EXPENSES]—continued.

Moved, "That it is expedient to authorise the issue, out of the Consolidated Fund, of such sums, not exceeding £3,600,000, as may be required for the defence of certain Ports and Coaling Stations, and making further provisions for Imperial Defence,"—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

After debate, Moved, "That the Question be now put,"—(Mr. Waddy:)—Question put, and agreed to.

Question put accordingly:—The Committee divided; Ayes 206, Noes 85; Majority 121.

Division List, Ayes and Noes 1121

Moved, "That interest at the rate of three per centum per annum on such or so much of the said sum as may be borrowed shall be paid out of the moneys to be provided by Parliament for Army Services,"—(Mr. William Henry Smith) .. . 1124

After short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 216, Noes 136; Majority 80.—(Div. List, No. 126.)

Moved, "That, after 1894, all dividends received by the Treasury in respect of Suez Canal Shares, after deduction of the sum required for paying off the bonds issued for the purchase of such shares, be applied in paying the principal of the amount borrowed,"—(Mr. William Henry Smith) .. . 1131

After short debate, it being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow; Committee also report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

NATIONAL DEFENCE [REMUNERATION, &C.]—

Matter considered in Committee 1143

Moved, "That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of remuneration to Railway Companies for receiving and forwarding traffic under the authority of a Secretary of State or the Admiralty, and of compensation to any person suffering loss for anything done under such authority, in pursuance of any Act of the present Session to make better provision respecting National Defence,"—(Mr. Secretary Stanhope.)

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

PUBLIC BUSINESS—THE BANN, BARROW, AND SHANNON DRAINAGE BILLS— Observations, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour), Mr. T. M. Healy 1144

Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland Bill [Bill 201]—

Order for Committee read:—Moved, "That the Committee be deferred till To-morrow,"—(Mr. A. J. Balfour) .. . 1145

After short debate, Question put, and agreed to:—Committee deferred till To-morrow.

Land Law (Ireland) (Land Commission) Bill [Bill 199]—

Order for Committee read:—Moved, "That the Committee be deferred till To-morrow,"—(Mr. A. J. Balfour) .. . 1146

After short debate, Question put, and agreed to:—Committee deferred till To-morrow.

County Courts Consolidation and Amendment Bill [Lords]—

Moved, "That the Consideration, as amended, be deferred till Thursday" 1147

Question put, and agreed to:—Consideration, as amended, deferred till Thursday.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

[June 4.]	Page
EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO WORKMEN [REMUNERATION]— Question, Mr. J. E. Ellis; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) ..	1148
Glebe Lands Occupation Bill [Bill 34]— Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Mowbray) ..	1148
After short debate, Question put, and negatived :—Second Reading deferred till Wednesday.

MOTIONS.

Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Provisional Order Bill— Ordered (Mr. Jackson, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland); presented , and read the first time [Bill 277]	1149
North Sea Fisheries Bill— Ordered (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Baron Henry de Worms); presented , and read the first time [Bill 278] ..	1149
Torquay Harbour and District Act (1886) Amendment Bill— Ordered (Mr. Henry H. Fowler, Sir Bernhard Samuelson, Mr. Charles Acland, Mr. Stuart, Mr. Schwenn); presented , and read the first time [Bill 279] ..	1149
STANDING COMMITTEES (CHAIRMEN'S PANEL)— Leave given to the Chairmen's Panel to make a Report ..	1149
STANDING COMMITTEE ON TRADE, SHIPPING, AND MANUFACTURE— Ordered , That the Standing Committee on Trade, Shipping, and Manu- factures have leave to sit and proceed with the Railway and Canal Companies Charges Bill, and the Railway and Canal Traffic Bill [Lords], on Monday 11th June, at Twelve of the clock,—(Sir Matthew White Ridley.) [12.30.]

LORDS, TUESDAY, JUNE 5.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—TREATY WITH THE AMANDEBELE CHIEF—ZULULAND— Question, The Earl of Kimberley; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Lord Knutsford)	1150
Universities (Scotland) Bill (No. 47)— Moved , "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee upon the said Bill,"—(The Marquess of Lothian)	1151
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—House in Committee accordingly: Bill reported , without Amendment; Amendments made; Bill re-com- mitted to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next; and to be printed , as amended. (No. 128.)
Municipal Franchise Extension (Ireland) Bill (No. 80)— Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,"—(The Lord Denman) ..	1157
Amendment moved , to leave out ("now,") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day three months,")—(The Lord Privy Seal.)
On Question, Whether the word ("now") shall stand part of the Motion? Resolved in the negative ; and Bill to be read 2 ^a this day three months.
THE SCOTTISH UNIVERSITIES COMMISSION—Statement, The Secretary for Scotland (The Marquess of Lothian)	1158
	[5.15.]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Page

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JUNE 5.

QUESTIONS.

VALUATION ROLL (SCOTLAND)—“INHABITANT OCCUPIERS,” OR “TENANTS” —Question, Mr. Preston Bruce; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald)	1159
LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—CLAUSE 24—THE WATERFORD ESTATE, Co. DERRY—Question, Mr. Mulholland; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1160
CHANNEL TUNNEL BILL—LETTERS AND CORRESPONDENCE—Question, Sir Edward Watkin; Answer, The President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach)	1160
INDIA (BENGAL)—NAWAB ZAIGHUM-UD-DOWLAH—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	1161
MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—ISSUE OF LIME JUICE—THE “KILLEENA”—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach)	1161
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—SECTION 46—HIGHWAYS IN SOUTH WALES—Question, Mr. Arthur Williams; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	1162
CRIMINAL LAW (UNITED KINGDOM)—WILFUL MURDER—Question, Mr. Powell-Williams; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1163
LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—WEEKLY SHERIFF COURT, TOBERMORY—Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald)	1163
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—BURNING A BARN—Questions, Mr. J. E. Ellis, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1164
LUNACY ACT—DISTRICT BOARDS OF LUNACY—Question, Mr. J. W. Barclay; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald)	1165
SWITZERLAND—ENGLISH MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS—Question, Dr. Farquharson; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	1165
LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART—THE NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY—Question, Dr. Farquharson; Answer, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket)	1166
THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—SALUTING—Question, Mr. Flynn; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1166
LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—SUNDAY BAND AT TRALEE—Questions, Mr. Edward Harrington; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1166
FIRES (METROPOLIS)—FATAL FIRE IN THE EDGWARE ROAD—Question, Mr. Seager Hunt; Answer, Mr. Webster	1167
MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—THE “VANCOUVER”—Question, Mr. R. W. Duff; Answer, The President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach)	1168
POLICE SUPERANNUATION—LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—Question, Mr. T. Robinson; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	1168
METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS—PAYMENT OF COUNSEL'S FEES—Questions, Mr. Howell; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews), The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	1169

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 5.]

Page

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—CASE OF MR. AND MRS. CLINTON AT ASSINEE— Question, Sir Robert Fowler; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	1170
INDIA—MR. TAYLER, LATE COMMISSIONER OF PATNA — Questions, Sir Roper Lethbridge; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	1171
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—THE SOLICITOR GENERAL AT SOUTHAMPTON—Questions, Mr. Anderson; Answers, The Solicitor General (Sir Edward Clarke)	1171
WAR OFFICE—THE VICTORIA JUBILEE HOSPITAL, FOLKESTONE—Question, Sir Edward Watkin; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	1172
INDIA STORE DEPOT—SALARY OF THE SUPERINTENDENT—Question, Mr. Pickersgill; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	1172
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—THE LICENCE DUTIES— Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, The President of the Local Govern- ment Board (Mr. Ritchie)	1173
INDIA STORE DEPARTMENT—PRICES OF WARLIKE STORES—Question, Mr. Pickersgill; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	1174
ST. GILES-IN-THE-FIELDS—VESTRY ELECTIONS—Questions, Mr. M'Cartan; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews), The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	1174
IRELAND—THE NEWTOWNARDS FARMERS' ASSOCIATION—Questions, Mr. M'Cartan; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1175
TORQUAY DISTRICT HARBOUR BILL, 1886—REPORT OF THE HOME OFFICE— Question, Mr. Henry H. Fowler; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1176
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE LAW COURTS—OATHS OF PRESBY- TERIANS—Questions, Mr. Sinclair; Answers, The Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Madden); Question, Mr. T. W. Russell [No reply]	1176
LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—OATHS—Questions, Mr. Sinclair; Answers, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald)	1177
NEW GUINEA—COST OF TELEGRAPHIC MESSAGES—Question, Mr. Henniker Heaton; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Baron Henry de Worms)	1178
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—TRANSFERRED LICENCES AND LOCAL TAXATION LICENCES—Question, Mr. Henry H. Fowler; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	1178
PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND)—POLLUTION OF LOCH LONG AND LOCH GOIL— Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald)	1178
LEGAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL—SECURITY FOR COSTS—Question, Mr. Watt; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster)	1179
WORKMEN'S WAGES—MESSRS. LION BROTHERS—Question, Mr. Pickersgill; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster)	1180
HORSE BREEDING—FIRST REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION — Question, Mr. Chaplin; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1180
THE TITHE QUESTION—LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Swetenham; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1180
DEPARTMENT FOR AGRICULTURE—LEGISLATION—Questions, Mr. Gray, Mr. Brookfield; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1181

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
[June 5.]
ARMY (INDIA)—CANTONMENT BAZAARS—CAMP FOLLOWERS—Question, Mr. H. J. Wilson; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	1181
SOUTH AFRICA—REPORTED DISTURBANCES IN ZULULAND—Question, Sir George Baden-Powell; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Baron Henry de Worms)	1182
WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL RESOLUTIONS—THE BOTTLED WINE DUTIES—Questions, Mr. Childers; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)	1182
EAST INDIA (CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS) — Questions, Sir Richard Temple; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst), Mr. Speaker	1185
THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. HAMILTON, R.M.—Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1186
CRIMINAL CASES (IRELAND)—INCREASE OF SENTENCES ON APPEAL—Question, Mr. J. E. Ellis; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1186

MOTIONS.

EAST INDIA (CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS)—RESOLUTION—

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, any mere suspension of measures for the compulsory examination of women, and for licensing and regulating prostitution in India, is insufficient, and the legislation which enjoins, authorises, or permits such measures ought to be repealed,"—(Mr. Walter M'Laren) 1187

After debate, Resolution agreed to.

REGINA v. HARKINS AND CALLAN—

Moved, "That there be laid before this House Copies of a Statement made to Mr. Cuffe, Assistant Solicitor to the Treasury, by Mr. Joseph Nolan, M.P., on the 11th day of January, 1888, with reference to the case of Regina v. Harkins and Callan :

And, of a Transcript of the Shorthand Writer's Notes of the Evidence given by Mr. Joseph Nolan, M.P., at the trial of the case of Regina v. Harkins and Callan at the Central Criminal Court,"—(Mr. Stuart-Wortley) 1216

After debate, it being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned:—Debate to be resumed To-morrow.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland Bill [Bill 201]—

Order for Committee read [Progress 14th May] 1234 Committee deferred till Tuesday next.

Land Law (Ireland) (Land Commission) Bill [Bill 199]—

Order for Committee read:—Moved, "That the Committee be deferred till To-morrow,"—(Mr. A. J. Balfour) 1235
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Committee deferred till To-morrow.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 5.]

Page

MOTIONS.

Parliamentary Voters Lists (Ireland) Bill — Ordered (Mr. Chance, Mr. Maurice Healy); presented, and read the first time [Bill 280]	1236
Supreme Court of Judicature Act (Ireland) (1877) Amendment Bill — Ordered (Mr. Chance, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Maurice Healy); presented, and read the first time [Bill 281]	1236
Parliamentary Elections (Returning Officers) Act (1875) Amendment Bill— Ordered (Mr. Chance, Sir Walter Foster, Mr. Maurice Healy); presented, and read the first time [Bill 282]	1236
			[12.15.]

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 6.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Enniskillen, Bundoran, and Sligo Railway Bill (by Order)— Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time"	1237
Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Libel Law Amendment Bill [Bill 17]— Bill considered in Committee [Progress 8th May]	1237
After long time spent therein, it being half an hour after Five of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House :— Committee to sit again upon Friday.
Victoria University Bill [Bill 198]— Bill considered in Committee	1310
After short time spent therein, Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Friday.
Reformatory Schools Act (1866) Amendment Bill [Bill 161]— Bill considered in Committee [Progress 31st May]	1311
Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Friday.
RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC [SALARIES, &c.]—REPORT— Order for Consideration of Report read	1312
Report deferred till To-morrow.

QUESTIONS.

LAW OF LIMITED LIABILITY—LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Addison; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	1313
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL — Observation, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	1313
Local Government Provisional Order (No. 12) Bill — Ordered (Mr. Long, Mr. Ritchie); presented, and read the first time [Bill 283]	1313
			[5.55.]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Page

LORDS, THURSDAY, JUNE 7.

WIMBLEDON — THE NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION — Observations, Lord Oranmore and Browne	1314
ZANZIBAR — ITALIAN DEMANDS OF TERRITORY — Question, The Earl of Rosebery; Answer, The Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (The Marquess of Salisbury) ..	1314
THE HOUSE OF LORDS—INQUIRY INTO THE STANDING ORDERS—MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE—
Moved , "That the first and third paragraphs of Standing Order No. XX. be suspended, and that the Lord-Privy Seal's Motion have precedence of the Orders of the Day and Notice which stand before it,"—(The Marquess of Salisbury) ..	1315
Motion agreed to.
Moved , "That a Select Committee be appointed to examine and report upon those Standing Orders of the House which relate to the conduct of public business,"—(The Lord Privy Seal)	1315
After short debate, Motion agreed to. Liability of Trustees Bill (No. 24)—
House in Committee (according to Order)	1326
Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Tuesday the 19th instant.
Universities (Scotland) Bill (No. 47)—
House in Committee (according to Order)	1329
Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Tuesday the 19th instant; and Bill to be printed , as amended. (No. 133.)
MINISTER FOR AGRICULTURE—LEGISLATION—Question, Observations, The Earl of Fife; Reply, The Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (The Marquess of Salisbury) ..	1345
THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—PETERSHAM PARK — SITE FOR VICARAGE—Question, The Earl of Meath; Answer, Lord Henniker ..	1346
	[8.15.]

COMMONS, THURSDAY, JUNE 7.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Ballina and Killala Railway and Harbour Bill (by Order)—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time" ..	1347
Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months,"—(Mr. Biggar.)
Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question : " —After debate; Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. T. M. Healy :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
Original Question put :—The House divided ; Ayes 227, Noes 51; Majority 176.—(Div. List, No. 128.)
Main Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 7.]

Page

GRAND COMMITTEES.

Mortmain and Charitable Uses Bill [Lords].—

Reported from the Standing Committee on Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure, with Amendments and a New Title .. 1361

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 207.]

Bill, as amended, to be considered on Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 285.]

Bail (Scotland) Bill [Lords].—

Reported from the Standing Committee on Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure 1361

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 208.]

Bill, as amended, to be considered upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 286.]

QUESTIONS.

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES) — JURIES — EXEMPTION OF VOLUNTEERS—Question, Sir John Kennaway; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	1362
POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—BELFAST POST OFFICE STAFF—Question, Mr. Nolan; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	1362
METROPOLITAN POLICE—SUPERVISION OF INCLOSED GARDENS—Question, Mr. Webster; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1363
CHARITY COMMISSIONERS—THE SWINESHEAD CHARITIES—Question, Mr. Labouchere; Answer, Mr. J. W. Lowther	1363
INDIA (BENGAL)—CIRCULAR OF MR. J. C. VEASEY, INSPECTOR GENERAL OF POLICE—Question, Mr. Slagg; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	1364
POST OFFICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—POLITICAL SPEECHES—SIR ARTHUR BLACKWOOD—Question, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	1365
GENERAL POST OFFICE, DUBLIN—THE SORTING OFFICE—Question, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes)	1366
EXCISE (IRELAND)—LICENCE OF A MARQUEE, HOLLYMOUNT, CO. MAYO—Questions, Mr. J. F. X. O'Brien, Colonel Nolan; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1367
BANKRUPTCY ACTS—THE RUABON COLLIERY, LIMITED—Question, Mr. J. Chamberlain; Answer, The President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach)	1368
PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—GREYSTONES HARBOUR—Question, Mr. W. J. Oorbet; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	1368
INDIA—THE IRRAWADDY FLOTILLA COMPANY—HIRE OF FLATS—Questions, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	1369
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—SECTION 15—MAIN ROADS AND FOOTPATHS—Question, Mr. F. Parker; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	1369
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—TRANSFER OF COUNTY BOUNDARIES—Question, Mr. Biddulph; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	1370
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—MEDICAL OFFICERS OF HEALTH—Question, Sir Guyer Hunter; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie)	1370

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 7.]	Page
WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL RESOLUTIONS—PROPOSED DISTRIBUTION OF THE EXCISE DUTIES—Question, Mr. Rowntree; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) ..	1371
INDIA—NAGPUR—THE GOND RAJA—Question, Sir Roper Lethbridge; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) ..	1371
SAVINGS BANKS—CARDIFF TRUSTEE SAVINGS BANK—Question, Mr. Howell; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) ..	1373
THE BERLIN CONFERENCE—ARTICLE XXXIV.—Question, Mr. F. S. Stevenson; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) ..	1374
ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE VOLUNTEERS—MUSKETRY PROFICIENCY—Question, Mr. Howard Vincent; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	1374
POST OFFICE—INTERNATIONAL TELEGRAPHIC CONVENTION—Question, Mr. Howard Vincent; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	1375
MERCHANT SHIPPING—SHIPPING INDUSTRY—INCREASE OF LIGHT DUES—Question, Mr. Royden; Answer, The President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) ..	1375
ARMS ACT (IRELAND)—GUN LICENCES—Questions, Mr. Gilhooly; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1376
PUBLIC HEALTH—INSANITARY STATE OF THE REGENT'S CANAL—Questions, Mr. Pictou, Mr. Lawson; Answers, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) ..	1376
CUSTOMS—EXAMINATION OF PASSENGERS' LUGGAGE AT LIVERPOOL, &c.—Question, Mr. Woodall; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) ..	1378
WALES—THE TITHE AGITATION—DISTURBANCE AT LLANEFYDD—Questions, Mr. T. E. Ellis, Mr. Bowen Rowlands; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	1378
POST OFFICE—CONTINENTAL MAILS—THE AUSTRIAN TRAIN SERVICE—Question, Mr. Henniker Heaton; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	1380
AFRICA (EASTERN COAST)—ITALIAN ACQUISITIONS—Question, Sir Lewis Pelly; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) ..	1381
THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—RICHMOND PARK—SITE FOR A VICARAGE—Questions, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Bryce; Answers, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) ..	1381
NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—GRATUITIES TO MONITORS—Question, Mr. Marum; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1382
CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—REFUSAL TO GIVE EVIDENCE—Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Clancy, Mr. M'Cartan; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1382
POST OFFICE—EXPRESS LETTER DELIVERY IN BELGIUM—Question, Mr. Kenyon; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	1383
WAR OFFICE (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)—SERVICE GUNS—SUPPLY OF AMMUNITION—Questions, Mr. Hanbury, Sir William Plowden; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	1384
THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—THE LAKE IN BATTERSEA PARK—Question, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answer, Mr. Webster ..	1385
LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—CLAUSE 24—THE WATERFORD ESTATE—Question, Mr. Mulholland; Answer, Viscount Lewisham ..	1386
UPPER BURMAH MINES—MR. BARRINGTON BROWNE'S REPORT—Question, Mr. Staveley Hill; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) ..	1386

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 8.]

Page

POOR LAW (METROPOLIS)—GUARDIANS OF POPLAR PARISH—CASE OF F. BURGE—Question, Mr. Cunninghame Graham; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) ..	1525
THE NORTH SEA FISHERIES—SALE OF TOBACCO—Question, Sir Edward Birkbeck; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) ..	1525
POST OFFICE—COUNTRY POSTMEN—TICKET BOOK FOR POSTAL ORDERS—Question, Sir Edward Birkbeck; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	1526
THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MESSRS. CECIL ROCHE AND HODDER, R.M.—SUB-COMMISSIONERS—Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1526
THE EXECUTIVE (IRELAND)—THE LORD LIEUTENANT—THE LORDS JUSTICES—Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1527
IRISH LAND COMMISSION—SUB-COMMISSIONS IN WESTMEATH—Question, Mr. Tuite; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1528
ADMIRALTY—PENSIONS—CASE OF JOHN M'CARTHY—Question, Mr. M'Cartan; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) ..	1528
THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—REMOVAL OF PLACARDS AT ENNIS—Question, Mr. J. E. Redmond; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1529
HOUSE OF COMMONS—ADMISSION OF DYNAMITARDS TO THIS HOUSE—MR. LAFONE, M.P.—Question, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answer, Viscount Ebrington ..	1529
WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL RESOLUTIONS—RELIEF OF LOCAL TAXATION (SCOTLAND)—Question, Mr. Buchanan; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) ..	1530
WAR OFFICE—H.R.H. THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE, COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF OF HER MAJESTY'S FORCES—Questions, Mr. E. Robertson; Answers, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	1531
METROPOLITAN POLICE—MISTAKEN ARREST OF DR. O'BRIEN—Question, Mr. Sydney Buxton; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	1532
COAL MINES, &c. REGULATION ACT, 1887—THE Ayrshire COLLIERIES—THE SPECIAL RULES—Question, Mr. Cunninghame Graham; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	1532
PUBLIC MEETINGS—SPEECH OF THE CHIEF SECRETARY AT BATTERSEA—Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Edward Harrington; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1533
HOUSE OF COMMONS—ADMISSION OF DYNAMITARDS TO THIS HOUSE—EVIDENCE OF MR. MONRO, ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER OF POLICE—Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	1536
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—ESTIMATE OF VALUE OF PUBLIC-HOUSE PROPERTY—Questions, Mr. Summers, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Mr. Conybeare; Answers, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie), Mr. Speaker ..	1537
ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACTS—REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION—Question, Viscount Cranborne; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) ..	1538
UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND) BILL—THE COMMISSIONERS—Questions, Mr. Hunter, Mr. E. Robertson; Answers, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) ..	1538
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE AFFRAY AT MITCHELSTOWN IN SEPTEMBER LAST—THE OFFICIAL SHORTHAND WRITER'S NOTES—Question, Mr. W. O'Brien; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1539

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
[June 7.]
THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—OUTRAGE IN THE REGENT'S PARK—Question, Mr. Norris; Answer, The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket)	1405
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—THE COMPENSATION CLAUSES—THE LICENCE DUTIES—Question, Mr. Summers; Answer, The Solicitor General (Sir Edward Clarke)	1406
PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—THE SUBWAY TO THE EMBANKMENT—Question, Mr. Conybeare; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1406
CENTRAL AFRICA—ASSAULT ON A BRITISH OFFICER AT NYASSA—Question, Mr. Buchanan; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson)	1407
RECONCILIATION TO THE SEE OF ROME—13 ELIZ., c. 2—PETER'S PENCE—25 HEN. VIII., c. 21—Question, Mr. Commins; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster)	1407
SAVINGS BANKS ACT, 1887—THE RULES AND REGULATIONS—Questions, Mr. Howell; Answers, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	1409
COMMITTEE ON IRISH RAILWAYS—Question, Mr. Watt; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1409
BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND)—LAND IMPROVEMENT ADVANCES—Question, Mr. Marum; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)	1410
HARBOURS OF REFUGE—DUNGENESS—Question, Mr. Pomfret; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1410
HOUSE OF COMMONS—ADMISSION OF DYNAMITARDS TO THIS HOUSE—Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Mr. Parnell; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1410
THE NAVAL AND MILITARY DEPARTMENTS—THE ROYAL COMMISSION—Question, Sir Walter B. Barttelot; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1413
BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1414
WAR OFFICE—HYPOTHETICAL INVASION OF THIS COUNTRY—Questions, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Sir William Plowden, Colonel Blundell, Mr. Hanbury; Answers, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	1414

MOTIONS.

NEW RULES OF PROCEDURE—RULE 2 (ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE)—TITHE DISTURBANCES IN NORTH WALES—ACTION OF POLICE AND EMERGENCY MEN—
Moved , "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Thomas Ellis)	1415
After debate, Moved , "That the Question be now put,"—(Mr. W. H. Smith:)—Question put, and agreed to .
Question put accordingly, "That this House do now adjourn:"—The House divided ; Ayes 146, Noes 217; Majority 71.—(Div. List, No. 129.)
BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (MORNING SITTINGS)—RESOLUTION—
Moved , "That whenever the Local Government (England and Wales) Bill shall be appointed for Tuesday or Friday the House shall meet at Two of the clock,"—(Mr. William Henry Smith)	1438
After short debate, Question put, and agreed to .

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 7.]

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Local Government (England and Wales) Bill [Bill 182]—

Order for Committee read [FIRST NIGHT]— .. 1440

Moved, "That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to insert provisions for the reform of parish vestries,"—(Mr. Francis Stevenson) .. 1457

After long debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 183, Noes 229; Majority 46.

Division List, Ayes and Noes .. 1490

Bill considered in Committee:—Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Employers' Liability for Injuries to Workmen Bill [Bill 145]

Order for Committee read .. 1494

Committee deferred till To-morrow.

North Sea Fisheries Bill [Bill 278]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) .. 1494

Question put, and agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

County Courts Consolidation and Amendment Bill [Lords]—

Order for Consideration, as amended, read .. 1495

Consideration deferred till Thursday next.

Official Secrets Bill [Bill 256]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Attorney General) .. 1495

After short debate, it being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned:—Debate to be resumed To-morrow.

National Debt (Supplemental) Bill [Bill 264]—SECOND READING

[ADJOURNED DEBATE]—

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [17th May], "That the Bill be now read a second time:"—Question again proposed:—Debate resumed .. 1496

Question put, and agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

COUNTY COURTS CONSOLIDATION AND AMENDMENT [SALARY]—

Matter considered in Committee .. 1496

Moved, "That it is expedient to authorize the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of a salary to any Registrar of a County Court, who may be required to give his whole time to the public service, under the provisions of any Act of the present Session to consolidate and amend the County Court Acts."

Question put, and agreed to:—Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

NATIONAL DEFENCE [REMUNERATION, &C.]—

Matter considered in Committee [Progress 4th June] .. 1497

Moved, "That it is expedient to authorize the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of remuneration to Railway Companies for receiving and forwarding traffic under the authority of a Secretary of State or the Admiralty, and of compensation to any person suffering loss for anything done under such authority, in pursuance of any Act of the present Session to make better provision respecting National Defence,"—(Mr Secretary Stanhope.)

Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Chairman left the Chair to report Progress; Committee to sit again To-morrow

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 7.]	Page
EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO WORKMEN [REMUNERATION]—
Considered in Committee	1498
Resolution agreed to ; to be reported To-morrow.

MOTION.

ULSTER CANAL AND TYRONE NAVIGATION BILL [Lords].—

Ordered, That the Parties appearing before the Select Committee on the Ulster Canal and Tyrone Navigation Bill [Lords] have leave to print the Minutes of Evidence taken before the Committee, day by day, from the Committee Clerk's Copy, if they think fit,—(Mr. Stansfeld.)

[12.15.]

LORDS, FRIDAY, JUNE 8.

Pharmacy Act (Ireland), 1875, Amendment Bill (No. 112).—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,"—(The Earl of Milltown) ..	1498
Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly, and referred to a Select Committee.
ROYAL PARKS AND PLEASURE GARDENS—THE ROEHAMPTON GATE OF RICHMOND PARK—Question, Lord Oranmore and Browne; Answer, Lord Henniker
	1500
CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887 — SENTENCE ON MR. CONDON, M.P.—Question, Observations, Lord Coleridge; Reply, The Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Lord Ashbourne :)—Short Debate thereon
	1501
AUSTRALIAN COLONIES—ADMISSION OF CHINESE IMMIGRANTS—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—
Moved , "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, for copies or extracts of correspondence between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Governors of the Australasian Colonies on the subject of the admission of Chinese immigrants to such Colonies,"—(The Earl of Carnarvon) 1509
Amendment moved ,
To add at the end of the Motion, the following words :—"And for a Return of all Acts passed by Colonial Legislatures affecting Chinese immigration,"—(The Earl of Dunraven.)
After debate, Amendment agreed to :—Then the original Motion, as amended, agreed to .
	[6.30.]

COMMONS, FRIDAY, JUNE 8.

QUESTIONS.

IMPERIAL AND COLONIAL DEFENCE—ADEN—Questions, Mr. Ernest Beckett, Mr. Lyell; Answers, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)
	1523
WAR OFFICE (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)—ALLEGED DEFECTIVE GUNS—Question, Lord Charles Beresford; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) 1523
NORTH AMERICAN FISHERIES—RIGHTS OF FISHING ON THE COASTS OF LABRADOR—Question, Mr. De Lisle; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Baron Henry de Worms)
	1524

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
POOR LAW (METROPOLIS) —GUARDIANS OF POPLAR PARISH—CASE OF F. BURGE—Question, Mr. Cunninghame Graham; Answer, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) ..	1525
THE NORTH SEA FISHERIES —SALE OF TOBACCO—Question, Sir Edward Birkbeck; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) ..	1525
POST OFFICE —COUNTRY POSTMEN—TICKET BOOK FOR POSTAL ORDERS—Question, Sir Edward Birkbeck; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	1526
THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) —MESSRS. OEOIL ROOHE AND HODDER, R.M.—SUB-COMMISSIONERS—Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1526
THE EXECUTIVE (IRELAND) —THE LORD LIEUTENANT—THE LORDS JUSTICES—Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1527
IRISH LAND COMMISSION —SUB-COMMISSIONS IN WESTMEATH—Question, Mr. Tuite; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1528
ADMIRALTY —PENSIONS—CASE OF JOHN M'CARTHY—Question, Mr. M'Cartan; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) ..	1528
THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY —REMOVAL OF PLACARDS AT ENNIS—Question, Mr. J. E. Redmond; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1529
HOUSE OF COMMONS —ADMISSION OF DYNAMITARDS TO THIS HOUSE—MR. LAFONE, M.P.—Question, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answer, Viscount Ebrington ..	1529
WAYS AND MEANS —THE FINANCIAL RESOLUTIONS—RELIEF OF LOCAL TAXATION (SCOTLAND)—Question, Mr. Buchanan; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) ..	1530
WAR OFFICE —H.R.H. THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE, COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF OF HER MAJESTY'S FORCES—Questions, Mr. E. Robertson; Answers, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	1531
METROPOLITAN POLICE —MISTAKEN ARREST OF DR. O'BRIEN—Question, Mr. Sydney Buxton; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	1532
COAL MINES, &c. REGULATION ACT, 1887 —THE AYRSHIRE COLLIERIES—THE SPECIAL RULES—Question, Mr. Cunninghame Graham; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	1532
PUBLIC MEETINGS —SPEECH OF THE CHIEF SECRETARY AT BATTERSEA—Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Edward Harrington; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1533
HOUSE OF COMMONS —ADMISSION OF DYNAMITARDS TO THIS HOUSE—EVIDENCE OF MR. MONRO, ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER OF POLICE—Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	1536
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL —ESTIMATE OF VALUE OF PUBLIC-HOUSE PROPERTY—Questions, Mr. Summers, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Mr. Conybeare; Answers, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie), Mr. Speaker ..	1537
ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACTS —REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION—Question, Viscount Cranborne; Answer, The Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) ..	1538
UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND) BILL —THE COMMISSIONERS—Questions, Mr. Hunter, Mr. E. Robertson; Answers, The Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) ..	1538
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND) —THE AFFRAY AT MITCHELSTOWN IN SEPTEMBER LAST—THE OFFICIAL SHORTHAND WRITER'S NOTES—Question, Mr. W. O'Brien; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1539

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 8.]	Page
IRISH LAND COMMISSION—APPLICATION FOR FAIR RENTS, CO. ANTRIM— Question, Mr. M'Cartan; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1539
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—THE BALLYMENA BOARD OF GUARDIANS—Question, Mr. M'Cartan; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1540
MERCHANT SHIPPING—SIGNALLING AT SEA—INTERNATIONAL CODE OF SIGNALS—Question, Mr. Channing; Answer, The President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach)	1540
LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—IMPRISONMENT OF MRS. DAVIES FOR CONTEMPT OF COURT—Question, Mr. Conybeare; An- swer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1541
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BALLINASLOE BOARD OF GUARDIANS—COLONEL CALEB ROBERTSON—Questions, Mr. T. M. Healy; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1543
LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—ALLEGED INSURANCE FRAUDS AT BELFAST— Question, Mr. M'Cartan; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews)	1543
AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL—LEGISLATION—Ques- tion, Sir Edward Birkbeck; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1544
BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—TITHE RENTCHARGE BILLS—Question, Mr. Stanley Leighton; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1545
AUSTRALIA—NEW SOUTH WALES—CHINESE IMMIGRANTS—Question, Mr. Henniker Heaton; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Baron Henry de Worme)	1545
IRELAND—THE BANN, BARROW, AND SHANNON DRAINAGE BILLS—LEGISLA- TION—Questions, Mr. W. A. Macdonald; Answers, The Chief Secre- tary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1545
SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—THE SCOTCH EDUCATION VOTES— Question, Mr. Macdonald Cameron; Answer, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1546

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Local Government (England and Wales) Bill [Bill 182]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 7th June] [SECOND NIGHT] .. 1547

After long time spent therein, it being after Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to report Progress at Nine of the clock :—
Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

It being after Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

WAYS AND MEANS—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair :"—

UNCOVENANTED CIVIL SERVICE OF INDIA—RESOLUTION—

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is inequitable and anomalous that privileges as regards leave and retirement should be refused to some classes of Officers in the Uncovenanted Civil Service of India which are enjoyed by others in similar circumstances; and that, in view of the heavy fall in the value of the rupee, the payment

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 8.]	Page
UNCovenanted CIVIL SERVICE OF INDIA— continued .
of pensions of retired European Uncovenanted Officers in England at the official rate of exchange is no longer equitable,"—(Mr. King),—instead thereof	.. 1601
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—After debate, Question put :—The House divided ; Ayes 166, Noes 55 ; Majority 111.—(Div. List , No. 135.)
Main Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair :"—
ARMY (INDIA)—GRIEVANCES OF THE OFFICERS ON THE GENERAL LIST — Observations, Sir Roper Lethbridge ; Reply, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) 1643
After short debate, Main Question, by leave, withdrawn :—WAYS AND MEANS—Committee upon Monday next.
EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1882 — SCHEMES OF THE COMMISSIONERS—Observations, Mr. H. F. H. Elliot 1652
NATIONAL DEFENCE [REMUNERATION, &c.]—
Order for Committee read 1652
Committee deferred till Monday next.

MOTION.

—o—

Local Government Provisional Order (No. 13) Bill — Ordered (Mr. Long , Mr. Ritchie) ; presented , and read the first time [Bill 287] 1653
---	------------

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES) (SPECIAL REPORT)—
Ordered, That the Committee of Selection have leave to make a Special Report 1653
Ordered, That the Report do lie upon the Table.
It being One of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House, without Question put, till Monday next.

LORDS, MONDAY, JUNE 11.

ELECTIONS (INTERVENTION OF PEERS, &c.) — MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE—
Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to consider the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons appointed 'To consider the Sessional Order with reference to the intervention of Peers and Prelates in Parliamentary Elections' which has been communicated to this House,"—(The Earl of Milltown)	.. 1654
After short debate, Motion agreed to .
REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS—LEGISLATION—Question, Observations, Lord Aberdare, Lord Norton ; Reply, Earl Brownlow	.. 1660
METROPOLIS—INSPECTION OF THEATRES AND MUSIC HALLS—Observations, The Earl of Strafford ; Reply, Earl Brownlow 1666
IMPERIAL DEFENCES—DEFENCES AT VANCOUVER'S ISLAND—Observations, Lord Sudeley ; Reply, Lord Elphinstone :—Short Debate thereon	.. 1667
RULES OF DEBATE IN THIS HOUSE—PRECEDENCE OF SPEAKERS—Question, Observations, Earl Granville ; Reply, The Lord Chancellor (Lord Halsbury) 1680

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
[June 11.]
Oyster and Mussel Fisheries (West Loch Tarbert) Order Confirmation Bill [H.L.]— Presented (The Duke of Buckingham and Chandos, for The Lord Ker [M. Lothian]); Then it was moved that the Sessional Order of the 6th of March last, "That no Bill originating in this House confirming any Provisional Order or Provisional Certificate shall be read a first time after Friday the 11th day of May next," be dispensed with in respect of the said Bill, and that the Bill be now read 1st; agreed to : Bill read 1st, and referred to the Examiners (No. 145) ..	1681
Pharmacy Act (Ireland), 1875, Amendment Bill [H.L.]— Select Committee nominated :—List of the Committee ..	1681
	[7.0.]

COMMONS, MONDAY, JUNE 11.

QUESTIONS.

UNITED STATES—THE INTER-STATE COMMERCE COMMISSIONERS—Question, Sir Richard Paget; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) ..	1682
WAR OFFICE—SALE OF WHITWORTH'S STEEL INGOTS TO FRANCE—Questions, Captain Cotton; Answers, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	1682
DEFENCES OF THE EMPIRE—THE ARMAMENT OF THE SPITHEAD FORTS—Question, Captain Cotton; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	1683
METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS—THE PICCADILLY CIRCUS—Question, Mr. F. W. Maclean; Answer, Mr. Tatton Egerton ..	1683
MERCANTILE MARINE—THE "BEN CRUACHEN" AT SUNDERLAND—Question, Mr. Broadhurst; Answer, The President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) ..	1684
HORSEBREEDING, &C. (IRELAND)—THE GRANT OF £5,000—Question, Mr. Johnston; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1685
WORKING CLASSES—SELF-CONTAINED "INDUSTRIAL DWELLINGS"—Question, Mr. Dixon; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) ..	1685
PRISONS (IRELAND)—VISITING COMMITTEE OF THE DERRY PRISON—Question, Mr. Justin M'Carthy; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) ..	1686
WAR OFFICE—DISCLOSURE OF OFFICIAL SECRETS—JOHN HYLAND, MILITARY STAFF CLERK, WOOLWICH—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	1687
WAR OFFICE—DISCLOSURE OF OFFICIAL SECRETS—JOHN CHAPMAN, MASTER GUNNER, CEYLON—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) ..	1688
POST OFFICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—PRIVATE TELEPHONE—Question, Mr. Montagu; Answer, The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) ..	1688
WAR OFFICE—THE CANTEN—Question, Mr. Labouchere; Answer, The Financial Secretary, War Department (Mr. Brodrick) ..	1659
CRIMINAL LAW—SENTENCE ON ALICE DURRANT AT LIVERPOOL—Question, Mr. Neville; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) ..	1690
METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS—WIDENING OF BOND STREET—Question, Mr. Cochrane-Baillie; Answer, Mr. Tatton Egerton ..	1690
METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS—ACCESS TO HYDE PARK—Question, Mr. Cochrane-Baillie; Answer, Mr. Tatton Egerton ..	1691

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 12.]

Page

WAR OFFICE—HYPOTHETICAL INVASION OF THIS COUNTRY—Question, Mr. Hanbury; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	1830
WAR OFFICE—ARMY AGENTS—Question, Mr. Hanbury; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) 1831
CHARITY COMMISSIONERS—THE LICHFIELD CHARITIES—Question, Sir John Swinburne; Answer, Mr. J. W. Lowther 1831
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—WITHDRAWAL OF THE LICENSING CLAUSES—Statement, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie); Observations, Mr. J. C. Stevenson, Mr. Stansfeld 1832
PUBLIC BUSINESS—THE BANN, BARROW, AND SHANNON DRAINAGE BILLS—Question, Mr. T. W. Russell; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) 1834
THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY TO THE LORD LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND BILL—Question, Mr. John Morley; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) 1834

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Local Government (England and Wales) Bill [Bill 182]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 11th June] [FOURTH NIGHT] .. 1834

After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

WAYS AND MEANS

WAYS AND MEANS	} Resolutions [June 11] reported, and agreed to:—Bill ordered (Mr. Courtney, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Jackson); presented, and read the first time [Bill 293] 1898
Customs (Wine Duty) Bill

It being a quarter of an hour before Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MOTION.

—0—

RE-ORGANIZATIONS IN PUBLIC OFFICES—RESOLUTION—

Moved, "That the re-organizations in the Accountant General's and Secretary's Departments of the Admiralty have been injurious to the public interests, by resulting in increased charges for those Departments, and by needlessly adding to extravagant pensions and bonuses; and that in any further re-organizations, officials who are still able and willing to render service for the public money shall be provided with employment in other Departments, instead of being forced to become useless burdens upon the country,"—(Mr. Jennings) 1898

After debate, Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, whilst of opinion that when the re-organization of a Department becomes necessary, full inquiry should be made into the wants of other Departments with a view to the continued public employment of redundant officers, is not prepared, pending the inquiry of the Royal Commission upon Civil Service Establishments, to anticipate its report by laying down any absolute rule as to the provision of employment for persons not required in the Department to which they have been originally appointed"—(Lord George Hamilton.)

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
ARMY (IRELAND)—REFUSING TO BILLET SOLDIERS—Questions, Dr. Tanner; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1707
CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—CONVICTIONS FOR CONSPIRACY—THE EVIDENCE—Questions, Mr. W. E. Gladstone, Mr. Clancy; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1708
CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—REFUSAL TO GIVE EVIDENCE—Question, Mr. Shaw Lefevre; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1709
AFRICA—CAPE COAST—MUNICIPAL INSTITUTIONS, &c.—Question, Mr. Conybeare; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Baron Henry de Worms)	1710
INDIA—THIBET—THE “FORWARD” POLICY—Question, Mr. Schwann; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst)	1711
ADMIRALTY—GRATUITIES TO FAMILY OF JOHN M'CARTHY—Question, Mr. Flynn; Answer, The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton)	1711
IRISH LAND COMMISSION—APPLICATIONS FOR FAIR RENTS, CO. ANTRIM—Question, Mr. M'Cartan; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1712
LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—CASE OF MRS. DAVIS, A PRISONER FOR CONTEMPT, AND OTHERS—Questions, Mr. Conybeare; Answers, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1712
LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—THE LATE REGISTRAR OF THE WOLVERHAMPTON COUNTY COURT—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster)	1713
LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—THE LATE REGISTRAR OF THE DUDLEY COUNTY COURT—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster)	1714
FOOD SUPPLY—SALE OF FOREIGN MEAT AS ENGLISH—Question, Colonel Eyre; Answer, The Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster)	1715
PUBLIC TRUSTEE AND EXECUTOR—LEGISLATION—Questions, Mr. Howard Vincent, Mr. Hanbury, Mr. Shaw Lefevre; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1715
PUBLIC BUSINESS—THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—SUSPENSION OF THE STANDING ORDERS—Questions, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Mr. Summers, Mr. Caine; Answers, The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith)	1716
CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE AFFRAY AT MITCHELSTOWN IN SEPTEMBER LAST—Question, Mr. W. E. Gladstone; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1717

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Local Government (England and Wales) Bill [Bill 182]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 8th June] [THIRD NIGHT]	1718
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.
WAYS AND MEANS—
Considered in Committee	1801
(1.) Resolved, That instead of the Duties on Wine imposed by “The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888,” there shall on Wine imported in bottle be charged and paid, from and after the date of the passing of an Act embodying this Resolution, the Duty following, that is to say:—	s. d.
Sparkling Wine, imported in bottle, the gallon	2 6
This Duty is to be paid in addition to the Duty in respect of alcoholic strength under “The Customs Amendment Act, 1886.”

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 11.]

Page

WAYS AND MEANS—Committee—continued.

(2.) Resolved, That it is expedient to make provision for levying Customs Duties on Wine in bottle.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock; Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

National Debt (Supplemental) Bill [Bill 264]—

Bill considered in Committee 1804

Moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again:"—It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House:—Committee report Progress.

Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into Committee on the Bill:—Bill considered in Committee:—Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Amendment Bill

[Bill 131]—SECOND READING [ADJOURNED DEBATE]—

Moved, "That the Debate be further adjourned till Monday next,"—(Mr. A. J. Balfour) .. 1805

Question, put, and agreed to:—Debate further adjourned till Monday next.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) (LAND COMMISSION) [REMUNERATION]—

Order for Committee read:—Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"—(Mr. A. J. Balfour) .. 1805

Question put, and negatived:—Committee thereupon deferred till Monday next.

Electric Lighting Act (1882) Amendment Bill [Lords] [Bill 233]

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 31st May] .. 1806

Bill reported, with an Amendment; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday.

Intermediate Education (Wales) Bill [Bill 61]—

Order for Second Reading read 1806

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON TRADE, SHIPPING, AND MANUFACTURES—

Ordered, That the Standing Committee on Trade, Shipping, and Manufactures have leave to print and circulate with the Votes the Minutes of their Proceedings from day to day,—(Sir Matthew White Ridley.)

Ordered, That the Standing Committee on Trade, Shipping, and Manufactures have leave to print and circulate with the Votes any amended Clauses of Bills committed to them from time to time,—(Sir Matthew White Ridley.) [12.30.]

LORDS, TUESDAY, JUNE 12.

Clergy Discipline Bill (No. 118)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^d,"—(The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury) 1807

After debate, on Question? Resolved in the affirmative; Bill read 3^d accordingly; Amendments made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons; and to be printed, as amended. (No. 147.)

TABLE OF CONTENTS

[June 12.]	Page
Quarter Sessions Bill (No. 37)—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,"—(The Lord Chancellor)	.. 1818
Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly.
CHURCH DISCIPLINE—THE REV. MR. DALE, OF CHISWICK — Question, Viscount Powerscourt; Answer, The Bishop of London	.. 1818
PRIVATE BILLS AND PROVISIONAL ORDERS—
Return (The Lord Monk-Bretton) 1820
	[6.45.]

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JUNE 12.

QUESTIONS.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—INTERFERENCE AT NEWTOWNARDS—Question, Mr. Dillon; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) 1821
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (SCOTLAND)—APPOINTMENT OF JUNIOR INSPECTOR OF SCHOOLS—Question, Mr. Wallace; Answer, The Solicitor General for Scotland (Mr. J. P. B. Robertson) 1822
NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES—THE ARRANGEMENT WITH FRANCE IN 1886—Questions, Mr. Samuelson; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) 1823
WAR OFFICE—THE SCOTS FUSILIERS AT PORTUMNA—Question, Mr. Harris; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) 1824
LABOURERS' COTTAGES (IRELAND)—THE KILLARNEY BOARD OF GUARDIANS—Question, Mr. Sheehan; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) 1824
LICENSING ACT (IRELAND)—CONVICTIONS AT MACROOM PETTY SESSIONS—Question, Dr. Tanner; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) 1824
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—DEFALCATIONS IN THE BALLYMENA UNION—Question, Dr. Tanner; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) 1825
WAR OFFICE (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE VOLUNTEERS—THE LONDON IRISH RIFLES—TRAINING AS DRIVERS, &c.—Question, Mr. O. V. Morgan; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) 1826
AFRICA (WEST COAST)—OPOBO—KING JA JA—Questions, Mr. Picton, Mr. W. Redmond; Answers, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) 1827
METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS—THE BLACKWALL TUNNEL—Question, Sir John Colomb; Answer, Mr. Tatton Egerton 1827
HOSPITAL SUNDAY (METROPOLIS)—COLLECTIONS IN THE PARKS AND OPEN SPACES—Questions, Mr. Bradlaugh, Mr. James Stuart; Answers, Mr. Tatton Egerton, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) 1828
THE TRUCK ACTS—THE RHYMNEY IRON COMPANY—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) 1829
NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—SCHOOL TEACHERS' RESIDENCES—Question, Mr. Tuite; Answer, The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) 1829
EGYPT—THE MINISTRY—RETIREMENT OF NUBAR PASHA—Question, Mr. John Morley; Answer, The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) 1830

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
WAR OFFICE—HYPOTHETICAL INVASION OF THIS COUNTRY—Question, Mr. Hanbury; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	1830
WAR OFFICE—ARMY AGENTS—Question, Mr. Hanbury; Answer, The Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)	1831
CHARITY COMMISSIONERS—THE LICHFIELD CHARITIES—Question, Sir John Swinburne; Answer, Mr. J. W. Lowther	1831
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—WITHDRAWAL OF THE LICENSING CLAUSES—Statement, The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie); Observations, Mr. J. C. Stevenson, Mr. Stansfeld	1832
PUBLIC BUSINESS—THE BANN, BARROW, AND SHANNON DRAINAGE BILLS—Question, Mr. T. W. Russell; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1834
THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY TO THE LORD LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND BILL—Question, Mr. John Morley; Answer, The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)	1834

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Local Government (England and Wales) Bill [Bill 182]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 11th June] [FOURTH NIGHT] .. 1834

After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

WAYS AND MEANS

Customs (Wine Duty) Bill } Resolutions [June 11] reported, and agreed to:—Bill ordered (Mr. Courtney, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Jackson); presented, and read the first time [Bill 293] .. 1898

It being a quarter of an hour before Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MOTION.

RE-ORGANIZATIONS IN PUBLIC OFFICES—RESOLUTION—

Moved, "That the re-organizations in the Accountant General's and Secretary's Departments of the Admiralty have been injurious to the public interests, by resulting in increased charges for those Departments, and by needlessly adding to extravagant pensions and bonuses; and that in any further re-organizations, officials who are still able and willing to render service for the public money shall be provided with employment in other Departments, instead of being forced to become useless burdens upon the country,"—(Mr. Jennings) .. 1898

After debate, Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, whilst of opinion that when the re-organization of a Department becomes necessary, full inquiry should be made into the wants of other Departments with a view to the continued public employment of redundant officers, is not prepared, pending the inquiry of the Royal Commission upon Civil Service Establishments, to anticipate its report by laying down any absolute rule as to the provision of employment for persons not required in the Department to which they have been originally appointed,"—(Lord George Hamilton.)

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 12.]

Page

RE-ORGANIZATIONS IN PUBLIC OFFICES—continued.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—After further short debate, Moved, "That the Question be now put,"—(Mr. James Stuart :)—Question put, and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—The House divided; Ayes 113, Noes 91; Majority 19.

Division List, Ayes and Noes 1945

Main Question put, and agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

Victoria University Bill [Bill 198]—

Bill, as amended, considered 1947

Bill to be read the third time upon Monday next.

Oaths Bill [Bill 7]—

Bill considered in Committee 1947

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

Accumulations Bill [Bill 55]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Cosens-Hardy) 1948

After short debate, Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday 20th June.

Trawling (Scotland) Bill [Bill 155]—SECOND READING [ADJOURNED DEBATE]—

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [8th March],

"That the Bill be now read a second time :"—Question again proposed :—Debate resumed 1953

After short debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Mark Stewart :)—Question put :—The House divided; Ayes 87, Noes 53; Majority 34.—(Div. List, No. 145.)

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

MOTIONS.

—o—

Public Libraries Act (1855) Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. Herbert Gardner, Mr. Sydney Buxton, Mr. Arthur Acland, Sir Lewis Pelly) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 292] 1958

CORN AVERAGES—

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the present system of ascertaining the official average price of Corn in the United Kingdom, and to report what alterations, if any, are expedient,"—(Mr. Jasper More.)

It being One of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

L O R D S .

—o—

SAT FIRST.

TUESDAY, JUNE 5.

The Lord St. John of Bletso, after the death of his brother.

THURSDAY, JUNE 7.

The Lord Berwick, after the death of his uncle.

MONDAY, JUNE 11.

The Lord De Tabley, after the death of his father.

—————

C O M M O N S .

—o—

NEW WRIT ISSUED.

TUESDAY, MAY 15.

For Southampton Borough, v. Admiral Sir John Edmund Commerell, V.C., G.C.B., Chiltern Hundreds.

MONDAY, JUNE 4.

For Ayr District of Burghs, v. Richard Frederick Fotheringham Campbell, esquire, deceased.

NEW MEMBERS SWORN.

MONDAY, JUNE 4.

Dublin City (St. Stephen's Green Division)—Thomas Alexander Dickson, esquire.

Southampton Borough—Francis Henry Evans, esquire.

quired the presence of the Bishop and his assessors in a Court which was to try the matter of fact whether the moral offence charged had been committed. The sentencing in the graver cases was still reserved to the Bishop. The third change was that the function of the Commissioners, now called assessors, would be limited to trying questions of fact. It had been objected to the original measure that it would entail the disadvantages of having two additional trials; but he could not understand how the procedure laid down by the Bill could have been so greatly misinterpreted. It had provided that there should be an appeal to the Provincial Court and again to the Judicial Committee on the sentence and on points of law, but not on the verdict on the facts. The appeal against "sentence," which could only mean appeal against amount of punishment, had been misinterpreted, as if it meant appeal against verdict. There could not have been any such thing under the Bill as two trials of question of fact. It would be for the Court, not for the Bishop, to grant a re-hearing on special prescribed grounds only. But one re-hearing of facts by the same Court would be preserved, if, for example, new evidence were produced. By the adoption of the system of assessors they at once secured any advantage of the old commission of inquiry, saved expense, and got rid of other objections. The reduction in the expense would be a substantial one, seeing that the witnesses would be examined on the spot, and only once. The cost of appeal upon questions of fact, which was the great source of expense under the present system, would no longer have to be incurred by either party. He knew of one recent case in which the cost of the trial had been about £300, and the cost of the appeal was thrice that sum. Moreover, when a case was sent, as now, direct to the provincial Court, it involved the discrimination of facts, and not of law only, by the single man. Decisions of fact by one mind, however capable, were unsatisfactory, and were increasingly felt to be so. Nevertheless, if both parties consented, there could be no objection to a case going to the provincial Court, and this was accordingly left possible. The expenses of a hearing under this Bill could scarcely exceed those of the present commission alone. Again, the Bill provided for a scale of costs, and yet again for the taxation of costs. On the whole, therefore, the costs entailed by the proposed procedure under the Bill would be far less than they were under the existing system. He begged to move that the Bill be re-committed.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee upon the said Bill."—(The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.)

LORD COLERIDGE, in moving that the House resolve itself into Committee that day six months, said, he did not know that it was necessary for him to apologize to the House for having taken in this case a step which he had never before taken during the 15 years he had had the honour of having a seat in that House, and he should not have taken the step of moving the rejection of this measure unless he thought that the Bill involved a most objectionable and mischievous principle, which was not only objectionable in theory but was bad in the interests of order, of justice, and of religion. He did not deny that there were many things in the present Church Discipline Act that ought to be amended, and any proposal to amend them in the right way would meet with his hearty concurrence. The objection he felt to this Bill was that it exempted particular classes of persons from the ordinary operation of the law. In former days, no doubt, the supremacy of the Crown was maintained and defended by ecclesiastics as part of the attributes of the Sovereign. In the days of the Tudor and Stuart Monarchs ecclesiastics were much in the habit of defending and justifying the most execrable tyranny in the name of religion and of "making gods of Kings." That kind of supremacy had disappeared, and in its place was now recognized the supremacy of the State and of Parliament. The law of the Church was the law of the land; but under the Bill, if it became law, no offender against that law, however extreme and grave the offence he had committed—whether adultery, drunkenness, or profligacy—could be brought to justice unless the Bishop thought that he ought. According to the Bill, after persons had been brought to justice and sentence had been pronounced by the Court, it rested with the Bishop whether or not that sentence could be carried order to enable the Commander-in-Chief to answer the article satisfactorily, mention one or two of its most salient statements. The article then proceeds to say—

“Owing to the deplorable neglect of Parliament and the mischievous system adopted by successive Ministries in deliberately hiding the truth from the people, it has at last to be sorrowfully acknowledged that we are wholly unprepared for war, if not, indeed, at the mercy of any European enemy, unless immediate and energetic steps are taken to put the kingdom and the Empire into a state of security. The strength of our Army is insufficient; more men are instantly required. If the men were enlisted to-morrow, barrack accommodation for them does not exist. The country is in the shameful position of having many of its artillery batteries in possession of the worst guns served out to any army of the present day. In the service it is true that we possess a gun which is unsurpassed, but we have no means of manufacturing this arm except after much delay. We are said to have the best magazine rifle which has yet been invented, but up to the present moment not one single regiment in the Army is provided with this weapon. Army stores are lamentably insufficient. . . . At this moment there is not, it is authoritatively stated, in any one of our land fortresses, from Portland Bill to the Tweed, a modern breech-loading gun. The latest type actually in use is the seven-inch Armstrong. The guns served out to the Volunteers are obsolete; the armaments of the forts are obsolete; the piles of shot and shell at Woolwich are for the most part obsolete.”

I do not, my Lords, propose to make any comment on these statements. These allegations are most serious. At this moment the country takes great interest in the question of the national defences; and I have thought it my duty to take the earliest occasion of giving the illustrious Duke an opportunity of expressing in this House, the only way in which he can do so, his opinion on these subjects. I venture, therefore, to ask him whether, as stated in this newspaper, these facts are indisputable, and what foundation, if any, there is for these very serious allegations.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, I rejoice that my noble Friend the noble Viscount has put to me this Question. I do not suppose that anyone in this House, or anyone out of it, could have been more astonished than I was this morning when, on opening The Daily Telegraph, I observed this extraordinary sensational article; and I asked myself whether anything could possibly have emanated from me to call for anything so extraordinary and so sensational. I can only say that I have reason to believe that “the highest Military Authority,” which I admit that, up to this moment, I believed I was, is intended for somebody else. Well, of course, on that I can give no opinion; but, so far as I am concerned, I can hardly suppose that anyone should have imagined that this article could have been ascribed to me or that such sensational remarks should have appeared on so important a subject. The question referred to in that article has been a good deal before the public; and I have given very decided evidence, no doubt, before a Committee in “another place” on the general condition of things connected with the Army. To those statements I adhere; but I do not believe that my noble Friend or any of your Lordships will expect me to go into any details of that sort at the present time. I will only say that the circumstances are such that these questions are well worthy of the fullest and most anxious consideration of Her Majesty’s Government and of this House and of the country. But as to probable danger, imminent danger, or anything of that sort, I, for my part, cannot be a party to any such words. But I believe that Her Majesty’s Government are as fully alive as I am to the present condition of things. I have not the slightest doubt that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the Members of the Cabinet are considering all the evidence which has been brought before the various Committees now sitting; and I have no doubt that the result will be such as will at the same time be satisfactory to the country and agreeable to those who, like myself, take a warm interest in the naval and military position of the country. I cannot for one moment deny that this is a very grave and important matter; but I certainly have had nothing whatever to do with the sensational article which has appeared to-day, and I absolutely and entirely repudiate it.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I am sure your Lordships must have heard with great satisfaction the statement of the illustrious Duke and his opinions on this important question. I can only say that I am glad to find that “the highest Military Authority” is not the illustrious Duke, and jury or assessors, and the powers given to the Bishop. These were matters which must be discussed in Committee if the Bill went into Committee. There was, however, one question upon which he would like to say a few strong words. Unless he had misunderstood, there was, save in the particular circumstances referred to in the 7th section, absolutely no appeal whatever in matters of fact. He trusted that the House would not pass a Bill which contained a principle so alien from the present law, so perilous and unjust to persons whose characters and reputations might be vitally affected. He remembered an appeal from a judgment which, if this Bill had been law, would have been final, in which the most telling argument for the appellant was the reading of the judgment appealed from, so wrong-headed, absurd, and monstrous was that judgment. To leave the Bill as it was in this respect would make it a most unjust and oppressive measure. If he had said a word disrespectful or improper of those from whom it was his painful duty to differ, he asked their pardon. He stood there for law against personal will, and wished to see the clergy made, like other subjects of the Queen, obedient to the law, and he earnestly hoped that the discipline of the ancient and glorious Church of England, which undoubtedly was not perfect, would not be made any worse by the passing of this Bill. He begged to move that the House resolve itself into Committee on this day six months.

Viscount Hardinge

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now"), and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months").—(The Lord Coleridge.)

THE EARL OF SELBORNE said, that he was placed in some difficulty in dealing with the speech of his noble and learned Friend, who, both personally and by the office which he held, was entitled to great respect whenever he addressed the House on any question, particularly one relating to law. Undoubtedly it was competent for any noble Lord to take the course taken by his noble and learned Friend, though it was not usual when a matter had received any amount of deliberate consideration at the time of the second reading. He should be most unwilling, in a case of this kind, to reject at this stage a Bill promoted by the most rev. Prelate. But he acknowledged that, if his noble and learned Friend had stated good grounds for reconsidering the decision on the second reading, he had given good reason why he was not present on that occasion to move the rejection of the Bill. But had his noble and learned Friend really stated grounds which would go to the rejection of the Bill if the House were now on the second reading? He had made a speech very able and interesting, which contained much matter deserving of serious attention. But a large part of the speech had been addressed to matters which were not within the Bill and were not germane to the question whether it should be permitted to proceed. The Bill was one for providing a more satisfactory mode of trial in particular cases, cases of immorality or neglect of duty by clerks, which for certain reasons, good or bad, it had been thought right to separate from the trial of questions of doctrine and ritual. One objection of his noble and learned Friend was that this separation had been made. But the object itself was one which it was most desirable to attain. There could be no better proof of the intolerable cost which might be involved in the present mode of proceeding than the instances given by his noble and learned Friend, in which the costs of one suit had reached the figure of £14,000. Some of their Lordships might probably be familiar with other cases in which the cost had been enormous. What was his noble and learned Friend's objection to the principle of the Bill? It was that it was an attack, either open or covert, upon the supremacy of the Crown, of which his noble and learned Friend had given a just and happy definition. He had always thought that all mystification about the supremacy of the Crown, as distinguished from the supremacy of the law, was under a Constitutional system of Government unreal and absurd. He agreed with his noble and learned Friend that the supremacy of the law ought at all hazards to be maintained, and if the Bill had attacked that supremacy he should think it a most serious objection. If there was any such attack in the Bill as it stood, it was certainly covert and not open. In fact, so far as the supremacy involved anything in the nature of that panic-producing speeches should be made at public dinners by public men. The Adjutant-General is a Member of this House. If he thinks his duty forces him to make such statements as these, let him come down here and make them, and we will answer them. What would be thought of any man in the Army lower in rank than the Adjutant-General who wrote to the newspapers in the tone of the Adjutant-General? What is to be thought of the Adjutant-General who speaks in that tone of the Government? If the Adjutant-General thinks it worth his while, we have our case; we have something to say for ourselves; we can defend ourselves if we are attacked. But the attack is made where we cannot defend ourselves instead of here, the Forum which is open to him—your Lordships' House.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) ELECTORS BILL.

BROUGHT FROM THE COMMONS.

Bill read 1^a. (No. 103.)

LORD BALFOUR gave Notice that he proposed to fix the second reading for Monday.

THE EARL OF JERSEY said, that by this Bill, for the first time, persons who held property on which the rates were to be levied, would not have the opportunity of deciding who should cause those rates to be levied. He thought some opportunity should be given to their Lordships to consider Amendments to this Bill, and therefore he hoped the noble Lord would be able to allow some time to elapse so that Amendments might be placed on the Paper.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY) said, there was a difficulty in the way of his noble Friend's proposal, because if this Bill did not come into operation early in June he was afraid the year would be lost. If the noble Lord would put his Amendments on the Paper on Monday, the Government would be able consider them on Tuesday.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY said, he might point out that Monday was fixed for the Committee stage of the Scotch University Bill, which would certainly take the whole of that sitting. He was only expressing the wish of a number of Peers interested in Scotch business when he asked to be told whether that Bill was coming on on Monday or not. It still remained on the Paper, but none or only one of the Amendments was printed, and he could not conceive that it was the intention of the Secretary for Scotland to proceed with it on Monday. Great public convenience would result if their Lordships were told what was to be done, and it would have been a still better public convenience if they had been told earlier.

LORD BALFOUR said, the Secretary for Scotland was not in his place at present; but he had seen his noble Friend a short time ago, and was told that he had abandoned the idea of taking the Committee stage of the Scotch University Bill on Monday. In all probability it would not come on before the Whitsuntide Recess.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY suggested that perhaps if the Secretary for Scotland attended their Lordships' House that afternoon, he would so far inconvenience himself as to make some public announcement.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY asked, whether it was the intention of the Government to go into Committee on Tuesday if the Bill passed the second reading on Monday?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, it was the wish of the Government unless there was any important Amendment.

Bill to be read 2^a on Monday next.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE BILL.—(No. 83.)

(The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.)

COMMITTEE (ON RE-COMMITMENT).

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee (on Re-commitment), read.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, in moving that the House do now resolve itself into Committee, said, he desired to make a short statement as to the changes made in the measure. In the first place, the Bill was now strictly limited to the neglect of duty and offences against morality. What-ever appeared, even indirectly, to go beyond those matters had been struck out of the Bill. The second change which had been made in its provisions was the omission of the one which re-

The Marquess of Salisbury

If a sentence of suspension, or anything less, were passed by the Court, the Bishop could not overrule it. It was, no doubt, quite true that a more severe sentence, such as a sentence of deprivation, was to be passed in the Bishop's Court, by the Bishop himself, and not by his Chancellor, though in the provincial Court it might be passed by the Official Principal of the Archbishop. This, whatever might be the reason, was now, and had been for above 200 years, if not always, the settled law and usages in such cases. It had been recognized by such Judges as Lord Stowell and Sir John Nicholl. What the Bill provided was strictly agreeable to that law and usage. If the Court considered that the case required a sentence in excess of suspension, the Court would remit the case to the Bishop for sentence, with an intimation of their opinion, and with their finding of fact and the evidence. The Bishop in such case would exercise his judgment, and pass, or not pass, a sentence of deprivation. His noble and learned Friend had said it was a great hardship that there was to be no appeal on the question of fact. He hoped that their Lordships would not forget what the state of our Criminal Law was. If a man was found guilty by a jury of murder or any less crime, which might materially affect his position, his person, or his character, there was no appeal except on a matter of law. There might, no doubt, be recourse to the Prerogative of Mercy vested in the Crown; and this Bill recognized that Prerogative, to say nothing of any other power of mitigating punishment that might exist. But they had not at present, in ordinary criminal cases, any Court of Appeal on the facts. It was a much disputed question whether they ought or ought not to have one; and the difficulties were so great that no one seemed to have been able to overcome them up to the present time. And as to any other question of fact tried, in a civil case, before a jury, there was not any appeal in the proper sense of the word. There must be an application for a new trial, which must be based on a special ground, either some matter of law, or that the verdict was against the weight of evidence; and it was not the disposition of the Courts to overturn verdicts simply because the Court from which the new trial was asked might have come to a different conclusion from that which the jury had arrived at. This Bill would allow a re-hearing of the question of fact, if the Court were satisfied that there were special grounds for granting what would, in substance, be a new trial; and, although it was true that, in these ecclesiastical cases, there was at present a general right of appeal upon the facts, it was productive of great, and often very unnecessary, expense, and he thought the re-hearing, on special grounds only, much better. His noble and learned Friend had touched upon some other points which he humbly thought were outside the Bill, and not germane to the present measure. He had asked why the Bill was confined to morals and neglect of duty. Some good reasons might, he thought, be given for that. The necessity of dealing with that class of questions was a matter about which people in general were quite agreed; and if the Bill was good in itself it might be fairly hoped that it would pass through both Houses of Parliament without encountering those difficulties and storms which arose out of popular animosities connected with parties in the Church. Again, Parliament in 1874 had thought fit to deal separately and specifically with questions of ritual, and had provided a special and peculiar machinery for that particular class of cases. They might think, and think rightly, that questions of doctrine were of enormous importance; they would, on the other hand, probably be equally convinced of the difficulties of raising them judicially. Everyone would probably agree that the existing limits of liberty in the Church of England, on the one side or on the other, ought not to be curtailed; and, therefore, there would be no great disposition to facilitate procedure in that particular class of cases which related to doctrine. Whether that ought to be so or not he did not say. With regard to what his noble and learned Friend had said about the Judicial Committee, nobody knew better than his noble and learned Friend did that they were not over-manned with respect to judicial strength, and that it was convenient to make some arrangement as to who should attend in one Court and who in another. He did not believe that arrangements of that kind had ever been made, or proposed to be

into effect. What would be thought if corruption among lawyers was to be punished by an Act which should enable any Judge upon the Bench to shield from the operation of the law any practitioner who was made the subject of attack? Yet that was practically what was done by this Bill as regarded the Church. It might be said that persons in the condition of Bishops might be trusted to exercise properly the power entrusted to them. But Bishops, like other classes of men, were not exempt from human failings. He might say that he knew of one case where, if this Bill had been law, no proceedings whatever would have been taken against a person who dared not face the horrible charges brought against him. It should be remembered that this Bill was directed against moral offences only; but to exempt any class of persons from the consequences of their crimes was to violate the first principles of justice. It was undoubted that questions of doctrine and ritual were the most important to the Church at the present time, and the greater part of the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Courts consisted of that class of cases. Why were those questions not brought within the Bill? Was it that the present procedure with respect to doctrine and ritual was satisfactory? He could not think so; but if it were satisfactory, why change the tribunal in respect of morals? If it were not satisfactory in the case of morals, why should not the change also be made in regard to doctrine? He could state a few facts from which everyone might form his own judgment. A great number of suits had been instituted on points of doctrine and ritual. The expenses of those suits had been enormous. In one case the expenses on one side alone amounted to £3,000. The judgments were, in many cases, unsatisfactory, and, moreover, they were evaded oftentimes upon pleas which were purely technical, which sufficed to prevent the operation of the law in a particular instance, but which settled nothing for the future. A good deal of dissatisfaction arose as to the state of the Law of Church Discipline, and especially as to the composition and conduct of the Court. It was the practice of that Court that no member of it ever attended unless he was summoned, and no member was ever summoned unless he was selected by the Lord Chancellor of the day, or occasionally by the Lord President. In one instance a Judge was excluded from interfering in a particular case by the special interference of a particular Lord Chancellor. He was told that the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond), when President of the Council, gave directions that when any question of ecclesiastical interest arose, all the Judges should be regularly summoned by the Registrar; but so inveterate was the habit of interference that in a famous case the Lord Chancellor intimated to Sir Alexander Cockburn and himself that he could do without them and that they had better stay in their Courts. Such things were manifestly wrong. No Court ought to be so constituted that the members of it had not the absolute right to attend the deliberations and the hearings of suits, and certainly no Court should be constituted so that it could possibly be said that the Executive Government interfered with its action. He recollected it being said that it was an intrusion on the liberties of the Church that these Courts should sit and act by the authority of the State. In that House, however, he need hardly point out that such a contention was groundless. In this country no tribunal could ever profess to affect the property or position of a subject except under the authority of Parliament. No one could read the Statute Book without seeing Statute after Statute dealing with these Ecclesiastical Courts, and especially the two great Courts now represented, one absolutely, and the other, to some extent, by the Privy Council. It was clear, therefore, that those two Courts were Courts of absolutely statutory creation. Then the High Commission Court, which was the strongest ecclesiastical tribunal which ever existed in this country, was created, and afterwards abolished, without the smallest reference to Convocation or to the clergy in any shape or form. It was reserved for the Public Worship Regulation Bill and for a decision of their Lordships' House to clothe the Bishops of the Church of England with a power of interfering with the process of the law. He did not wish to go into the details of the clauses, but had noticed the general objections to the Bill—the confusion which it presented of the functions of Judge and jury or assessors, and the powers given to the Bishop. These were matters which must be discussed in Committee if the Bill went into Committee. There was, however, one question upon which he would like to say a few strong words. Unless he had misunderstood, there was, save in the particular circumstances referred to in the 7th section, absolutely no appeal whatever in matters of fact. He trusted that the House would not pass a Bill which contained a principle so alien from the present law, so perilous and unjust to persons whose characters and reputations might be vitally affected. He remembered an appeal from a judgment which, if this Bill had been law, would have been final, in which the most telling argument for the appellant was the reading of the judgment appealed from, so wrong-headed, absurd, and monstrous was that judgment. To leave the Bill as it was in this respect would make it a most unjust and oppressive measure. If he had said a word disrespectful or improper of those from whom it was his painful duty to differ, he asked their pardon. He stood there for law against personal will, and wished to see the clergy made, like other subjects of the Queen, obedient to the law, and he earnestly hoped that the discipline of the ancient and glorious Church of England, which undoubtedly was not perfect, would not be made any worse by the passing of this Bill. He begged to move that the House resolve itself into Committee on this day six months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now"), and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months").—(The Lord Coleridge.)

THE EARL OF SELBORNE said, that he was placed in some difficulty in dealing with the speech of his noble and learned Friend, who, both personally and by the office which he held, was entitled to great respect whenever he addressed the House on any question, particularly one relating to law. Undoubtedly it was competent for any noble Lord to take the course taken by his noble and learned Friend, though it was not usual when a matter had received any amount of deliberate consideration at the time of the second reading. He should be most unwilling, in a case of this kind, to reject at this stage a Bill promoted by the most rev. Prelate. But he acknowledged that, if his noble and learned Friend had stated good grounds for reconsidering the decision on the second reading, he had given good reason why he was not present on that occasion to move the rejection of the Bill. But had his noble and learned Friend really stated grounds which would go to the rejection of the Bill if the House were now on the second reading? He had made a speech very able and interesting, which contained much matter deserving of serious attention. But a large part of the speech had been addressed to matters which were not within the Bill and were not germane to the question whether it should be permitted to proceed. The Bill was one for providing a more satisfactory mode of trial in particular cases, cases of immorality or neglect of duty by clerks, which for certain reasons, good or bad, it had been thought right to separate from the trial of questions of doctrine and ritual. One objection of his noble and learned Friend was that this separation had been made. But the object itself was one which it was most desirable to attain. There could be no better proof of the intolerable cost which might be involved in the present mode of proceeding than the instances given by his noble and learned Friend, in which the costs of one suit had reached the figure of £14,000. Some of their Lordships might probably be familiar with other cases in which the cost had been enormous. What was his noble and learned Friend's objection to the principle of the Bill? It was that it was an attack, either open or covert, upon the supremacy of the Crown, of which his noble and learned Friend had given a just and happy definition. He had always thought that all mystification about the supremacy of the Crown, as distinguished from the supremacy of the law, was under a Constitutional system of Government unreal and absurd. He agreed with his noble and learned Friend that the supremacy of the law ought at all hazards to be maintained, and if the Bill had attacked that supremacy he should think it a most serious objection. If there was any such attack in the Bill as it stood, it was certainly covert and not open. In fact, so far as the supremacy involved anything in the nature of Prerogative, it was expressly saved. Then what was there else in this Bill to interfere with the supremacy of the law as distinguished from Prerogative? The Bill itself, if it became law, would regulate the manner in which a certain part of the law of the land was to be administered. If the law was administered in a manner itself unexceptionable, it would be not an exception or derogation from, but an example of, that supremacy; for it would be an Act of Parliament regulating, by the authority of Parliament, the manner in which for the future this part of the Ecclesiastical Law is to be administered. His noble and learned Friend found fault with the Bill because it expressly exempted Bishops from its scope. But as the law at present stood Bishops could not be proceeded against by the same machinery which was applicable to those subject to their jurisdiction. Certainly the machinery of this Bill could not well be applied to the case of Bishops. There had been cases in which Bishops had been deprived for criminal offences. He remembered the case of a Welsh Bishop who was deprived in the reign of James II. or William III., but in that case proceedings were taken by means of special commission. Whether that was a proper and suitable mode of procedure was not now a matter for discussion; but this, at any rate, was quite clear—that any existing possible mode of dealing with Bishops who might be guilty of offences against the Ecclesiastical Law remained untouched by this Bill. It might or might not be desirable to provide by legislation some further mode of proceeding against Bishops, but that was no ground for objecting to this Bill, which only dealt with the machinery in proceedings of a certain kind against ordinary clergymen—a machinery manifestly not applicable to the case of Bishops. His noble and learned Friend, as he understood him, also took exception to the Bill because of the power with regard to initiation, and also with regard to sentences, which it gave the Bishop. It was quite true that the Bill provided that upon complaint being made to the Bishop, he should only take proceedings when satisfied “that proceedings under this Act ought to be taken” on such complaint. But that was not a change in the present law. Under the Church Discipline Act, as had been decided by a judgment in this House, the Bishop was not compelled to institute proceedings unless he thought fit to do so. He thought it would be unreasonable and intolerable that a Bishop should be compelled to proceed against any clergyman of his diocese against whom any charge of immorality, however manifestly groundless or trumped up, was brought. Before the Church Discipline Act, there was no doubt a rule with regard to the person making the complaint giving security for costs. But that was not the law or practice now. At present the Bishop was personally liable for the costs. It was said that the Court could deal with the costs, but the person who instituted the proceedings might be unable to pay the costs. It would be monstrous that upon a complaint made against a clerk the Bishop should be compelled to proceed, though satisfied that there was no prima facie case and no real foundation for the complaint. The Bishop would, of course, act under a sense of responsibility, and they might rest assured that the person who made a valid complaint, upon which a Bishop refused to proceed, would not be slow to appeal to that most potent of all Courts, the Court of public opinion. This, he thought, would be good security against a Bishop improperly refusing to take proceedings. He could understand that if it were a matter of doctrine or of ritual, a Bishop who was supposed to sympathize with the doctrine or ritual complained of might be considered unwilling to proceed in respect of such complaint; but he could not imagine that any one would suspect a Bishop of connivance or sympathy with drunkenness or other acts of gross immorality, or accuse him of a desire to shield any person against whom a prima facie case of that kind had been made out. But if his noble and learned Friend thought the Bishop ought to be bound to proceed whenever complaint was made, it was surprising that he did not wait until the Bill was in Committee, and then move an Amendment to carry out his object. His noble and learned Friend also took exception to the power given to the Bishop as to certain sentences, and appeared to argue that the Bill enabled the Bishop to throw his shield round a man and refuse to pass sentence though he was found guilty. But that was not so.

If a sentence of suspension, or anything less, were passed by the Court, the Bishop could not overrule it. It was, no doubt, quite true that a more severe sentence, such as a sentence of deprivation, was to be passed in the Bishop's Court, by the Bishop himself, and not by his Chancellor, though in the provincial Court it might be passed by the Official Principal of the Archbishop. This, whatever might be the reason, was now, and had been for above 200 years, if not always, the settled law and usages in such cases. It had been recognized by such Judges as Lord Stowell and Sir John Nicholl. What the Bill provided was strictly agreeable to that law and usage. If the Court considered that the case required a sentence in excess of suspension, the Court would remit the case to the Bishop for sentence, with an intimation of their opinion, and with their finding of fact and the evidence. The Bishop in such case would exercise his judgment, and pass, or not pass, a sentence of deprivation. His noble and learned Friend had said it was a great hardship that there was to be no appeal on the question of fact. He hoped that their Lordships would not forget what the state of our Criminal Law was. If a man was found guilty by a jury of murder or any less crime, which might materially affect his position, his person, or his character, there was no appeal except on a matter of law. There might, no doubt, be recourse to the Prerogative of Mercy vested in the Crown; and this Bill recognized that Prerogative, to say nothing of any other power of mitigating punishment that might exist. But they had not at present, in ordinary criminal cases, any Court of Appeal on the facts. It was a much disputed question whether they ought or ought not to have one; and the difficulties were so great that no one seemed to have been able to overcome them up to the present time. And as to any other question of fact tried, in a civil case, before a jury, there was not any appeal in the proper sense of the word. There must be an application for a new trial, which must be based on a special ground, either some matter of law, or that the verdict was against the weight of evidence; and it was not the disposition of the Courts to overturn verdicts simply because the Court from which the new trial was asked might have come to a different conclusion from that which the jury had arrived at. This Bill would allow a re-hearing of the question of fact, if the Court were satisfied that there were special grounds for granting what would, in substance, be a new trial; and, although it was true that, in these ecclesiastical cases, there was at present a general right of appeal upon the facts, it was productive of great, and often very unnecessary, expense, and he thought the re-hearing, on special grounds only, much better. His noble and learned Friend had touched upon some other points which he humbly thought were outside the Bill, and not germane to the present measure. He had asked why the Bill was confined to morals and neglect of duty. Some good reasons might, he thought, be given for that. The necessity of dealing with that class of questions was a matter about which people in general were quite agreed; and if the Bill was good in itself it might be fairly hoped that it would pass through both Houses of Parliament without encountering those difficulties and storms which arose out of popular animosities connected with parties in the Church. Again, Parliament in 1874 had thought fit to deal separately and specifically with questions of ritual, and had provided a special and peculiar machinery for that particular class of cases. They might think, and think rightly, that questions of doctrine were of enormous importance; they would, on the other hand, probably be equally convinced of the difficulties of raising them judicially. Everyone would probably agree that the existing limits of liberty in the Church of England, on the one side or on the other, ought not to be curtailed; and, therefore, there would be no great disposition to facilitate procedure in that particular class of cases which related to doctrine. Whether that ought to be so or not he did not say. With regard to what his noble and learned Friend had said about the Judicial Committee, nobody knew better than his noble and learned Friend did that they were not over-manned with respect to judicial strength, and that it was convenient to make some arrangement as to who should attend in one Court and who in another. He did not believe that arrangements of that kind had ever been made, or proposed to be made, in the Judicial Committee or elsewhere, for the purpose of constituting the Court in a particular manner with a view to the decision of particular cases; than which, if it were indeed done, nothing could be more scandalously improper. To suppose that any Lord Chancellor could, with such an object, send messages to such men as the late Chief Justice Cockburn and his noble and learned friend, requesting them not to attend, would imply not only misconduct, but folly amounting to idiocy. The only possible motive for the communications which had been mentioned was that those learned Judges might not be unnecessarily withdrawn from their own Courts, to their own inconvenience or that of the suitors in those Courts, when it was known that the Judicial Committee would be attended by a sufficient number of Judges, whether they were there or not. The Judicial Committee might or might not be a good tribunal; the present was not a convenient time for arguing that point. But no one who wished to remodel the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council or to abolish it, would ever think of introducing such a proposal into a Bill of this kind, to which it did not appear to be at all germane. In conclusion, while he admitted that some of the observations made by his noble and learned Friend suggested points which might be fairly considered in Committee on the Bill, he maintained that they furnished no sufficient ground for refusing to go into Committee on the measure.

LORD GRIMTHORPE did not think that the noble and learned Lord who had just sat down had displaced any of the contentions of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Coleridge) who moved the rejection of the Bill. The noble and learned Lord was not present when the second reading of the Bill was moved and carried without opposition. All that happened on that occasion was that he made a speech about the Bill, and while he knew there was no use in throwing it out, he thought it desirable that their Lordships and other people should understand a great deal more about it than otherwise they would have learnt. It happened that last year he found a right rev. Prelate moving the Committee stage of a certain Bill, at the second reading of which he had been unable to be present. On hearing that, and a remark or a question by a noble Lord opposite, he rose and said he did not think that the Bill was understood. The result was that, when the Lord Chancellor put the Question, only one "Content," from the right rev. Prelate himself, was heard; while, on the other side there were a good many "Non-Contents." The result was that the Bill died, although it appeared in the Votes every day until the end of the Session. Their Lordships had been told that, when this Bill was in Committee, it would be remodelled. He had hoped that it was going to be modified to such an extent that he could accept it. He knew that in certain quarters he was represented as an obstructive of measures of this kind; but he believed he was the first drawer of a Bill for amending the defects of the Church Discipline Act and the Public Worship Act, which may be seen in the volume of evidence of the Ecclesiastical Courts' Commission five years ago. It might be bad, or it might be good; but one thing was quite certain, that it was a great deal more simple than this Bill, and was not complicated with sections and subsections. Further experience and the reading of the evidence of the Commission had induced him to alter his views on some points, especially on the veto. He had no idea, until after reading the evidence, of the extent to which the veto was carried in depriving parishioners of the rights of the Church of England in having their service conducted according to law. That was one of the things which made a deep impression upon his mind. The veto had been abused; it was liable to be abused. Even the noble and learned Lord who spoke last had admitted that it was liable to be abused in ritual and doctrinal cases. Lord Stowell had said most emphatically that it had always been the law that anyone might promote the office of judge against clerical offenders. People forgot that the parishioners had an interest in prosecuting moral offenders among the clergy, and that this was a very different thing from prosecuting a thief. That was a matter for the Queen or the Attorney General, who can issue a nolle prosequi, to deal with as representing the entire public; but the present question was a different one. The parishioners had a right to prosecute their clergyman if he either commit immorality or conducted his service illegally. He agreed that it was a hardship for the Bishop to prosecute the clergyman at his own cost; but it was the Bishops' own doing in the Clergy Discipline Act of 1840. Before that Lord Stowell said that the Court was open to everybody. He did not wish the Bishops to do that work; he wanted other people to do it; they had the moral right to undertake it. And, now again, it did not appear to be perceived generally that the Bishops had got rid of the necessity of undertaking the suits themselves, and being liable to costs, and yet they insisted on retaining the preliminary veto, and demanded a final one besides, if they did not like the Judge's sentence, which was a distinct usurpation of the Royal power, and, in fact, a dispensing power, unknown to the law. It was true that the Queen, acting by her officers, could pardon a man who had been convicted; but was that a reason why the Bishop should be authorized to do the like? The Bishops claimed, under this Bill, powers that they had never had before, not even under the Act of 1840, to interfere with the sentence of their own Courts. So that there were two invasions of the Royal supremacy in this Bill. Another peculiarity showing how badly the Bill had been prepared, and modified since, was the provision that if a clergyman were convicted by any Court, say, by two Justices, who very often made mistakes, the Bishop had no veto. By the first operative clause of the Bill the trial must go on. The man might be innocent; yet he had the right to do everything except to prove that he was innocent; he might bring what evidence he could in mitigation of punishment, which is, ipso facto, confessing that he is guilty. But why should a man charged with having committed an offence be precluded from proving, not that the sentence ought to be mitigated, but that no sentence ought to have been passed upon him at all? Nothing is easier, for instance, than for a woman and a confederate to get a bastardy order against any man, and the Justices must decide according to the evidence, which the defendant may have no means of refuting; in fact, from the nature of the case, it is most difficult to do so. As the Bill was framed, a case had to be sent to the Bishop, not where he had to take action, but where he had not to take action. He had brought these matters under the notice of the House merely to show how little the machinery of the Bill had been attended to, notwithstanding the measure had now been before the House for two months. Another clerical aggression was that their Lordships were asked by this Bill for the first time to ratify a canon by law. Such a thing had never been done before. Canons of the Church had often been overruled by our Courts of Law and by the Legislature; indeed, more than half of the 141 canons had been thus disposed of, or are absolutely illegal and ultra vires; but in no single instance had a canon been ratified by the Legislature. It was asserted that this 122nd canon might be merely a declaration of the ancient law; but, fortunately, the Convocations themselves had left on record a refutation of that hypothetical justification. For, in 1571, a canon was drawn up and passed by the Convocations; but the whole Code was refused by Queen Elizabeth, which declared that the Chancellors might not pronounce a sentence of excommunication, but that they might deprive; whereas in 1603 they enacted that the Chancellors might not deprive, but might excommunicate. Therefore, the Convocation—that is, the Bishops and clergy—had themselves proved that this canon was an aggression and a novelty, besides being contrary to the Acts of Uniformity and the great Heresy Act of 13 Eliz. c. 12. Chancellors having followed it without argument proves nothing. Decisions, even of the highest Court, without argument, had been overruled in two great ritual cases after argument. It seemed from this Bill, too, that the Archbishops and their provincial Judge might run a race with each other which is to deprive, though the Privy Council had decided, after argument, that the Dean of Arches was the proper person to do it. So the Bill overrides both Acts of Parliament and legal decisions and the oldest testimony of the canons themselves, merely to please the High Church clergy and set up some episcopal supremacy, including the power to alter as well as to pronounce the sentence, or to act either as executioner or dispenser of pardons. Another reason why this Bill should not be further proceeded with at the present moment was that the Bishops were only showing half their hand, because it was well known that they had another Bill behind, which had been nominally "presented," but seen by no one but themselves. Before the House made any concession with regard to the measure now before them they should insist upon having the fullest information with regard to the other Bill. It was useless to talk about costs. Litigiousness was the cause of costs. Unless they cut off justice they could not cut off costs in cases where people were litigious. Broadly speaking, without going into the details of the Bill, which was exceedingly ill-drawn, these were the reasons why he entirely agreed with the noble and learned Lord that the Bill ought not to be allowed to go further at this time. The Church Discipline Act, passed by this House in 1838 and 1839, and spoilt by the Bishops in 1840, as he had explained on the second reading of this Bill, was framed by the strongest Commission, appointed in 1832, that had ever sat to consider such questions, and it ought not to be lightly set aside. Although he had put down Amendments to the Bill, he was strongly of opinion that the Bill was of such a character that it would be useless to go into Committee upon it. The question would then be left for another Session, when there would be an opportunity of bringing in a proper and thoroughly simple Bill to deal with it.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY) said, that if the most rev. Prelate who had moved the re-commitment of this Bill required any excuse for having divided the subject of morals from ritual and doctrine, it was furnished by the speeches of the noble and learned Lord Chief Justice and the noble and learned Lord who had just sat down. If two such speeches could be made upon a subject upon which it could hardly have been supposed there would be scarcely any difference of opinion, he would like to know what chance of passing a Bill would have had which involved the delicate subjects of doctrine and ritual? In the speeches of each of the noble and learned Lords the mischiefs which they had portrayed had been in a great measure connected with questions arising out of ritual and doctrine. It could not but be admitted that it was unfortunate that in the case of a man who had been convicted before a Temporal Court of any offence against the moral law, the whole proceedings should have to be begun again before the Ecclesiastical Court and at great expense. He did not understand that the Lord Chief Justice was satisfied with the present condition of the law in that respect. As the law now stood, the Bishop had to prosecute, at his own expense—and sometimes the expense was enormous—a person unfit to remain in the Church; and this Bill provided a remedy, at all events in a large class of cases. It would provide a comparatively cheap, facile, and expeditious mode of getting rid of persons whom both the laity and the clergy desired to have put out of the Church. All the rest of the criticism which had been passed upon the Bill was more or less criticism upon the machinery by which the admitted evil was to be remedied. If questions having regard to supremacy and to right of veto arose, there was nothing to prevent any noble Lord moving in Committee to strike out the provision which gave the Bishops the right of veto in certain cases. There could be no doubt that the present state of the law with regard to immorality by the clergy was extremely unsatisfactory; but in consequence of the Bill containing a provision to which he objected the Lord Chief Justice moved to reject the Bill, instead of moving to strike out the objectionable clause. He had been unable to discover in the Bill anything of that spirit of ecclesiastical aggression in which the noble and learned Lord (Lord Grimthorpe) so evidently believed. The object of the Bill was to facilitate the expulsion from the Church of those clergymen whose conduct the general body of the laity and clergy alike condemned, and he trusted their Lordships would agree with the Motion made by the most rev. Prelate.

On Question, resolved in the negative: Then the original Motion agreed to: House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 1 (Short title) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Sentencing clerk found guilty by civil court).

LORD GRIMTHORPE moved an Amendment the effect of which would be to provide that the Court which tried a man should pronounce the judgment and sentence as was done in all other Courts.

Lord Grimthorpe

as I should have imagined it was, but some lower Military Authority who has furnished this very startling and inexplicable statement. I do not wish to pass from this subject without entering a protest against the impression which seems to prevail that because Her Majesty's Government do not talk on this matter, because they do not make public speeches or show their feelings, that, therefore, deep anxiety and vigilance are not directed to this question. It has been, and is still, the subject of our anxious thought; but, owing to the very nature of the subject, we cannot do otherwise than practise the utmost reticence and reserve with respect to it. If such things existed as Secret Committees, I should have no objection to lay before such a Committee everything we know and do on the subject; but Secret Committees are not in our habit; and everybody must see that nothing would be more insane than to explain to all the world what our strength or what our weakness was, what the nature of the precautions were which we were taking, and what the subjects were as to which we were directing our vigilance and our care. It would be absolutely not only insane, but treacherous, if we were to commit such matters as these to a publicity which does not include merely our own subjects, but which must extend to all the nations of the world. I therefore rise to say just these few words as a protest against the tones of panic which prevail and the language which is used, as though the Government were passing by all these matters in utter apathy, which, in the present state of the world, would be a flagrant dereliction of their duty. But though it is satisfactory to think we are increasing our precautions, I would commend to your Lordships the following rough figures as to our action in recent years. I will take them so as to cover several years, so that there should be no question of Party in the matter. I wish to make no distinction between ourselves and the noble Lords opposite, but only to show that there has been a considerable increase of preparation in this country. I find that if your Lordships compare 1884 and 1888 it will be found that the number of men of all forces that were under the colours were 181,817 in 1884 and 212,241 in 1888—a very large increase, much larger than some of the increases which at that time were demanded even by the most alarmed persons. And in the same way with regard to the expenditure on the Navy. I have here a comparison of the money devoted to shipbuilding and armaments. In 1883-4 there was an expenditure of £4,445,000; in 1887-8 the sum was £6,611,000. Now I do not quote expenditure as in itself a thing that is admirable, but I am merely showing that there is no ground whatever for the implied reproach of parsimony and that we are neglecting the defences of the country. I merely wish to make that one protest and observation. But before I sit down I feel that I cannot avoid taking advantage of the opportunity to enter a protest against another practice. That is, the practice of those who are, or ought to be, distinguished authorities upon military affairs making statements against the Government under whom they serve, and making them in a place where they cannot be answered. I have here the report of a speech—apparently an authorized speech—made by a Member of this House, the Adjutant General of the Army. I read in that speech these words—

“The answer to the question why the Army and the Navy are not as strong as they ought to be is to be found in the system of our Government by party—that curse of modern England which is sapping and undermining the foundations of our country, which is depriving our statesmen of the manly honesty which was once their characteristic. What do we see when any new Administration comes into office?”

Remember, we were the last Administration which came into Office.

“What directly takes place? It is the same with all Parties. The first thing is the endeavour made by the Minister in Office to obtain some clap-trap reputation by cutting down the expenses of the Army and Navy.”

That is the comment of the Adjutant General on the conduct of the Secretary of State for War. The next thing he says is this—

“This is the result of what? The result of a low and vicious standard of morality which is now uppermost in men's minds. In speaking so light-heartedly he forgets, in his pride of having reduced the Estimates, the fault he has committed, the crime he is guilty of against the country.”

My Lords, I am not going to answer these comments. They relate to matters of whose existence I am ignorant; but what I do earnestly protest against is

Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Acts amending the same: And

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION PROVISIONAL ORDER CONFIRMATION (LONDON) BILL
[H.L.]. (No. 102.)

A Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Education Department under the Elementary Education Act, 1870, to enable the School Board for London to put in force the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Acts amending the same: Were presented by The Lord President; read 1st.

House adjourned at a quarter before Eight o'clock, to Monday next, a Quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 11th May, 1888.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered — First Reading—Fishery Acts Amendment (Ireland) (No. 2)* [260]; Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Act (1886) Amendment (No. 3)* [261]; Vestrymen's Qualification* [262].

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS—Ordered — First Reading—Local Government (Highways)* [258]; Local Government (Port)* [259].

Report — Local Government* [213]; Local Government (No. 2)* [214]; Local Government (Poor Law)* [215]; Local Government (Poor Law) (No. 2)* [216]; Local Government (Poor Law) (No. 3)* [217]; Local Government (Poor Law) (No. 4)* [218]; Local Government (Poor Law) (No. 5)* [219].

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, owing to the continuance of his indisposition:—

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

MOTIONS.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (HIGHWAYS) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board under "The Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878," relating to the Counties of Durham, Hertford, and Westmoreland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 258.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDER (PORT) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to confirm an Order of the Local Government Board under the provisions of "The Public Health Act, 1875," as amended by "The Public Health (Ships, &c.) Act, 1885," relating to the Port of Dartmouth, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 259.]

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

CITY OF LONDON (FIRE INQUESTS) BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) said, he did not rise to oppose the Bill, but to state the view of the Government. The principle of the Bill the Government approved; and, in fact, in "another place" they had introduced a Bill applying that principle to a larger area. He only now rose to give the House to understand that, though in deference to the wish of the strong Committee to which this Bill had been referred, they did not wish to interfere with its progress, it must be with the understanding that "elsewhere" they might possibly give that preference to their own measure that would not tend to the passing of this Bill into law.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

QUESTIONS.

ARMY (INDIA)—"COLONELS' ALLOWANCES."

Mr. KING (Hull, Central) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he can state how many officers are now drawing colonels' allowances in India, and how many officers altogether are now drawing colonels' allowances, the payment of which is borne on the Indian Exchequer; whether an officer "on colonels' allowances" payable by the Indian Government, if he resides in Ceylon, or in any part of the world except India, is permitted to draw his allowances in England in full sterling value; whereas, if he resides in India, his allowances are converted at the rate of 2s. 0½d. the rupee, the value of the rupee being at present under 1s. 5d., thereby entailing upon him a loss from 25 to 30 per cent of his income as compared with his brother officers, in precisely the same position, residing elsewhere; whether he will state the entire sum saved to the Indian Exchequer per annum by this mode of settling accounts with the officers who reside in India; and, whether the Government will consider the advisability of altering a policy which has the effect of dissuading officers trained and acclimatised in India from residing in that country after retirement?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): There are 430 officers drawing colonels' allowances from the Indian Exchequer. Of these, 418 reside in the United Kingdom, and 12 in India. An officer on colonels' allowances, residing in India, receives his pay and allowances in Indian currency like all other officers on full pay. If residing out of India he may, under the Regulations, draw his pay and allowances in sterling at the rate fixed for the purpose in 1854. It is the view of the India Office that there is no saving by paying the officers in India at the fixed rate; but there is a very heavy charge owing to the fall in exchange by paying those in England at the rate fixed in 1854, and this charge would be increased by the proposed measure. The objection raised to alter the Rule is that to do so would abrogate the rule that officers in India not on the retired list are to draw their pay in the currency, and at the rates of the country in which it accrues; but the Secretary of State does not at present see his way to make the alteration.

NAVAL COURTS MARTIAL—NAVAL MEDICAL OFFICERS.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the same or similar Regulations exist permitting naval medical officers to serve on courts martial as is the case with officers of the Army Medical Staff; and, if not, can he state the reason for this difference?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The Regulations do not admit of naval medical officers serving on courts martial. In common with officers of the other civil branches of the Navy they are debarred from this duty by Section 58 of the Naval Discipline Act, which lays down that—

"No officer shall be qualified to sit as a member of any court-martial, unless he be a flag officer, captain, commander, or lieutenant of Her Majesty's Navy on full pay."

The conditions of the two Services widely differ; in the Navy it has always been held desirable that the military branch only should deal with questions of discipline.

CHARITY COMMISSIONERS — MILTON ABBAS SCHOOLS.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.) (for Colonel HAMBRO) (Dorset, S.) asked the hon. Member for the Penrith Division of Cumberland, By what authority Her Majesty's Charity Commissioners, in the absence of any scheme for the management of the Milton Abbas School, Blandford, endeavour to restrict an appointment about to be made by the Trustees of the school, of a head master in, or intending to be in, Holy Orders, to a temporary appointment only; and, if he can assure the Trustees of the Milton Abbas Grammar School, that if they appoint a master under whom the school flourishes, and meets the requirements of the district, the fact that the master is in Holy Orders, or intends to take Holy Orders, shall not be a reason for the Charity Commissioners to remove him if at any future time they prepare a scheme for the school?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): Under the Endowed Schools Acts the Charity Commissioners have authority to make a scheme for Milton Abbas School, and therein to direct that a new head master be appointed. By Section 18 of the Act of 1869, it is expressly directed that, in any scheme for such a school as this, it shall be provided that a person shall not be disqualified for being a master therein by reason only of his not being, or not intending to be, in Holy Orders. A scheme being now in contemplation, and the Trustees having meanwhile advertised for a master, "who must be already in, or preparing to take, Holy Orders," the Commissioners thought it right to advise them that any appointment so made should be regarded as temporary. In reply to the second part of the hon.

Member's Question, the mere fact that the master proposed to be appointed is in orders, or is about to take orders, will not afford a ground for interference with his tenure by the Commissioners. Beyond that the Charity Commission is unable to give any pledge which would in any way fetter the discretion of the Governing Body which may be appointed under any future scheme.

WAR OFFICE (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)—THE SMALL ARMS FACTORY AT SPARKBROOK.

MR. KENRICK (Birmingham, N.) (for Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN) (Birmingham, W.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that the Small Arms Factory at Sparkbrook was purchased by the Government about two years ago, on the liquidation of the Small Arms and Ammunition Company, Limited; whether, since the purchase, a sum of about £50,000 has been spent in laying down new machinery and improving existing plant; whether the Government are now removing large quantities of the new machinery to the Enfield Factory; and, whether there is any intention on the part of the Government to transfer the manufacture at Sparkbrook to the works at Enfield?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The Small Arms Factory at Sparkbrook was purchased in 1885. About £31,000 has been spent in laying down new machinery and improving existing plant. Some of the machinery is in course of removal to Enfield, for the purpose of starting the manufacture of the new magazine rifle. The intention may be stated generally to be that the Government manufacture of small arms will be carried on at Enfield alone; but large contracts for arms have been placed in Birmingham, so that the artisans there will not suffer by the removal of this machinery from Sparkbrook, and this place will be utilized as the principal Government dépôt for repairs.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICES — CONSULAR OFFICIAL AT MASSOWAH.

MR. KING (Hull, Central) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Civil Estimates of the last two years and of this year provide for the payment of a Consular official at Massowah; whether a Consular official was, in fact, appointed to this post about two years ago; and, whether this officer has for the last two years been working in the Foreign Office instead of going to Massowah?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The Estimates of last year and those of the current financial year provide for the payment of a Vice Consul at Massowah. A Vice Consul was appointed on October 26, 1886; but in consequence of the unsettled state of the country it has been decided from time to time to defer his departure. He has been employed on important duties in the Foreign Office.

EXCISE DUTIES (LOCAL PURPOSES) BILL — THE CART AND WHEEL DUTIES—FARMERS' LOCOMOTIVES—MARKET GARDENERS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, as the Revenue Bill now stands, farmers' locomotives used solely for agricultural purposes will be exempt from the Cart and Wheel Duties.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): In answering this question I must repeat a caution which I gave a few days ago, that any reply I may give must be taken as explanatory only of my proposals in the Bill, and not as a pledge as to the manner in which it may be interpreted when it becomes law. The interpretation of the Act will rest with the Board of Inland Revenue, subject to the Courts. With this reserve I may say that farmers' locomotives used solely for agricultural purposes will not be exempt from duty if they are used upon a road for drawing or propelling any vehicle. But I think it would be better if hon. Gentlemen interested in such points as this would wait to discuss them in Committee on the Bill, instead of asking me Questions over the Table, as any short answer I may give may lead to misapprehension.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN (Lambeth, Brixton) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether carts belonging to market gardeners who were also nurserymen and florists would be exempt from payment under the Wheel Tax?

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, Sir; such carts will be exempt if they are used solely for the conveyance of fruit and flowers grown upon lands in the occupation of their owner. But I must repeat the caution I gave in answer to a previous Question dealing with the provisions of the Excise Duties (Local Purposes) Bill.

PRISONS (SCOTLAND) — PRISON SURGEONS.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is the case that the average daily population of the prison of Perth is 620; of Glasgow 500; and Barlinnie 500; whether the English Prison Commissioners recommended in their first Annual Report that chaplains in prisons of an average population of 400 and upwards should be appointed at a salary of £300, rising to £400; whether the average daily population of Glasgow, Barlinnie, and Perth, is equal to the average daily population of Birmingham, Leeds, and Durham; and, whether prison surgeons in those prisons are appointed at a salary of £320 a-year, while in the Scotch prisons they begin at £200 a-year; and what is the reason for the difference of salary?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): The hon. Member has now asked specific Questions about particular prisons; and, in reply, I have to inform him that the surgeons at Glasgow and Perth receive higher pay than they would in English prisons of corresponding population; while the surgeon at Barlinnie and the chaplains at all three prisons receive less, the figures given by the hon. Member being substantially accurate as regards these four officers. The Scotch scales of salary were fixed by a Committee which had full knowledge of those adopted in England. In regard to the officers who are paid at a lower rate than the English scale will give them according to population, I wish to point out that although it is so in these particular cases, there are other cases, as I have already stated, in which reductions will have to be made.

DR. CLARK asked, how the hon. Gentleman reconciled his answer with the previous answer he had given? The Question was, whether the highest salary was £200? The answer to that Question was that that was the case. Now the hon. Gentleman told them that in the English Provincial prisons the salary was £320.

MR. JACKSON said, the hon. Member was aware that applications had been received in these particular cases where there was a disadvantage in the case of Scotland, and these applications were now under the consideration of the Treasury. If it were found necessary to make an alteration it would be made.

EGYPT—THE SUEZ CANAL—REGISTER AND TONNAGE OF STEAM VESSELS.

CAPTAIN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any steps can be taken to ensure a record being kept by each Colony of the number and tonnage of steam vessels entered and cleared from and to foreign countries via the Suez Canal, so that information may be included in the Statistical Abstract for the several Colonial Possessions, similar to that furnished in No. 78, Statistical Abstract, British India?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): Her Majesty's Government will consider how far a complete record of the nature desired can be obtained.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—JUDICIAL RENTS—ACREAGE.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether he can state the acreage represented respectively by the 136,722 cases of fair rent disposed of in Court, and the 94,469 cases of agreement out of Court, reported by the Irish Land Commission up to end of March, 1888?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University): The Land Commissioners inform me that no record is kept of the acreage represented by the cases which are struck out, dismissed, or withdrawn. These cases number 37,059. Judicial rents were fixed in Court up to the end of March, 1888, in 99,663 cases. The acreage represented by these cases is 2,966,026. The acreage represented by the 94,469 agreements is 2,441,846.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL RESOLUTIONS—DUTY ON FOREIGN WINES.

Dr. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any representations or remonstrances have been addressed to the Foreign Office by the French Government in connection with the proposed tax on bottled wines; and, if so, what the representations or remonstrances may be?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): I beg to refer the hon. Member to my answer to the hon. Member for West Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) on the 26th of April.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—SUB-COMMISSION COURT AT DOWNPATRICK.

Mr. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether an application was made to the Sub-Commission Court (Messrs. Edward Greer, O'Callaghan, and Sproule) sitting at Downpatrick on Friday the 4th instant, that a case in which an hon. Member was coming over from London to give evidence in might be fixed for Tuesday the 8th instant was refused; whether the case was fixed for Saturday positively; whether, on Saturday, the hon. Member being in Court, having been summoned by telegraph, the Sub-Commissioners refused to take the case on that day, and postponed it until Tuesday; and, whether the action of the Sub-Commissioners can be justified on grounds of public convenience; and, if so, what were those grounds?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, the Land Commissioners had not yet been able to give him the information he had asked for. He imagined they found that local reference was necessary.

LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)—BOW STREET AND MARLBOROUGH STREET POLICE COURTS.

Mr. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, How many summonses are heard on an average in a week at Bow Street and Marlborough Street Police Courts respectively; and, whether the two Courts are required?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied) said: The weekly number of summonses heard on an average in a week at Marlborough Street Police Court for the year 1887 was 112; at Bow Street the weekly average is 132. Judging from the number of cases disposed of at each Court, and from the fact that the Committee which lately inquired into the disposition of magisterial business in the Metropolis, after full consideration, did not recommend the abolition of the Court at Marlborough Street, the Secretary of State is not prepared to say that the two Courts are not required.

CUSTOMS—IMPORTATION OF UNWHOLESOME TEA—COFFEIN.

Mr. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he can now see his way to frame Regulations to allow the importation duty free of tea unfit for human food, with precautions to prevent its getting into the market, for the purpose of the production of coffein, a chemical industry which our present Custom House Regulations drives completely to Germany?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): The subject is now under reference to the Board of Customs. The firm who are seeking such a facility have undertaken to furnish further particulars desired by that Department; and, in the meantime, no definite answer can be given.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—ALLEGED INSURANCE FRAUDS AT BELFAST.

Mr. CAREW (Kildare, N.) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, with reference to the intended prosecution for insurance frauds at Belfast, Whether it is the intention of the Crown to change the venue from Belfast to Dublin?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University): This matter is now under the consideration of the Attorney General for Ireland.

Mr. Madden

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—DISTRICT COUNCILS—CREMATION.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he intends to confer upon the new District Councils the right of cremation, if the said Council should think this desirable in the public interest?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): No, Sir; I have no such intention at present.

MERCHANT SHIPPING — THE MAIL STEAMER "ARIZONA"—DUNMANUS BAY.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) had the following Question on the Paper:—To ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the reported narrow escape of the mail steamer Arizona on Monday night last, that during the prevalence of a thick fog ran into Dunmanus Bay, and very nearly went ashore; whether this is the place where the Iberian was lost; and, whether, in view of the fact that this Bay lies unprotected, parallel and close to the track of the American liners, the Board will recommend the placing a fog bell or gun on the Mizen or Three Castle Heads? The hon. Member said, he did not intend asking the first part of the Question, as he understood the thing did not occur. He would, however, ask if it was not a fact that the steamship Catalonia narrowly escaped going ashore at or about this very place during last week?

THE PRESIDENT (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.), in reply, said, that was not exactly the same Question as that which the hon. Gentleman put on the Paper; but he had to say with regard to the lights on the coast at this place, of course it was not the business of the Board of Trade to initiate the establishment of any light. The Irish Lighthouse Authorities were now in the course of erecting a lighthouse at a place called Bull Rock, or Mersey Head, close to this very part of the coast. He was also informed that if mariners would use the ordinary precautions of taking soundings the danger to which the hon. Member referred would be avoided,

DR. TANNER asked, if Bull Rock was not about 50 miles west of this place?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: No, Sir.

DR. TANNER: It is about 45.

PORTUGAL—BOMBARDMENT OF MINENGANI—COMPENSATION.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What steps have been taken by the Government to press on the Government of Portugal the claim for compensation by British Indian subjects at Minengani on the Zanzibar Coast for their losses due to the bombardment of that place by the Portuguese in February, 1887?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): For reasons, into which I cannot enter, no claim has yet been presented; but the case of the British Indian subjects at Minengani forms part of an affair which is under consideration.

In reply to further Questions by Mr. BUCHANAN,

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, claims had been sent to the Government; but the Government had not yet made any claim.

EUROPEAN TURKEY—REPORTED INSURRECTIONARY DISTURBANCES IN MACEDONIA.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government are in possession of any, and, if so, what, information regarding the disturbances and insurrectionary movements recently reported from Macedonia?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): We have received information of acts of brigandage in the neighbourhood of the Greek Frontier, and in the Sandjak of Serres; but not of anything that could be called an insurrectionary movement.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—CAMP ALLOWANCE TO VOLUNTEERS.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) asked the Secretary of State for War, If, having regard to all the circumstances, he can see his way to grant some further camp allowance to the Volunteer Force than that notified, so as to prevent, as far as possible, any reduction in the number applying to go into camp for training?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The amount of camp allowance already authorized is in excess of the sum included in the Estimates, though over-estimated numbers and failures to appear will probably equalize them. I cannot, therefore, authorize additional issues; but if at the end of the camping season a saving should appear in the item for camps in the Volunteer Vote, I will consider whether it could be divided proportionately among the corps which may earn more than the amount allotted to them. This was done in 1884, and resulted actually in all corps getting as much as they had earned.

CUSTOMS HOUSE OFFICERS—HOURS OF ATTENDANCE.

Mr. FORREST FULTON (West Ham, N.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is contemplated to increase the hours of Customs House officers, and to what extent; and, if so, whether they will receive any compensation for their increased attendance; and, whether it is a fact that, whilst the average attendance of officers in the Outdoor Department exceeds 10 hours daily, many of them are compelled to remain on duty for alternate periods of 24 hours?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): I would ask my hon. and learned Friend not to press for an answer to his Question; I am not in a position to make any statement. Even if it be contemplated to make some change, he will feel that it is not to the advantage of the public interest that such matters should be made the subject of Question and answer in this House before they are completed.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—ASSAULT ON POLICE SERGEANT O'SHEA, AT MACROOM.

Dr. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that at the trial of Mr. Creedon, under "The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887," at Macroom, for an assault on a policeman named O'Shea, on the 8th of April last, no attempt was made by the prosecuting counsel to prove that the meeting out of which the said assault arose was an illegal and unlawful assembly; and, whether he will order an inquiry into the facts of this case?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I am advised that it was not necessary for the prosecuting counsel to prove the nature of the meeting. Creedon was tried not for taking part in an unlawful assembly, but for a cowardly and brutal attack on a police officer.

Dr. TANNER: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether it is not the fact that Creedon was struck first by this man O'Shea, and, that being the case, if he was not justified in striking O'Shea; if the meeting was not an illegal one—in other words, if the meeting was not an illegal one, was the policeman justified in striking him first?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe the hypothesis on which the hon. Gentleman founds his Question is an inaccurate one.

Mr. FLYNN (Cork, N.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, has he seen the report in the Cork newspapers of this case, in which it is distinctly stated by evidence for the defence, and admitted in evidence for the prosecution, that in this case the policeman struck this man Creedon in the first instance, and that the apparent justification for so striking him was that the meeting was an illegal one?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not informed in reference to that.

Mr. FLYNN: Will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiries?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already given an answer on the subject.

Dr. TANNER: Being an eye-witness of the occurrence, might I ask the right hon. Gentleman his authority for making the statement he has made in this case? I saw the assault committed.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman has asked for information, and I have given him the best information that I have at my command.

Dr. TANNER: Can he give me his authority? I am perfectly aware that the right hon. Gentleman is making the best statement that he can on the subject; but I, at the same time, would wish to know his authority—if he is able, or not afraid, to give it.

Mr. Howard Vincent

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is not the practice to name authorities.

DR. TANNER: Are you afraid to give it?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order!

CHARITY COMMISSIONERS—UNITED WESTMINSTER SCHOOLS CHARITY—SALE OF LANDS.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) asked the hon. Member for the Penrith Division of Cumberland, as a Charity Commissioner, Whether the United Westminster Schools Charity has entered into any agreement to sell or lease the land belonging to the Charity in Victoria Street; and, whether such sale or lease has been approved by the Charity Commissioners?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The Governors of the United Westminster Schools did, in December, 1883, with the sanction of the Charity Commissioners, enter into an agreement for the sale (at the price of £56,375) of a piece of land having a frontage to the south side of Victoria Street of 255 feet. The terms of the agreement were somewhat altered in April, 1888, and the agreement so altered has just received the sanction of the Charity Commission. This is the only uncompleted transaction of which the Charity Commission have any information.

ADMIRALTY—"A DANGER IN THE PACIFIC."

MR. SETON-KARR (St. Helen's) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he has seen a statement in The St. James's Gazette of the 9th instant headed A Danger in the Pacific, and in which attention is directed to the great disparity between the Russian and English Squadrons in those waters, and which, in the words of the article—

"Is known in Singapore and Hong Kong, where they excite the gravest uneasiness, and in Russia, where they excite a corresponding degree of satisfaction;"

and, what measures he proposes to take in order to raise the British Squadron to a strength sufficient to restore public confidence in those commercial centres?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The article in question purports to give with great detail and authenticity the relative strength of the Russian and English Squadrons in that part of the Pacific which is comprised in the China Station; and it draws from the statement so given certain conclusions that are affirmed to be endorsed by the great commercial ports of Singapore and Hong Kong. Both these statements and conclusions are equally fictitious. The article asserts the Russian Squadron to be at this moment composed of four iron-clads and 10 cruisers, and that it is about to be re-inforced. The real strength of the Squadron is one iron-clad and five cruisers, and this Squadron is far inferior both in numbers and strength to the British Naval Force on the China Station alone. There are two other English Squadrons in the Pacific, one at Esquimaux and another at Sydney, making a total of three Squadrons. It is needless to add that these facts are well known, both at Singapore and Hong Kong. Sir Richard Vesey Hamilton, the late Commander-in-Chief on the China Station, has recently returned to England, and he is satisfied with the adequacy of the force on that Station.

IMPERIAL DEFENCE—THE ISLAND OF ASCENSION.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is the fact that the Island of Ascension is to be given up both as a Naval and a Health Station, and the stores to be divided between Simonstown and Sierra Leone; when such arrangement is to be carried into effect; what measures the Government propose to adopt to prevent the Island, when thus abandoned, from falling into the hands of a Foreign Power; and, whether he will give the House an opportunity of considering the policy of such abandonment before it is carried out?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing) (who replied) said: Ascension is to be abandoned as a Naval Station and Sanitarium, and this arrangement will be carried out as soon as the Naval Authorities at the Cape decide the Stations to which the stores are to be transferred. The Island will still remain a British Possession. The present course of action has been strongly advocated by the Colonial Defence Committee, a Royal Commission, and many naval officers. If the hon. Gentleman objects to the abandonment of this Island he has the opportunities available to private Members of publicly protesting against it.

PRIVATE BUSINESS—COMMITTEE ON THE "HYDERABAD DECCAN COMPANY."

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether Her Majesty's Government, in view of the interest taken in the proceedings of the "Hyderabad Deccan Company" Committee, and of the serious nature of the charges to be investigated, will take measures to enable parties interested to be heard by counsel before the Committee?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GOSST) (Chatham): The question of allowing parties interested to appear by counsel before the Committee is one entirely for the Committee and the House of Commons, with which it would be unbecoming in the Government to interfere.

THE FINANCIAL RESOLUTIONS—THE WHEEL TAX—MARKET GARDENERS.

MR. SMITH BARRY (Hunts, S.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether carts belonging to market gardeners, who are also nurserymen and florists, will be exempt from payment under the Wheel Tax?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): Yes, if they are used solely for the conveyance of fruit grown on the land of the owners of the carts.

WAR OFFICE—COMMITTEE ON EXPLOSIVES.

CAPTAIN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.) (for Lord CHARLES BERESFORD) (Marylebone, E.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has nominated the promised Committee to experiment with shell charged with high explosives; and, if not, whether, having regard to the importance of the question, he will state to the House the reason the Committee has not been nominated?

Lord George Hamilton

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The Members of the Committee on Explosives are—Sir Frederick Abel, F.R.S., Chemist to the War Department; Professor Dewar, F.R.S., Professor of Chemistry at the University of Cambridge and at the Royal Institution; and Dr. Dupré, F.R.S., Consulting Chemist to the Home Office on Explosives. They are, during the present week, making experiments with shell charged with high explosives.

CROFTERS—COLONIZATION.

MR. A. SUTHERLAND (Sutherland) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether the Government will lay upon the Table of the House the Papers in connection with the proposed scheme of emigration from the Highlands of Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): I beg to refer the hon. Member to the answer which I gave to the hon. Member for Wandsworth (Mr. Kimber) last Monday, that the Government would be prepared to give all necessary information with reference to the scheme of emigration from the Highlands before the Vote for it is taken.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) asked, whether this meant that the Government would spend the money and then come to the House for it; or would they have an opportunity of discussing the subject before the money was spent, and the people sent away?

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD: I must ask my hon. Friend to give me Notice of that Question.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF RICHARD WALFORD AND HENRY HARDWICK—DOUBTFUL CONVICTIONS.

MR. BERNARD COLERIDGE (Sheffield, Attercliffe) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that Richard Walford and Henry Hardwick were convicted in April, 1879, for shooting, and sentenced to 20 years' and 15 years' penal servitude respectively; whether he is aware that, in answer to an application on their behalf, the then Home Secretary, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), on the 23rd of August, 1880, refused to interfere with the sentences; whether he is aware that, after this refusal, two other persons then undergoing sentence for another crime confessed to having committed the crime for which Richard Walford and Henry Hardwick were then undergoing punishment, and exculpated them from all complicity; whether he is aware that, in consequence of these confessions, Richard Walford and Henry Hardwick were liberated from gaol on the 27th of February, 1883, after having undergone four years' penal servitude; whether he is aware that, on the 19th of March, 1883, the then Home Secretary, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, promised that if further proof should be given of their innocence the question of granting them a free pardon should be considered; whether further proof on affidavit has since been given to the Home Office, confirming the confessions above mentioned, and exculpating Richard Walford and Henry Hardwick; whether he is aware that in 1885 arrangements were made by the Home Office for allowing the men to report themselves by letter, and why; and, whether he is prepared, under the circumstances, to grant Richard Walford and Henry Hardwick a free pardon?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): My answer to the Questions of fact is in the affirmative, except that the two persons mentioned in the Question did not confess that they had committed the crime of which Walford and Hardwick were convicted. And that the affidavits recently sent to the Home Office did not contain any fresh evidence; but were the same as my Predecessor had considered in 1883. The privilege of reporting by letter is occasionally conferred on licence-holders, where the circumstances of the case justify any such concession. I am not prepared on these materials to depart from the decision of three of my Predecessors—that this is not a case in which the grant of a free pardon can be advised.

In answer to a further Question,

MR. MATTHEWS said, that in February, 1883, it was decided, as the case was surrounded with doubt, that the prisoners ought not to be punished any longer; but after consultation with the Judge who tried them, and the Law Officers of the Crown, the Home Secretary declined to advise that they should be pardoned.

METROPOLITAN POLICE — DISTURBANCE IN TRAFALGAR SQUARE.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been directed to the severe censure of Mr. Vaughan, at Bow Street Police Court on Wednesday the 9th, on the conduct of the police in refusing admission to certain persons at the police station on Saturday last, when they had attended to tender evidence in favour of persons charged with assault, and arrested in Trafalgar Square; and, if he will take steps to give the police magistrate's censure some practical effect?

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been drawn to the conduct of the police in Trafalgar Square on Saturday last, and to their evidence in the Bow Street Police Court, at the trial of a Mr. Thompson, on Wednesday last, alleging that stones had been thrown in the Square on that occasion; and, whether he will direct the Chief Commissioner of Police to make a special inquiry into their conduct, which elicited severe comment from Mr. Vaughan, the magistrate at Bow Street?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): The rule and the practice which ought, in my opinion, to be followed is to admit to the police station persons who apply for admission in order to testify in favour of an accused person. On some occasions this is impracticable, when crowds follow prisoners to a station. On the evidence before Mr. Vaughan I understand that he thought that the police were to blame for not having admitted certain witnesses who appeared in defence of Mr. Thompson. I have caused full inquiry to be made; and I am informed that these witnesses were kept back in the first instance as they were accompanied by a disorderly crowd pressing into the station, and when their application to be let in as witnesses was made at another part of the station premises the charges had already been taken. Mr. Vaughan informs me that he discharged the defendant Thompson because upon the whole evidence he thought the blow given by him to a police constable was accidental and not wilful. I am not aware that he censured the conduct of the police in the Square or in the Court.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM asked, whether one of the persons refused admittance was the mother of the boy, and whether she was ejected by the police with foul language?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no information to that effect. Mrs. Thompson and two men were kept back in the first instance. They then went round to the entrance in the station yard; but the Inspector told them the charge had already been taken.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM: Will the right hon. Gentleman insist on an inquiry as to whether the woman Thompson was dismissed and called by a foul epithet by the policeman, she being a perfectly respectable woman?

[No reply.]

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether Mrs. Thompson's poverty gives the police a right to call her by this foul name?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. CONYBEARE: Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to institute such an inquiry that the public concerned may have some confidence in the proceedings?

[No reply.]

MR. CONYBEARE said, that not having had any answer to that Question he would put another—whether it was a part of the duties of the police to address foul and abusive language to unoffending persons?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order! That does not arise out of the Question which stands in the name of the hon. Member.

MR. CONYBEARE: I have another Question to ask. It is whether, in view of the fact that some of us will be in Trafalgar Square to-morrow, the right hon. Gentleman will state, for the guidance of ourselves and the police, whether we have not a right to circulate in Trafalgar Square?

Mr. Matthews

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order! That again does not arise out of the Question on the Paper. If the hon. Member has an independent Question to ask, he must wait until the Questions are disposed of.

Subsequently,

MR. CONYBEARE inquired, whether the police had any authority to hustle persons when they stopped for a moment to speak to personal friends in Trafalgar Square; also, whether the police were authorized to interfere with persons who might be walking or standing in the Square, when no attempt to hold a public meeting was being made by anybody?

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Gentleman has asked me a Question to which he must be aware that the answer is obvious and can only be in one shape. If he merely puts the Question with the intention of throwing obloquy on the police, it can hardly be proper for me to answer it.

MR. CONYBEARE: I have done nothing of the kind. I have asked the Question, as I have a perfect right to do, because what I referred to happened to myself. If I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the police have no authority, then I will ask whether he will permit me to lay evidence before him, and whether he will act upon that evidence, to prove that the police did hustle inoffensive persons, and did use insolent language to them? If the right hon. Gentleman says that the police have no such authority, I shall claim protection at his hands, and ask that the police, whose conduct has been reflected upon, shall be properly punished.

[No reply.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS—ADMISSION OF STRANGERS TO THIS HOUSE.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is possible, during the Whitsuntide Recess, to give effect to some, at any rate, of the recommendations contained in the Report of the Select Committee on the Admission of Strangers?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): In answer to the Question of the hon. Member, I have to say that the Speaker would desire to be guided in the matter by the convenience of the House. The Speaker is aware of a difference of opinion as to accepting without further discussion all the decisions at which the Committee have arrived; but, pending the decision of the House, the Speaker is prepared to do this much—to throw the two Galleries, the Speaker's and Strangers', into one, thus gaining an additional row of seats, and providing admission to what would be henceforth one Gallery by the entrance in the Central Hall. All the other arrangements would go on as at present, till the House had come to a definite decision on the subject.

IRELAND—RUMOURED ESTABLISHMENT OF A CATHOLIC COLLEGE.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury a Question of which I have given him very short private Notice; and that is, whether he has seen in The Star and other evening newspapers a statement to the effect that the Government had decided on founding and endowing a Catholic College in Ireland; whether that statement is true; whether there have been any negotiations that could reasonably give rise to such a report; and what has been the tone of such negotiations, if any? It is right I should say that I regret that there has not been time to give longer Notice than I have been able to give; but I think the right hon. Gentleman will agree with me that if the answer is in the negative the sooner it is given the better.

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The hon. Gentleman gave me Notice of this Question a few minutes ago. I am sorry to say that I have not yet had an opportunity of seeing the evening papers. There is no truth in the statement that Her Majesty's Government has decided to found or endow a Roman Catholic College in Ireland, and there have been no negotiations which could reasonably give rise to such a report.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): In answer to a Question of mine on Tuesday last, the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury hinted that it might be necessary to take a Morning Sitting on Friday next. In consequence of the rapid transaction of Public Business since that Question was answered, I suppose we may take it for granted that that idea is dropped?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I should be exceedingly glad that there should be no Sitting on Friday morning next; but the right hon. Gentleman must be aware that there is usually some time consumed on the Motion for Adjournment: and as Thursday is fully appropriated for other Business, unless the House is willing to adjourn without discussion on Thursday evening, it will be necessary to have a Morning Sitting. The Business on Monday, as I have stated, will be some Irish and other Bills. I am afraid it will be necessary to have a Morning Sitting on Tuesday, unless we can reach a Motion which it will be my duty to make with reference to the Imperial defences, and on which some discussion is likely to arise. I should regret exceedingly to deprive hon. and gallant Gentlemen on either side of the House of the opportunity of which, I understand, they wish to avail themselves of debating the proposal on which the Bill will be founded to provide for the Imperial defences. Unless that is reached by 10 o'clock on Monday evening it will involve a Morning Sitting on Tuesday. On Thursday it is intended to take the Employers' Liability Bill.

In reply to Mr. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden),

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the Committee on the Local Government Bill would not be taken before the Monday after the re-assembling of the House.

MR. JOHN MORLEY said, the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) was on the Paper for Tuesday, which attracted deep interest among Members on that side of the House; and he asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would not defer his Resolution on Imperial defences until Thursday?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he understood there was a very strong desire that the Employers' Liability Bill should be read a second time before the Whitsuntide holidays; and if the Motion he proposed to make was put down for Thursday, he was afraid there was little chance of an adequate discussion on the Employers' Liability Bill.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.) said, he thought he might appeal as to the Morning Sitting on Tuesday, as those near him had done their best, especially since Easter, to facilitate the despatch of Public Business. [Mr. W. H. SMITH: Hear, hear!] He feared there would not be facilities sufficient to deal with the Bill on the eve of the Recess, as a number of his Friends had made arrangements to leave London before Thursday.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he thought that the desire to place the Bill in a secure position was greater than the contemplation of a holiday. Under the circumstances, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would be satisfied with the arrangements which had been made. He should do his best to shorten the discussion prior to his Motion on Tuesday, and keep a House, so that adequate attention might be given to the subject. He wished to endorse the remarks of the hon. Member as to the conduct of the Opposition in facilitating Public Business.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): With regard to the question of the Morning Sitting on Tuesday, in the event of the Business not concluding at 10 o'clock, may I remind the right hon. Gentleman that he has put Irish Business on the Paper for Monday which it will be wholly impossible to conclude by that hour? Might I, therefore, suggest to him that he should postpone the first Order—the Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland Bill—and then we might get on with the other Bill—the Land Law (Ireland) (Land Commission) Bill—and perhaps conclude the debate by 10 o'clock.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am exceedingly anxious to meet the convenience of hon. Members on both sides of the House; but I think it is better for the Government to adhere to the announcement that they have made.

MR. JOHN MORLEY observed that, as it appeared by the answer of the right hon. Gentleman that the Morning Sitting on Tuesday was required, not for the advancement of the Employers' Liability Bill, or for the discussion of the Motion with regard to the National defences, but for the Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland Bill, he would give Notice that when the measure was brought forward he would move the postponement of the debate.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Might I remind the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury that there is also Irish Private Business fixed for Monday? The Ulster Canal and Tyrone Navigation Bill is fixed for that day, and it will necessarily involve considerable discussion. Might I suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he would arrange with the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Armagh (Sir James Corry) to take that measure on some date after Whitsuntide, at a time when it would be more convenient to give the measure adequate time for discussion?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am exceedingly obliged to the hon. and learned Gentleman for his suggestion, and I will see what arrangement can be made.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Deputy Speaker do now leave the Chair."

NEW MEMBER TAKING HIS SEAT.

RESOLUTION.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton), in rising to move—

"That, on a new Member presenting himself with his introducers below the Bar, at the time and under the conditions specified in the Standing Order 86, Mr. Speaker, unless the House otherwise resolve, shall forthwith call such Member to the Table for the purpose of taking his seat," said, he desired to state expressly and without the slightest reserve that while in moving this Amendment it was necessary he should refer to and object, he did not complain of the ruling of Mr. Speaker Brand in his own case, or challenge that ruling as an honest interpretation of the law and practice of Parliament. He desired to acknowledge the great and generous courtesy which Mr. Speaker Brand had shown him at all times during the controversy, conducted at times during its five years' continuance under conditions of great tension. Standing Order 86, which was formerly Standing Order 62, provided that Members might point of view, because it said that the Speaker should, unless the House otherwise resolved, call the new Member to the Table for the purpose of taking the Oath. The effect of this was that the Resolution invited the House to resolve whether a Member should or should not take his seat. The former contention of the Liberal Party had been that the House had no legal right to pass a Resolution interfering between a Member and his taking the Oath; but now the hon. Member for Northampton invited the House to resolve that a new Member could not come to the Table to be sworn if the House so resolved. He would ask the hon. Member to consider whether he was not, by his Amendment, endeavouring to establish a record of a right which had never been constitutionally exercised by the House?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.) said, he desired to point out to the hon. Member for Northampton that he would hardly attain the object which he had in view by the Motion which he had brought forward. He could not contradict this—that if this Amendment which he had now moved had been a Standing Order in the beginning of the Parliament in 1886, the hon. Member would not at that moment be sitting in his place.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, that his Resolution only applied to Members elected at bye-elections; the question of Members elected at a General Election, who came to the Table uncalled and without introducers, did not arise.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he did not see what distinction there was between the two classes. The hon. Member suggested that the House should be given the right to resolve that a Member at the Bar should not be allowed to come to the Table and take the Oath. Had this Amendment been a Standing Order in 1886, certainly the Speaker could not have ruled out of Order a Motion made interposing between an hon. Member and his coming to the Table and taking the Oath. The position taken up by the present Speaker at that time had been that it was absolutely out of Order and impossible for the House to interpose between a Member coming to the Bar of the House and claiming to take the Oath, and his performance of that duty. But that ruling would have been rendered impossible under the wording of the hon.

Member's Resolution. For his own part, he could not quite make out what the hon. Member was driving at. The hon. Member seemed to imagine that it was in the power of the Speaker to refuse to call a Member to the Table of the House. But when the Speaker had refused to permit the hon. Member to take the Oath, it was in pursuance of a Resolution of the House.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, that it had been proved at the trial that at that time there was no Resolution in force; the Resolution had been Sessional, and had expired with the Session. The proceedings in question had taken place 12 or 13 days after the beginning of a new Session, and there had been no Resolution in force at that time.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he was afraid they were getting on somewhat thorny ground which he would rather avoid; but the hon. Member had then claimed to affirm, and asserted his inability to take the Oath, and in consequence of that the House had passed a certain Resolution. He would ask, however, whether there was a single other case where the Speaker had ever refused to call a Member to the Table?

MR. BRADLAUGH said, that there was only one other case, that of Wilkes, where the question arose whether the Deputy was compellable to put the Oath to him, and that was put from the Chair and decided by the House.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the hon. Member whether he thought it worth while to occupy the time of the House on a Friday afternoon in order to guard against an occurrence which had only taken place in such an extremely complicated case? Did he think that was an object for which they should pass a Resolution which invited the House to be continually interposing to prevent hon. Members from coming from the Bar to the Table? He did not think the Motion was one which would improve the position of private Members.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight) said, he was glad he had been anticipated by his right hon. and learned Friend (Sir Henry James) in pointing out to the hon. Member for Northampton that he could not effect any really useful object by putting his Amendment in writing on the records of the House. If agreed to it would be merely an enunciation of what was accepted as the unwritten law. With the exception of what had taken place in the last Parliament, there was only one case in which such a question had ever arisen. As a matter of practice of Parliament, the Speaker invariably did call to the Table any new Member who presented himself at the Bar with his introducers at the proper time. He did not think that, in the circumstances, this proposed Amendment would have affected the question in 1886, if it had then been a Standing Order of the House. He certainly thought that the words "unless the House otherwise resolve" were necessary for the protection of the Speaker; and if the hon. Member was of opinion that there was any good purpose to be served by having this Resolution put on the Standing Orders of the House, Her Majesty's Government would have no objection. He did not, however, believe that it was anything more than a declaration of the unwritten law of the House, or that there was any necessity for the Resolution.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, that he should certainly deem it to be his duty to press the Resolution, as he saw an advantage in it.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) said, he considered that the hon. Member for Northampton was more justified than the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) seemed to think in asking the House to put this Amendment upon the record, even though the case might not have often arisen; because as long as so ingenious a Member as the noble Lord remained in that Assembly he could imagine that his hon. Friend must be anxious that every possible security should be taken against the repetition of the proceedings which had taken place in 1880. He joined with his right hon. and learned Friend (Sir Henry James) in regretting that the hon. Member for Northampton had assented to the insertion of the words "unless the House otherwise resolve;" because he feared that the Resolution, with those words of limitation, would leave gentlemen in a worse position than they were in at the present moment. If his hon. Friend could see his way to removing those words, he would more willingly and cheerfully approve the passing of the Resolution; but if the Government said that without those words they could not accept it, then, of course, he would rather have the Resolution with than without them. If, however, such words were now inserted, they would give a false impression of the true position of the right of an hon. Member on being returned to Parliament to come to the Table for the purpose of taking his seat.

MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford) said, he hoped the House would give the strongest opposition to this Motion; it was admitted to be absolutely unnecessary, and therefore ought not to be allowed a place among the Standing Orders. It required, however, a more full consideration before even this could be safely asserted; and in the absence of the Leader of the House and of those responsible for the Standing Orders of the House, he should certainly vote against the Resolution.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 147; Noes 152: Majority 5.—(Div. List, No. 103.)

Question proposed,

"That the words 'on a new Member presenting himself with his introducers below the Bar, at the time and under the conditions specified in the Standing Order 86, Mr. Speaker, unless the House otherwise resolve, shall forthwith call such Member to the Table for the purpose of taking his seat,' be there added."

SIR HENRY JAMES, in moving, as an Amendment, the omission of the words "unless the House otherwise resolve," said, if these words were maintained he feared they would undo all the work of the bulk of the Liberal Party from 1880 to 1885, as they would confer a right upon any Member to move that another Member should not take his seat. The position of the Liberal Party had been that such a power would be in opposition to the Constitutional rights of constituencies to return Members to the House. If they struck out the words there would be left a colourless Resolution, the passing or rejection of which was of no moment or importance.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out the words "unless the House otherwise resolve."—(Sir Henry James.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment,"

Sir Richard Webster

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that the Amendment just moved rightly showed what an awkward position the House had got into by doing what he ventured to say it never ought to do—namely, lightly and unreflectingly tamper with its Standing Orders. He wished, without discourtesy, to remonstrate with the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) on this point. The Government had put down Supply, and had told the House that Supply would be taken till 12 o'clock. The hon. Member for Northampton then moved his Resolution affecting the Standing Orders of the House; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir Henry James), who was one of the first authorities on this matter, objected, and asked the House not to agree to it. The Attorney General admitted that the Resolution was wholly unnecessary, but said he would agree to it, and the result was that the Government knocked down and destroyed their own Motion for going into Supply. Such conduct on the part of the Government with regard to Supply was absolutely unprecedented. He should not have objected if the Motion carried had been a Motion calculated to increase the efficiency of the Orders of the House of Commons; but it was admitted by the Government that the Resolution was unnecessary. He appealed to the First Lord of the Treasury to reconsider the position of the Government. He was certain that if the First Lord followed the argument which was put forward by the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, he would see that the proposed alteration of the Standing Orders was not one which could be agreed to in a hurry and without mature reflection. It would be far better to negative the whole Resolution, and set up Supply again. He would make a very earnest and strong appeal to the First Lord to consider the suggestion he now made in the interests of the House of Commons.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, he greatly regretted that urgent business compelled him to be absent from the House during the last few minutes, and that he had not had the advantage of listening to the debate. When he saw the Motion of the hon. Member for Northampton he thought it better to communicate with the Speaker and take his opinion upon it. The opinion which the Government entertained was that the Resolution was totally unnecessary; but, as the hon. Gentleman pressed it, and as the Speaker was of opinion, as he interpreted that opinion, that it was perfectly innocuous, he did not think it necessary to oppose the Resolution. The House had suffered great disadvantage from the absence of the Speaker from the debate. He did not think that the noble Lord was justified in reproaching him for his absence and for the course he thought it right to take. The desire which he had to put forward Public Business did not lead him to oppose any perfectly innocuous Motion when he was assured by high authority that it was innocuous and unnecessary. But he thought that it would be desirable that the question should not now be settled, and that they should reject the proposal and leave the hon. Member for Northampton to bring it forward at another opportunity. [Mr. LABOUCHERE: When?] His noble Friend the Member for South Paddington did not seem to be fully aware of the fact that a Motion on going into Committee of Supply was often accepted, and Supply, according to custom, was immediately set up again, so that it would be competent even if the House accepted the Resolution to set up Supply again. He trusted that for the present at least the House would not put the Resolution upon the Order Book.

MR. JOHN MORLEY said, that the change of mind on the part of Her Majesty's Ministers was the most extraordinary he had ever seen. It was only a few minutes since that the Attorney General assured the House that the Government were prepared to assent to the Resolution as it stood.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: The right hon. Gentleman will pardon me. I stated distinctly on behalf of the Government that, in our opinion, the Resolution was unnecessary. It was not because we thought it necessary that we were prepared to assent to it, but for the reasons explained by the First Lord of the Treasury.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: But the hon. and learned Gentleman voted for the Motion.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: Because I was not going back upon my statement.

MR. JOHN MORLEY said, he hoped that the hon. and learned Gentleman would persist in that frame of mind. There was an extraordinary inconsistency in the position taken up by the noble Lord. The noble Lord and the First Lord of the Treasury said at one moment that the Resolution was harmless and innocuous.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I did not say it was harmless or innocuous. I suggested rather the reverse; I pointed out that it might have mischievous consequences.

MR. JOHN MORLEY said, that diametrically opposite positions were taken up by Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House. The First Lord of the Treasury and the Attorney General said that the Resolution was innocuous, and the noble Lord in his last speech said that it made a grave alteration in the Standing Orders. In his opinion, the Resolution would simply place on record what was the practice and custom of the House, only once broken in the last century and once in the Parliament of 1880, chiefly at the instance of the noble Lord himself. His right hon. and learned Friend had moved the omission of the words which he ventured to object to; and he hoped that his hon. Friend the Member for Northampton would assent to the Amendment.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, that he had listened to the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury with considerable pain. Whatever difference of opinion he had had with hon. Gentlemen sitting opposite, he thought that every arrangement entered into would be carried out by them to its full extent. He had now learned that an arrangement deliberately made one evening might be broken by the Government under pressure from the noble Lord. He thanked the right hon. Gentleman for releasing him from his part of the arrangement. He was now free. The words proposed to be left out were not his. For two years this Resolution had stood upon the Paper without them. The Resolution had not been lightly and suddenly sprung upon the House. For four weeks it had been upon the Order Book in the place which it was entitled to occupy, and for two years it stood among the Procedure Rules. It was one of the very first matters which he submitted to the authorities connected with the House when he knew that Procedure would come up for discussion. He did not want these words. He hailed with delight the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman; and if the First Lord had not broken the complete arrangement made on the previous night, he should have perhaps found himself bound to vote against his own words, holding himself honourably bound by the arrangement which he believed the Government would honourably fulfil. He had striven, in moving his Resolution, to avoid every memory, bitter as many of them were, connected with this struggle. He let fall no word that could imply the slightest sort of imputation upon any person directly or indirectly connected with it. He thanked the noble Lord for the honesty of his declaration, and he would like to see the Resolution rejected entirely. The noble Lord alleged that the Resolution was absolutely unnecessary. But this was clearly not true. If such a Resolution had been upon the Books it would have been needless for him to figure as disorderly before the world, and for the Attorney General to bring the three counts against him for the recovery of £1,500, nor could the three questions he had read have been left to the jury. [LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL was understood to dissent from something the hon. Member had said.] The noble Lord should hardly differ from him on a question of fact, for he had many reasons for recollecting what had occurred. The matter had nearly ruined him; on account of it he now stood deeply in debt; and it was to prevent others being placed in that position that he now moved this Resolution. He felt the generosity even of his foes during the period since he had taken his seat; and it could not be said that he had in any fashion presumed upon the indulgence the House had shown him. He regretted that the First Lord of the Treasury, having had time to consider this Resolution, should have allowed himself to be influenced by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington to go back from a distinct arrangement made last night. It was perfectly accurate that the right hon. and learned Member for Bury had in that House, as he himself had in the Law Courts, disputed the Constitutional right of the LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that the Amendment just moved rightly showed what an awkward position the House had got into by doing what he ventured to say it never ought to do—namely, lightly and unreflectingly tamper with its Standing Orders. He wished, without discourtesy, to remonstrate with the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) on this point. The Government had put down Supply, and had told the House that Supply would be taken till 12 o'clock. The hon. Member for Northampton then moved his Resolution affecting the Standing Orders of the House; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir Henry James), who was one of the first authorities on this matter, objected, and asked the House not to agree to it. The Attorney General admitted that the Resolution was wholly unnecessary, but said he would agree to it, and the result was that the Government knocked down and destroyed their own Motion for going into Supply. Such conduct on the part of the Government with regard to Supply was absolutely unprecedented. He should not have objected if the Motion carried had been a Motion calculated to increase the efficiency of the Orders of the House of Commons; but it was admitted by the Government that the Resolution was unnecessary. He appealed to the First Lord of the Treasury to reconsider the position of the Government. He was certain that if the First Lord followed the argument which was put forward by the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, he would see that the proposed alteration of the Standing Orders was not one which could be agreed to in a hurry and without mature reflection. It would be far better to negative the whole Resolution, and set up Supply again. He would make a very earnest and strong appeal to the First Lord to consider the suggestion he now made in the interests of the House of Commons.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, he greatly regretted that urgent business compelled him to be absent from the House during the last few minutes, and that he had not had the advantage of listening to the debate. When he saw the Motion of the hon. Member for Northampton he thought it better to communicate with the Speaker and take his opinion upon it. The opinion which the Government entertained was that the Resolution was totally unnecessary; but, as the hon. Gentleman pressed it, and as the Speaker was of opinion, as he interpreted that opinion, that it was perfectly innocuous, he did not think it necessary to oppose the Resolution. The House had suffered great disadvantage from the absence of the Speaker from the debate. He did not think that the noble Lord was justified in reproaching him for his absence and for the course he thought it right to take. The desire which he had to put forward Public Business did not lead him to oppose any perfectly innocuous Motion when he was assured by high authority that it was innocuous and unnecessary. But he thought that it would be desirable that the question should not now be settled, and that they should reject the proposal and leave the hon. Member for Northampton to bring it forward at another opportunity. [Mr. LABOUCHERE: When?] His noble Friend the Member for South Paddington did not seem to be fully aware of the fact that a Motion on going into Committee of Supply was often accepted, and Supply, according to custom, was immediately set up again, so that it would be competent even if the House accepted the Resolution to set up Supply again. He trusted that for the present at least the House would not put the Resolution upon the Order Book.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY said, that the change of mind on the part of Her Majesty's Ministers was the most extraordinary he had ever seen. It was only a few minutes since that the Attorney General assured the House that the Government were prepared to assent to the Resolution as it stood.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: The right hon. Gentleman will pardon me. I stated distinctly on behalf of the Government that, in our opinion, the Resolution was unnecessary. It was not because we thought it necessary that we were prepared to assent to it, but for the reasons explained by the First Lord of the Treasury.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY: But the hon. and learned Gentleman voted for the Motion.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: Because I was not going back upon my statement, out the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman. Most certainly they did not understand the hon. and learned Gentleman in that sense on that side of the House. He (Mr. T. M. Healy) never remembered anything like the present mess. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir Henry James) had hit an obvious blot when he proposed that these obnoxious words should not be left in the Resolution. The Resolution had been accepted by the House on the faith of the experience of the "high contracting" parties; but ought not this to be a warning to them all against making arrangements with the Government? He would not vote for the Resolution as it stood, because it asserted for the House a right which was never claimed until it was asserted by Sir Drummond Wolff's famous Motion—namely, to stop a new Member from going to the Table. The adoption of the Resolution, as it stood, would appear to confer on the House a right it had never possessed—it would surrender the immemorial right of an elected Member to come to the Table to be sworn.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, N.) said, he had voted for the Resolution, but the arguments had shown him that he had voted wrongly, for the Resolution as it stood asserted that the House had a right to stand between a man who was elected and the constituency who elected him, a proposition from which he entirely dissented. He trusted the Amendment would now be carried, as that was the only way to cure the evil.

Question put, and negatived.

Question proposed,

"That the words 'on a new Member presenting himself with his introducers below the bar, at the time and under the conditions specified in the Standing Order 86, Mr. Speaker shall forthwith call such Member to the Table for the purpose of taking his seat,' be there added."

MR. T. M. HEALY wished to know what course the Government were now going to pursue? After the arrangement which they had made with the hon. Member for Northampton, were they going to turn round and stultify themselves by voting against the Resolution, because, with their connivance, certain words had been removed from it? Not having disputed the Amendment of the right hon. and learned

Member for Bury, they surely could not intend to defeat the Resolution because that Amendment had been carried.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg) said, that when the right hon. and learned Member for Bury proposed that the words "unless the House otherwise resolve" should be struck out of the Resolution, the Government accepted the proposal at once. [An hon. MEMBER: No.] The hon. Member's memory was even shorter than usual—which was saying a great deal. The Government, having agreed to the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Member for Bury, could not make that agreement a ground for breaking their engagement with the hon. Member for Northampton.

MR. W. W. H. SMITH said, he was not surprised that the hon. and learned Gentleman should have amused himself by making a speech on this occasion. [Cries of "Oh!" "Hear, hear," and Mr. J. E. ELLIS: What impertinence!] The comment had reached him, but he thought it unworthy of answer.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): The hon. and learned Member had a perfect right to make a speech in this House.

MR. W. H. SMITH (resuming) said, he had explained before the last Question was put that if the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Member for Bury were agreed to, the Government must vote against the Resolution. The hon. Member for Northampton had claimed to be perfectly free to vote upon the Amendment as he might think fit, and consequently the Government had regained their freedom also. The words proposed to be omitted by the right hon. and learned Member for Bury having been struck out of the Resolution, the Government must vote against it.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, that what he stated was, that if the Government adhered to their engagement, he felt bound to vote for the insertion of the words, but that, as he thought the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman released him from the engagement, he should support the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury, because the words objected to were introduced by him at the last moment on the understanding that the Government would accept the proposal if worded in that way.

Mr. T. M. Healy

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 152 ; Noes 180 : Majority 28.

AYES.

Abraham, W. (Limerick, W.)	Jacoby, J. A.
Acland, A. H. D.	Joicey, J.
Anderson, C. H.	Kay-Shuttleworth, rt. hon. Sir U. J.
Asher, A.	Kenny, C. S.
Asquith, H. H.	Kilbride, D.
Balfour, rt. hon. J. B.	Labouchere, H.
Balfour, Sir G.	Lalor, R.
Barbour, W. B.	Lawson, Sir W.
Barran, J.	Leahy, J.
Biggar, J. G.	Lefevre, rt. hn. G. J. S.
Bolton, J. C.	Lockwood, F.
Bright, Jacob	Lyell, L.
Broadhurst, H.	Lymington, Viscount
Bruce, hon. R. P.	Mackintosh, C. F.
Brunner, J. T.	M'Arthur, A.
Buchanan, T. R.	M'Donald, P.
Cameron, J. M.	M'Donald, Dr. R.
Campbell, Sir G.	M'Ewan, W.
Campbell, H.	M'Kenna, Sir J. N.
Campbell-Bannerman, right hon. H.	M'Lagan, P.
Carew, J. L.	Mahony, P.
Channing, F. A.	Mappin, Sir F. T.
Childers, right hon. H. C. E.	Marjoribanks, rt. hon. E.
Coleridge, hon. B.	Menzies, R. S.
Colman, J. J.	Mildmay, F. B.
Conway, M.	Montagu, S.
Conybeare, C. A. V.	Morgan, rt. hn. G. O.
Cozens-Hardy, H. H.	Morgan, O. V.
Craig, J.	Morley, rt. hon. J.
Crawford, W.	Nolan, J.
Crilly, D.	O'Brien, P. J.
Dillwyn, L. L.	O'Connor, A.
Duff, R. W.	O'Connor, J.
Ellis, J.	O'Connor, T. P.
Ellis, J. E.	O'Keeffe, F. A.
Ellis, T. E.	Palmer, Sir C. M.
Emblemont, P.	Paulton, J. M.
Farquharson, Dr. R.	Pease, A. E.
Fenwick, C.	Pease, H. F.
Ferguson, R. C. Munro-	Pickersgill, E. H.
Finucane, J.	Picton, J. A.
Flower, C.	Plowden, Sir W. C.
Flynn, J. C.	Potter, T. B.
Feley, P. J.	Powell, W. R. H.
Foljambe, C. G. S.	Power, R.
Fox, Dr. J. F.	Price, T. P.
Fry, T.	Priestley, B.
Hill, T. P.	Pugh, D.
Gladstone, H. J.	Randell, D.
Goldsmid, Sir J.	Rathbone, W.
Graham, R. C.	Reed, Sir E. J.
Grey, Sir E.	Roberts, J.
Gully, W. C.	Roberts, J. B.
Haldane, R. B.	Robinson, T.
Harrington, E.	Roe, T.
Harris, M.	Roscoe, Sir H. E.
Hayden, L. P.	Rowlands, J.
Healy, M.	Rowntree, J.
Healy, T. M.	Russell, Sir C.
Hennessy, right hon. E.	Samuelson, Sir B.
Howell, G.	Shaw, T.
Hoyle, L.	Sheehan, J. D.
Hunter, W. A.	Simon, Sir J.
Mingworth, A.	Spencer, hon. C. R.
	Stack, J.

Stanhope, hon. P. J.
 Stansfeld, rt. hon. J.
 Stevenson, F. S.
 Stevenson, J. C.
 Sullivan, D.
 Summers, W.
 Sutherland, A.
 Swinburne, Sir J.
 Tanner, C. K.
 Thomas, A.
 Thomas, D. A.
 Vivian, Sir H. H.
 Waddy, S. D.

Wallace, R.
 Warmington, C. M.
 Wayman, T.
 West, Colonel W. C.
 Whitbread, S.
 Will, J. S.
 Williams, A. J.
 Williamson, S.
 Wilson, C. H.
 Wright, O.

TELLERS.

Bradlaugh, C.
 Burt, T.

NOES.

Addison, J. E. W.	Cranborne, Viscount
Agg-Gardner, J. T.	Cross, H. S.
Ainslie, W. G.	Crossman, Gen. Sir W.
Allsopp, hon. P.	Cubitt, right hon. G.
Anstruther, Colonel R. H. L.	Curzon, Viscount
Ashmead-Bartlett, E.	Dalrymple, Sir C.
Baden-Powell, Sir G. S.	Darling, C. J.
Bailey, Sir J. R.	De Lisle, E. J. L. M. P.
Baird, J. G. A.	Dimsdale, Baron R.
Balfour, rt. hon. A. J.	Dorington, Sir J. E.
Baring, T. C.	Dugdale, J. S.
Bartley, G. C. T.	Duncombe, A.
Barttelot, Sir W. B.	Dyke, rt. hn. Sir W. H.
Bates, Sir E.	Egerton, hon. A. J. F.
Baumann, A. A.	Egerton, hon. A. de T.
Bazley-White, J.	Elliot, G. W.
Beach, right hon. Sir M. E. Hicks-	Ewart, Sir W.
Beadel, W. J.	Fergusson, right hon. Sir J.
Beaumont, H. F.	Field, Admiral E.
Beckett, W.	Fielden, T.
Bentinck, rt. hn. G. C.	Fitzgerald, R. U. P.
Bentinck, W. G. C.	Fitz - Wygram, Gen. Sir F. W.
Beresford, Lord C. W. De la Poer	Fletcher, Sir H.
Ethell, Commander G. R.	Folkestone, right hon. Viscount
Birkbeck, Sir E.	Forwood, A. B.
Blundell, Colonel H. B. H.	Fowler, Sir R. N.
Borthwick, Sir A.	Gathorne-Hardy, hon. J. S.
Bridgeman, Col. hon. F. O.	Gilliat, J. S.
Bristowe, T. L.	Goldsworthy, Major-General W. T.
Brodrick, hon. W. St. J. F.	Gorst, Sir J. E.
Brookfield, A. M.	Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.
Brooks, Sir W. C.	Gray, C. W.
Bruce, Lord H.	Green, Sir E.
Burdett-Coutts, W. L. Ash.-B.	Greene, E.
Burghley, Lord	Grimston, Viscount
Caldwell, J.	Grotrian, F. B.
Campbell, Sir A.	Hamilton, right hon. Lord G. F.
Carmarthen, Marq. of	Hamilton, Lord C. J.
Churchill, rt. hn. Lord R. H. S.	Hamilton, Col. C. E.
Clarke, Sir E. G.	Hankey, F. A.
Coghill, D. H.	Heath, A. R.
Colomb, Capt. J. C. R.	Herbert, hon. S.
Commerell, Adml. Sir J. E.	Hill, right hon. Lord A. W.
Compton, F.	Hill, Colonel E. S.
Corbett, A. C.	Hill, A. S.
Corbett, J.	Houldsworth, Sir W. H.
Corry, Sir J. P.	Howard, J.
	Howorth, H. H.
	Hozier, J. H. C.
	Hubbard, hon. E.
	Hughes, Colonel E.

Hughes - Hallett, Col.	Mulholland, H. L.
F. C.	Muncaster, Lord
Hulse, E. H.	Norris, E. S.
Hunt, F. S.	O'Neill, hon. R. T.
Hunter, Sir W. G.	Parker, hon. F.
Isaacs, L. H.	Powell, F. S.
Isaacson, F. W.	Puleston, Sir J. H.
Jackson, W. L.	Raikes, rt. hon. H. C.
Jennings, L. J.	Rankin, J.
Kelly, J. R.	Rasch, Major F. C.
Kennaway, Sir J. H.	Richardson, T.
Kenyon - Slaney, Col.	Ridley, Sir M. W.
W.	Ritchie, rt. hon. C. T.
Kerans, F. H.	Robertson, Sir W. T.
Kimber, H.	Rollit, Sir A. K.
Knatchbull-Hugessen,	Round, J.
H. T.	Russell, T. W.
Knowles, L.	Salt, T.
Lafone, A.	Sandys, Lieut-Col. T.
Laurie, Colonel R. P.	M.
Lawrence, Sir J. J. T.	Selwyn, Capt. C. W.
Lawrence, W. F.	Seton-Karr, H.
Lea, T.	Shaw-Stewart, M. H.
Lechmere, Sir E. A. H.	Sidebotham, J. W.
Legh, T. W.	Sinclair, W. P.
Leighton, S.	Smith, rt. hon. W. H.
Lethbridge, Sir R.	Stanhope, rt. hon. E.
Lewis, Sir C. E.	Stephens, H. C.
Lewisham, right hon.	Stewart, M. J.
Viscount	Swetenham, E.
Long, W. H.	Temple, Sir R.
Lowther, hon. W.	Tomlinson, W. E. M.
Lowther, J. W.	Townsend, F.
Macdonald, right hon.	Tyler, Sir H. W.
J. H. A.	Vernon, hon. G. R.
Maclean, F. W.	Vincent, Col. C. E. H.
Maclean, J. M.	Webster, Sir R. E.
Makins, Colonel W. T.	Webster, R. G.
Mallock, R.	Whitley, E.
Maple, J. B.	Whitmore, C. A.
Matthews, rt. hon. H.	Wood, N.
Mattinson, M. W.	Wortley, C. B. Stuart-
Mayne, Admiral R. C.	Wright, H. S.
Moss, R.
Mowbray, rt. hon. Sir	TELLERS.
J. R.	Douglas, A. Akers-
Mowbray, R. G. C.	Walrond, Col. W. H.

Amendment proposed, after the word, "That," in the original Question, to add the words, "this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

Amendment agreed to.

Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Deputy Speaker do now leave the Chair."

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA IN CATTLE.

RESOLUTION.

MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.) said, in rising to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice, he wished to point out that it was of the highest importance that experimental inquiry should be made into the characteristics of pleuro-pneumonia, for the ravages of the disease had been extending by leaps and bounds. In Scotland alone, the number of outbreaks in 1884 was 55; in 1885, there were 60; in 1886, 94, and in 1887 there were 339 outbreaks. He begged to call special attention to the striking increase between 1886 and 1887. The outbreaks were, of course, attended with great loss, which he thought might be fairly divided into three categories. First there was the loss to the ratepayers generally; and he ventured to remind hon. Members that the loss consequent upon this increase of the disease fell both upon occupiers and landlords, as both were rated equally for the compensation. In 1884, the compensation amounted to £5,581; in 1885, it was £10,391; in 1886, it was £15,131, and in 1887, the amount was £34,593. The House would, therefore, see that the loss to the ratepayers was something enormous. In the next place, there was the loss to the farmers, and especially to the dairy farmers, for whom, as well as for the ratepayers, he particularly spoke. In Lanarkshire they were engaged in supplying milk to the Glasgow market. Under recent regulations, the dairy farmer was not allowed to re-stock for 56 days; but even if he were allowed to re-stock at once an outbreak of disease was in many cases absolutely ruinous to him, because his customers, finding his supply cease, went elsewhere, and the trade which he had built up only by degrees was destroyed at one fell swoop. No amount of monetary compensation could make up for it. Thirdly, the loss fell upon the country at large, by the destruction of much of the best cattle and stock in the Kingdom. The Highland and Agricultural Society appointed a Committee last year, which, in the recently issued report, pointed out that there were certain questions which could not be definitely answered without practical experiments. These were the questions:—

"(1) How pleuro-pneumonia is propagated, and how long it may remain latent. (2) How far the disease may be carried, and what may be considered an infected area. (3) Whether the infection can be resident in places such as cowhouses, trucks, boats, or pens which diseased animals have recently occupied. (4) At what stage of the disease it begins to be infectious, and whether it can be detected before that period. (5) Whether inoculation gives permanent protection against the disease, or for how long it may be capable of doing so. (6) Whether an animal that has been inoculated can six weeks or more thereafter propagate the disease."

Now, the Committee of the Highland and Agricultural Society, which was composed of very able and experienced men, quite as much so as is the Committee at the present time sitting, came to the conclusion that these questions could not be satisfactorily answered in the present state of knowledge without experiment. A deputation originally initiated by Lanarkshire, but in the end representative of almost every Local Authority in Scotland, waited upon Lord Cranbrook on the 19th of March to press these views. He received it most courteously, and gave a most satisfactory answer to the effect that the points upon which inquiry was proposed to take place had been set forth very clearly, that if an inquiry were constituted, as he hoped it soon would be, it would be upon a system which would, as far as possible, bring to light all the matters to which the deputation referred, and others which might arise for examination. It was gathered from those words that the inquiry was to be such as the deputation demanded, and they went away satisfied, taking it for granted that there would be a real series of practical experiments in inoculation, and also into all the characteristics of the disease; but, after some delay, a Committee, which was little more than a Departmental one, was appointed, and was so constituted as to be absolutely under the influence of official experts. He well knew the enormous value of expert opinion. He had the very highest respect for official experts; but he was a little doubtful as to whether his respect did not fall slightly short of the respect they had for themselves. He had an idea that when an official represented the collective wisdom of such an important body as the Committee of the Privy Council, he might get a little beyond himself. He considered him, although an omnipotent, not necessarily an omniscient being. Now, under the guidance of the official expert and other advisers of the Department, it had been decided that no experiments should be carried out by the Committee. It was not easy to know clearly what was going on. As far as could be gathered from the meagre details supplied to the public, the Committee was chiefly employed in re-threshing the evidence which had already been threshed out by the Highland and Agricultural Society. He would be told that the Committee was not qualified to conduct experiments. But that was hardly a proof that the Committee was an eminently satisfactory one. Then he would, probably, be told that exhaustive experiments had been already conducted. He would like to ask when they were conducted; because he had a suspicion that it would be found that no real experiments had been carried out for 30 years? Moreover, to what extent had the experiments gone, and were they conclusive? Had they gone far enough to give definite knowledge of the value, whether great or little, of inoculation? Many foreign countries, and many of our own Colonies, were far in advance of us in knowledge on that point. In the Cape Colonies inoculation was almost universal, as also in Australia and Holland, where it had been found very beneficial. His own information respecting Queensland enabled him to say that no wise cattle owner there ever thought of sending a mob of cattle to the ports without having them inoculated. Further, and more especially, he asked whether the experiments had been sufficient to give us clear and definite information respecting the very nature and the very characteristics of the disease itself; did they suffice to give definite answers to the questions put forward by the Highland and Agricultural Society? To that he most emphatically and decidedly said "No." He had himself carefully looked into the matter, and he was strongly of opinion that no definite answers could be given to the questions put forward. For instance, he wished to know whether the experiments hitherto conducted enabled us to give any clear definition of what was meant by "contact." He would read the Slaughter Order of the 6th of March, 1888, which was in substance applicable to Ireland as well as England and Scotland. It was that—

"1. A local authority shall cause all cattle being or having been in the same field, shed, or other place, or in the same herd, or otherwise in contact with cattle affected with pleuro-pneumonia, to be slaughtered within ten days after the fact of their having been so in contact has been ascertained, or within such further period as the Privy Council may in any case direct. 2. A local authority shall cause all cattle which have been certified by an inspector of the Privy Council to have been in any way exposed to the infection of pleuro-pneumonia to be slaughtered within such period as the Privy Council may direct."

It was to these two paragraphs that he wished to call the attention of his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. Long), who, in addition to his multifarious duties in connection with local government, had also the arduous task of solely representing the Agricultural Department in that House. That obligation could not have fallen into better hands, for he (Mr. Hozier) could truly say that no one in the House understood more about agriculture than his hon. Friend, and he was sure the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) would except him, at an rate, from the charge he made that no one on the Treasury Bench knew the difference between a horse and a cow. He (Mr. Hozier) regarded his hon. Friend as peculiarly fitted to be at the head of the new Agricultural Department, which he earnestly trusted would be soon established. But high as was his opinion of his hon. Friend, he ventured to defy him to give a definite answer as to what was meant by the words, "otherwise in contact" or "in any way exposed to infection;" and yet it must be borne in mind that upon that word "contact" depended the whole working of the Act. A hundred Veterinary Inspectors were examined by the Highland and Agricultural Society, and they varied to an enormous extent in their opinions. Some declared that the animals must touch before they can be infected; others that infection could be communicated at a distance of from half a-mile to four miles. There was also the same divergence of opinion with regard to disinfection, how far it was necessary, and in what it consisted. And yet the slaughter order was administered by these very Veterinary Inspectors who held these diametrically opposed views. How could there be uniformity of administration if there was no uniformity of opinion. He was far from saying that the present Committee of Inquiry was useless; on the contrary, he thought it might lead to several very desirable results, such as the rescinding of certain regulations which at present embarrassed the dairy farmer; for instance, he earnestly hoped that some arrangement might be come to by which they could keep their stock on condition that it did not leave the farms. That was one way in which the Committee might be of use. But the inquiry of the Committee did not go far enough or deep enough, and he could truly state that he echoed the minds of the dairy farmers in Scotland, when he said that in order to give real satisfaction to the agricultural community, it was absolutely indispensable that a series of exhaustive experiments should be instituted without delay to clear up points on which we were at present most lamentably in the dark.

Mr. Hozier

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) said, he rose with much pleasure to second the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for South Lanarkshire (Mr. Hozier), because, like him, he felt deeply the National importance of this question, and because, perhaps, his hon. Friend and himself represented the county which was more than any other interested in cattle rearing. All the scientific investigation which had taken place simply led to two great practical points; what was to be done to prevent the disease called pleuro-pneumonia, and what was to be done when it had established itself amongst our cattle? He was very glad, indeed, that in deference to the wishes of the Deputation, which waited on the noble Lord the Lord President of the Council (Lord Cranbrook), this Committee had been appointed, and, although the Committee was a fairly representative one, the scope of the inquiry was not so wide as he should liked to have seen. They knew quite well what were the remedies for the disease among the farmers. They were strongly imbued with the idea that it should be stamped out at once, and that in this way a clean bill of health could be got for the country once more. And, it was well known that this had been successful with the rinderpest which had threatened to exterminate horned cattle in this country, and they knew that the process, in order to be successful, must be applied, not partially but universally, and he believed his hon. Friend would confirm the statement that £10,000 had been spent in Aberdeenshire, where the disease had nearly been exterminated, but had been unfortunately re-introduced from a neighbouring county. He should be sorry to think that any inquiry into the subject of inoculation should have the effect of preventing the stamping out process which they advocated; still he thought there ought to be elaborate experiments made in connection with inoculation, a process which they knew was very patiently endured by cattle, although sometimes the tail sloughed off, where the operation was not scientifically performed. He thought it would be well that in addition to the plan of stamping out, there should be some other form of remedy for this great pestilence. No one could deny the advisability of experiments being made. A Committee was appointed by the House to consider the experiments of Pasteur, and it was placed beyond the question that the method of Pasteur was successful. Mr. Rutherford, of Edinburgh, had inoculated cattle with great success, and inoculation had been carried on abroad with great success. He considered they ought to take the opportunity of the sitting of the present Committee to have certain experiments made with a view of finding out the scope and extent of inoculation, for there were many points in connection with the system upon which the information was not complete. What he said was:—"Continue to stamp out the disease vigorously, thoroughly, and universally—get rid of the disease if they could, and, perhaps the present plan might be successful, but, at the same time, let them have the proposed experiments, because, not only might they be scientifically interesting, but eventually be found to be practically useful."

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "no Committee of Inquiry into Pleuro-pneumonia in Cattle will be satisfactory which is not specially empowered to conduct practical experiments, with the view of ascertaining the value of inoculation, and the characteristics of the disease."—(Mr. Hozier.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

SIR ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL (Renfrew, W.) said, he hoped the Government would take the opportunity of testing the various modes by which they hoped to be able to get rid of that barbarous process of stamping out disease by means of the pole-axe. He did not think this could be done without exhaustive inquiries on the spot. He had been making inquiries as to the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, and as to the various views that were held by the authorities on the subject of inoculation. He found that there was a great consensus of opinion to the effect that if they could arrive at a means of preventing the spread of pleuro-pneumonia without having recourse to the pole-axe, it would be an immense benefit to the country. But he did not think this could be done without experiments, and he trusted the Government would see their way to spend a certain sum of money in making experiments. These experiments might cost £10,000 or £20,000 a-year for two or three years, but they would be well worth the trouble. If they were able to find an alternative to the pole-axe, they should be able to save far more in their flocks and herds than they would lose by the expenditure of money in the way he had indicated. He was fully alive to the importance of stamping out the disease, but he believed they would never get the people to second their efforts in stamping out the disease unless they felt quite sure that it was the only remedy which could be applied. Therefore, he was very anxious the people themselves should be taught by experiment—if there were no other remedies except stamping out—that that was the only remedy that could be adopted, and then they would co-operate with the authorities in endeavouring to reduce the disease within limits.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.) said, that the hon. Baronet the Member for Renfrewshire (Sir Alexander Campbell) had stated that the people would not co-operate with us in stamping out pleuro-pneumonia until they were satisfied that there was no other remedy than the pole-axe. But at the present time there was no other remedy. Inoculation had not yet been found to be useful, and in the meantime very great destruction was going on. Aberdeenshire had complied with the instructions of the Privy Council by stamping out the disease, and the vigorous manner in which they had attacked it was the salvation of the county; but in consequence of a neighbouring county acting in a dilatory and less vigorous way upon the principle of trying milder remedies, one or two animals were brought into Aberdeenshire from outside, and the consequence was there had been a loss of something like £6,000. Unless they should have vigorous co-operation in the neighbouring counties they would have spent £10,000 in Aberdeenshire and have the disease brought in again by means of people who were trifling with inoculation. So far as he was aware, we had never imported pleuro-pneumonia; we were never free from it, and always had the disease either in Ireland, England, or Scotland; and, if that were so, we owed it to ourselves, and it was our duty to stamp it out. Stamping out, monstrous and destructive as it was, was the only remedy yet devised. The hon. Member who moved the Motion (Mr. Hozier) had somewhat thrown discredit on the present Committee; but he (Mr. Esslemont) thought the hon. Member should take the investigations of the Committee for what they were worth, and not throw discredit upon them. He hoped there would be co-operation throughout the whole of the United Kingdom in stamping out the disease without interfering with the scientific experiments, in which, he confessed, he had not so much faith as his hon. Friend the Member for West Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farquharson). All past and present experience pointed to the fact that unless they acted together, and vigorously stamped out the disease, very great injury would be done.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells) said, that the debate hitherto had been carried on by hon. Gentlemen from Scotland, but he desired, as an English agriculturist Member, to say in a few words how heartily he was prepared to support the Motion now before the House. He thought it would be no less than absolutely discreditable if they should be told that this matter, recognized to be of vast importance to the agricultural interest, was to be left untouched, because they had no Agricultural Department, and because the proposed experiments would entail the expenditure of a certain amount of money. He remembered the debates in the House upon rinderpest, and questions connected with the importation of foreign animals. He remembered that it was laid down by those opposed to the Party to which he belonged, that it was the desire and demand on the part of the agriculturists to enhance the price of meat. They were told over and over again that the restrictions against the importation of disease were nothing more than so many devices of the farmer, backed by the landed interest, to increase the price of meat. All subsequent experience had clearly and distinctly proved that those assertions were without any foundation whatever. The more strictly regulations were enforced, the more carefully they scrutinized every head of stock brought from abroad; the more money they spent in reasonable investigation, the more free they were from disease; the healthier were their stocks, the more numerous they became, the better it was for everyone. There was, no doubt, that pleuro-pneumonia stood on a very different footing from other diseases. It was a somewhat mysterious disease. The process of incubation was most protracted, it was almost impossible to detect in its earlier stages, and the way the disease was transmitted from animal to animal was still a matter on which there was great diversity of opinion, even among scientific men who had to deal with the subject. Everything pointed to this—that in the case of a matter so difficult to understand, there ought to be instituted a full and complete series of practical experiments in order to derive some benefit therefrom. The one experiment of the day was that of compulsory slaughter, and in the present state of veterinary science he was distinctly in favour of that remedy, and entirely objected to its abolition until it could be supplanted by something proved to be better. But far be it from him to say—indeed, it would be a miserable and weak position to take up—that because at present there was no other remedy, therefore they should do nothing but continue to slaughter, not only all animals diseased, but every animal which had been in the same herd with an infected animal. He contended that most distinctly it was the duty of the Government—in view of the fact that the disease spread with great rapidity; that once having taken possession of a herd it went with certainty through the whole of the herd, and must entail of necessity considerable expenditure; and in view of all the difficulties which were dependent upon the infliction of compulsory slaughter, at present the only remedy—to agree to the present Motion. He thought the hon. Member who moved this Amendment was, perhaps, a little severe in his criticism of the existing Order, for he (Sir Richard Paget) took it that the words to which the hon. Gentleman referred as not satisfactory were introduced with deliberation. There were 100 different ways which would readily occur to anyone in which the disease might spread. The words to which the hon. Member referred were introduced a long time since after much consideration. There was, no doubt, something indefinite and uncertain in the words as they stood, but he assured his hon. Friend that the words were put in on purpose, in order that they should be wide words and should include a number of eventualities which it was impossible to specify one by one. One hon. Member spoke of the Agricultural Department as a thing that was to be put off until next year. He (Sir Richard Paget) had not heard from the Government any intimation of that. Indeed, the only official intimation which had reached the House was that there was a Bill in course of preparation. He confessed it would be with feelings of utter dismay if he should hear that a measure so important, and which had been distinctly promised to the House, was now to be withdrawn without any further notice. The hon. Member for East Aberdeen (Mr. Esslemont) pointed to the difficulty of getting uniformity of action when there was no uniformity of opinion. He (Sir Richard Paget) desired to remark that uniformity of action was, under present circumstances, more or less possible, because they had a Central Authority which could issue an order which should be compulsory upon all. But they were drifting into times when uniformity of action would become absolutely impossible. When they transferred to the newly-elected County Councils powers which were vested in a certain department of the State, when each one of those Councils would have power and be allowed to choose for itself whether it would slaughter or not, they might come to a time when uniformity of action might be impossible. He hoped, at any rate, that in these matters, which were of the supremest importance to the agricultural interest, the Central Authority would take good care to keep in its hands such severe and drastic powers as it was now authorized to use, and did use with great advantage. It was well the House should recognize the gravity of this disease. They had got rid one by one of several of the diseases which harrassed the flocks and herds of the farmers. Rinderpest was stamped out with a determined foot by the help of the State. Foot and mouth disease had been dealt with; but only because people at last came to recognize that it did not come in the wind, but was a disease which could be stamped out. He spoke with some practical experience of this matter, having been largely mixed up in the dealings with foot and mouth disease in the West of England. In that district there were many people who thought the disease could not be got rid of; but it had been got rid of absolutely and entirely by stringent regulations. Those regulations were enforced, and were submitted to willingly, because the farmers were satisfied the authorities were acting to the best of their judgment, and that that judgment was a sound one—that the restrictions would have a permanent and satisfactory result. They had stamped out foot and mouth disease, and pleuro-pneumonia was a disease they must stamp out too. If there could be found by scientific experiment any means of dealing with it which could save them from the necessity, the brutal necessity, of absolutely destroying a whole herd, it was their duty to find them. If it were possible to find a remedy, that remedy ought to be found. It was not enough to say a remedy had not been found; they must find it. There was no way in which they could find it except by making full and satisfactory experiments. How was that to be done? By the action of the Government, who must not shrink from incurring the expenditure which would be necessary in the matter. They had a right to appeal to the Government to act in no uncertain way. He, however, knew the difficulty agriculturists experienced, and at least they should be assisted by the State when they were doing all they could to hold their heads up in the present struggle. They said—"There is a reasonable remedy which you have it in your power to grant, and which we have a right to ask." He did not for a moment anticipate that the Government would refuse to agree to the present Amendment. He certainly trusted they would not, because he maintained that this was a matter of the greatest importance, and was not to be pooh-poohed and set aside on the ground that it was already being considered by the Committee. He desired to speak with every respect of the importance of that Committee. He had no doubt that their labours would prove of certain and distinct value, but he asked, what power had that Committee to spend a single half-penny in experiments? They had no power to spend anything at all, and he believed the Agricultural Department was equally powerless. He trusted that the Government would assent to the Amendment.

Mr. Esslemont

MR. J. W. BARCLAY (Forfarshire) said, he hoped that this discussion would not have the effect of weakening the hands of the authorities in prosecuting the policy which they had resolved upon. He recollected very well that they had similar discussions to that in which they were now engaged at the time when rinderpest was ravaging the country. It was said then that the slaughtering process was very barbarous and unscientific, and that a much better remedy should be devised. While they were waiting to find out the remedy, the disease spread all over the country, and the loss was very enormous in proportion to what it might have been if active measures had been taken at once. The disease appeared almost at the earliest period of its existence in this country in Aberdeenshire. The farmers of that county resolved, after seeing what the nature of the disease was, that it ought to be stamped out. Hon. Members would, no doubt, be surprised to learn that a voluntary subscription of one penny in the pound of the rental did more than exterminate the disease in Aberdeenshire, and compensate the farmers who lost cattle to the extent of three-fourths of the loss. It might be a very interesting speculative question whether disease could be prevented by inoculation, but he thought he should be able to satisfy the House that it was of very little value from a practical point of view. There was no doubt whatever that the Order in Council, if carried out, would have the effect, if not of exterminating this disease, of at least reducing it to a minimum. Suppose they had pleuro-pneumonia in the same position as foot and mouth disease was at the present moment—that was to say, that they did not know that it existed anywhere in the country, and pleuro-pneumonia appeared in one particular place, would anyone hesitate to say that the wise and proper course would be to slaughter the animals affected, and also those in contact with them? Pleuro-pneumonia did not spread nearly so much as foot and mouth disease. They had adopted a certain policy with regard to foot and mouth disease which had been successful. They did not think of trying experiments whether foot and mouth disease could be prevented by inoculation. He believed the severity of the disease might be lessened by inoculation; but they would not now think of trying to cure foot and mouth disease. It would be the same with pleuro-pneumonia. When they had pleuro-pneumonia exterminated, or reduced within a small compass, as he had no doubt would be the result of the operation of the Order in Council, it would be extremely folly to begin inoculation of cattle when disease broke out again. Inoculation of cattle might be very important where large herds of cattle were in an open country, and would have been here had they not resolved to slaughter all animals affected with the disease, because it might have been said they had discovered a scientific remedy, and it would be unnecessary to slaughter animals. But they had resolved to slaughter the herds affected, and it was a question of very secondary importance to farmers whether disease be prevented in future by inoculation or not, because clearly the soundest policy, if disease again appeared in a herd, was to slaughter the animals. This proposition with respect to disease depended upon the assumption that it was a disease which was not generated in this country, and he thought all the evidence was conclusive upon that point—contagious pleuro-pneumonia was not generated in this country, but had always been imported. Their hope was that when the Order in Council had been carried out for a very short time the disease would cease to exist in the country, and then their only trouble would be to keep it out. Hon. Members seemed to think it would be a very easy matter to determine whether inoculation was or was not efficient; but practically it would be a very difficult question to test, and for various reasons intimately connected with the disease itself. He did not know whether hon. Members generally understood that by inoculation they did not produce the same disease that the animal died of. The disease from inoculation affected the mucous membranes of the animal, but it did not affect the lungs of the animal. Pleuro-pneumonia was a disease of the lungs, and inoculation did not affect the lungs at all. The presumption, therefore, was that inoculation would not prevent a disease which was not produced by inoculation. In the case of all other diseases where inoculation was resorted to, he understood the process produced the same disease, only in a milder form. The evidence before them was that inoculation did not produce pleuro-pneumonia, but something very different. Experiments had been going on in inoculation for very many years. In some parts of the Continent inoculation had been adopted, but in those parts of the Continent, where inoculation had been adopted, they were never free from pleuro-pneumonia, but had it to a greater or less extent. In other parts of the Continent the slaughtering of animals had been resorted to, and there the herds were kept free from the disease; therefore, so far, experience was against the system of inoculation. This disease was not what might be called of a very contagious character. So far as the evidence went, the disease had never been transmitted except from a live animal to another live animal. The disease ceased to be communicable as soon as the animal affected with the disease died. If a rigid system of isolation was maintained in the case of diseased herds, he thought comparatively few animals would become infected. He knew of several cases where farmers, pursuing the policy of isolation—slaughtering any animal which was affected, and slaughtering any animal which might be unwell—had been able to get rid of the disease by slaughtering a small proportion of their stock. If this system could be effectively adopted throughout the country, he thought it would be preferable to general slaughter. But it could not be adopted without such a close supervision as was impracticable. He, therefore, thought the only sound and wise policy was to slaughter all animals which were affected, and all those which had been really in contact with them. Of course, a great deal depended upon the definition of the word "contact." He should say that if animals were in the same shed they were in contact, but he did not think there would be any necessity to slaughter the animals in an adjoining shed. Experiments in inoculation were misleading. If a man had disease among his stock and slaughtered one or two which were considerably affected and one or two which appeared to be affected, and isolated all the other animals, he might probably get rid of the disease without inoculation at all; but, if he inoculated the animals, there was not, as the evidence showed, any great difference. Statistics of the results in one county had been submitted to him, and they were supposed to show greatly in favour of the system of inoculation. In some cases only the animals affected had been slaughtered, without inoculating the remainder; and in other cases animals affected had been slaughtered and the remaining stock had been inoculated. The percentage of subsequent losses in both cases was, curiously enough, practically the same, only six per cent of the animals in both cases had to be killed. It was extremely difficult to make practical experiments except upon a very large scale, and even then grave doubts might be entertained as to the evidence of the results. While he approved of the Committee making all inquiry and investigating into the nature of the disease, and into the question whether it could be inoculated or not, and what might be the result of inoculation, he maintained that, so far as the farmers themselves were concerned, it was not of much practical importance to them whether inoculation was a preventive or not, because certainly if disease was reduced to a minimum, as it would be by the slaughtering of all animals affected, it would be wise policy to slaughter animals in the few cases which might afterwards break out.

Sir Richard Paget

MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright) said, as one who had had large experience of the ravages that pleuro-pneumonia wrought among herds of cattle, he agreed with the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) that until another remedy could be ascertained the only course was to apply the pole-axe indiscriminately. If the Government could see their way to give real assistance, in the shape of a grant of £10,000, for a number of successive years, he was convinced that something would be done, not only to stop the mischief that was now going on, but also to give them a thorough guide as to the future. Although the experiments would have to be made on a large scale, he believed it would pay the country to try them; and he was hopeful that the Government would see their way to deal with the matter in the way proposed. It was the duty of the Government to lead the way, and if they did so, he believed many private individuals would come forward and assist them. On the question of inoculation, he observed that the large majority of those who had thoroughly studied the scientific aspects of the case were, as far as he knew, of one mind. They did not see much use in inoculation. He hoped that the Government would come forward and give what assistance they could in this matter.

MR. GRAY (Essex, Maldon) said, that up to the present—with the exception of the hon. Baronet the Member for the Wells Division of Somerset (Sir Richard Paget)—the debate had been carried on by Scotch Members. He (Mr. Gray) desired to say, however, that English agriculturists were perhaps as much interested in the question as their Scotch friends, although it might not appear so from the course the debate had taken. In England they had suffered over and over again from the prevalence of this most disastrous disease. It seemed to him that they had rather got away from the subject-matter of the Amendment. The question before the House was whether they were to give certain Instructions to a Committee which had been formed for the purpose of inquiring into this matter. He considered that while that Committee was sitting they could hardly give their Instructions as to experiments in inoculation, or any other system. Although he thought it was probable his hon.

Friend the Member for South Lanarkshire (Mr. Hozier) would withdraw his Amendment, he hoped the debate would make an impression upon the Government. What they wanted were the sinews of war to carry on experiments. All other countries that he knew anything about, with the exception of England, generously and liberally gave money for carrying on important inquiries and experiments of this description. If they followed the example of other countries in this respect, he felt certain they should not only be benefiting agriculturists but benefiting the community at large.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG) (Wilts, Devizes) said, he could assure hon. Gentlemen that the Government had been very much impressed with the debate; and he had no hesitation in saying that the very interesting statements which had been made would have their due effect on the Government and on the Committee. The Government, however, could not undertake to accept a Resolution couched in the terms proposed by the hon. Member for South Lanarkshire (Mr. Hozier). The Resolution, if adopted, would be practically a vote of condemnation on the Committee which was at that moment earnestly and carefully inquiring into the best means of dealing with pleuro-pneumonia. Speakers in different parts of the House had advocated inoculation; the hon. Gentleman the Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) however, had very wisely directed attention to the fact that it was by no means certain that great advantages would accrue from any wholesale adoption of the system of inoculation. His hon. Friend who moved the Resolution quoted certain evidence in favour of the adoption of inoculation. He quoted the case of Australia and Holland, and the evidence given by the Highland Society. What were the facts? The information he (Mr. Long) had received on the point was to the effect that Australia, which had always adopted a system of inoculation, had always, at the same time, suffered from this disease. He had every reason to believe that the evidence of the Highland Society was, in the strictest sense of the word, extremely contradictory on the question of inoculation. Holland for many years adopted inoculation; but for the last four years Holland had given up that system, and had adopted compulsory slaughter, with the result that the country was free from the disease at this moment. Surely these facts were enough to warrant them in saying that the evidence quoted in support of inoculation was not sufficiently convincing to justify them in adopting a Resolution which would undoubtedly be a vote of censure on the Committee. His hon. Friend had stated that the Committee was under the sway of Professor Brown. No doubt Professor Brown had considerable influence on the Committee, but he very much doubted whether his hon. Friend had rightly described his position on the Committee. The names of the members of the Committee showed that it was one that would not be unduly influenced by Professor Brown or any expert. Whatever might be the conclusion at which the Committee now sitting might arrive, it would be the honest outcome of the evidence given to it. They would, he had no doubt, give their best energies and abilities to elucidate the important questions they had been called upon to decide. But, with reference to this proposal of experiments, every hon. Member who had spoken had dwelt upon the importance of the disease being promptly dealt with, and the Government had been told that they ought to expend whatever money was required in order that the question might be properly and effectually dealt with. He had no hesitation in saying that if that was their desire, they could do nothing more calculated to postpone the accomplishment of that desire than to adopt this Resolution. It was only common sense to say that if they were going to initiate a system of Government experiments to ascertain the result of a certain scientific process upon animals with reference to a particular disease, it would be impossible to form an opinion which would be reliable from a few isolated instances. They would have to collect a large number of instances, and carry on the experiments for a considerable time, before they could arrive at an opinion that would be in the slightest degree trustworthy. Therefore, he did not believe the adoption of the Motion would attain the object hon. Members had at heart. The Committee had been referred to, and an apprehension expressed that their inquiry would not be so exhaustive and valuable as it ought to be, and that they had no power to spend money. It was the case that they had no power to spend money, but they would agree that a Committee such as that now sitting in London was not one to which should be entrusted either a carrying out of those experiments or the spending of money on such experiments. It would be extremely difficult to appoint a Committee which should be a really powerful and practical one, and which should also be called upon to carry on experiments under their own supervision. For instance, how could the present Committee, with the heavy labours now entailed upon them, superintend in any part of the country experiments on a sufficiently large scale to enable benefit to be derived from them? The Committee were at this moment taking evidence on this question of experiments, and so far from the experiments being so old as to be worthless, they hoped to take the evidence of a distinguished scientific man from Holland who had had experience of the system of inoculation practised there, and who would not only speak to those experiments, but of their results. The Committee hoped to complete the evidence about Whitsuntide. The Government heartily sympathized with what had been said about the burden on the ratepayer from the charges for compensation, and about the loss to the agriculturists, and would willingly do anything they could to relieve the ratepayers, and would consider whether they could in any way strengthen the evidence proposed to be taken by the Committee. But, on the part of the Government, he could not accept the Resolution, which would practically be a condemnation of the Committee now sitting. One of the objects of the Committee being to report on the experiments in inoculation, hon. Members would agree that when the Committee had reported then this House and all interested in the question would be in a stronger and better position to approach its consideration. Therefore, he hoped the hon. Member would be content with the very able and practical discussion which had taken place, and with the assurance that the Government would do their utmost in this, as in other matters, to safeguard the interests of the agricultural community; and if the Committee reported in favour of the experiments being carried out, their Report and proposals would receive the most careful attention of the Government.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Eight o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 14th May, 1888.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Standing Orders Committee, Lord Wenlock, v. Earl of Ducie.

Report—High Sheriffs [No. 109].

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Pharmacy Act (Ireland), 1875, Amendment* (112).

Second Reading—Local Government (England and Wales) Electors (103).

Select Committee—Report—Liability of Trustees [No. 110].

Committee—Suffragans' Act Amendment* (83).

Report—Liability of Trustees* (24-111); Tithe Rentcharge Recovery and Variation (99); Copyright (Musical Compositions)* (92); Merchant Shipping (Life Saving Appliances) (96).

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL—Committee—Report—Local Government (Ireland) (Coleraine, &c.)* (63).

THE NATIONAL DEFENCES.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

VISCOUNT WOLSELEY: My Lords, I rise to make a personal explanation, and after what took place in your Lordships' House last Friday, I do not think it will be a matter of surprise to any of your Lordships that I should do so. On that occasion an attack was made upon me in my absence, which I think is indirectly a matter of some little public interest, and which directly is me to a matter of very serious consequence, both as a soldier and as a public servant. Early on Saturday morning, as soon as I read in the newspapers of the day the report of what Lord Salisbury—[“Order, order!”]—of what the noble Marquess had said, I wrote to the noble Marquess, and gave him private Notice that it was my intention to-day to speak here upon the subject, and

Mr. Long

I regret extremely, my Lords, that the noble Marquess did not adopt a similar course with respect to myself before he spoke here last Friday. My Lords, I feel it necessary to refer to this trifling incident, to this fact, because I think it will explain what might otherwise have seemed an act of discourtesy on my part that I was not here in my place to answer the serious charges then made upon me. It will be within the memory of every one of your Lordships who were present in this House, that the attack to which I have referred was made during a discussion which arose upon an Answer given by the illustrious Duke (the Duke of Cambridge) with reference to a paragraph which appeared that morning in a newspaper. And perhaps, my Lords, it may not be uninteresting if I were at once to state to your Lordships that until the discussion took place in your Lordships' House, until that time of day I was not even aware of the existence of the paragraph which had caused that discussion. I did not know that there was any such paragraph in the newspapers of that day at all. My Lords, I have to claim your indulgence whilst I make a few remarks upon the charges made against me, and in doing so I hope I shall make use of only measured terms, and do so with unruffled temper, with the simplest words at my command, and in a straightforward manner. The noble Marquess began by a protest—I quote his own words—

“Against the practice followed by some of those who are, or who ought to be, distinguished authorities on military affairs. I allude to the practice of making statements against the Government under whom they serve, and making them in places where they cannot be answered.”

The noble Marquess then proceeded to name me personally as the chief offender, though he did not mention by name those who were my fellow-offenders. My Lords, I deny most emphatically that I have ever said one word that could be in any way construed into an attack in any form upon the Administration presided over by the noble Marquess. Nothing has ever been further from my intention. The Prime Minister of the present day has plenty and ample occupation without attempting to follow the course of military speeches which are made from time to time. I think I may congratulate the noble Marquess that among the many trials to which he has to submit, the reading of speeches on the Army and Navy is not one of his functions. But it struck me very forcibly, when I read the reports in the newspapers of what the noble Marquess said on the occasion to which I refer, that he had not read the speech to which he alluded—that is, the speech which I made at a private dinner. It seemed to me rather as if the noble Marquess had had supplied to him at secondhand an account of the speech, or rather a report marked and annotated so as to call his attention to certain particular facts in it. I do not know whether any of your Lordships have done me the honour of reading my remarks, but I feel convinced that if any unprejudiced person, no matter whom he might be, whose mind was not warped by the habitual contemplation of Party politics, if such a man would calmly read what I said, he could not have construed or twisted my remarks into any attack upon Her Majesty's Government. From the beginning to the end my intention was to point out what I considered to be the disadvantageous manner in which Party Government reacted upon Her Majesty's Army and Navy, and more especially what were the difficulties under Party Government in the way of the people being able to elicit the actual and true condition of the Army and Navy on which they will have to depend in times of danger and trial. My Lords, in a letter which I wrote to the illustrious Duke, I emphasized my view of what I had said in a manner so concise that I think I will venture to read it. There is all the more reason for doing so because it will relieve the noble Marquess from the imputation which has been conveyed in some quarters—that he allowed nearly three weeks to elapse before he made any remark with reference to my speech. On the 27th of April, after the private dinner to Sir John Pender, I received a note from the Commander in Chief in which he forwarded me a formal—I might call it a formidable—letter from the Secretary of State for War. That letter was not addressed to me. It was addressed to His Royal Highness the Commander in Chief, and therefore I do not feel justified in even quoting from it. In fact, I cannot read it because it is not in my possession but the letter contained a series of extracts from the speech which I had delivered a few days before, and those extracts were almost identical with those which the noble Marquess did me the honour to quote on Friday. Party Government has many advantages. It secures to the nation who live under it, not only political but individual freedom. But, after all, it is a mere human institution, and has its defects. My endeavour was to point out the great defects inherent in it—in its bearing on the constitution and efficacy and efficiency of Her Majesty's Naval and Military Forces. With your permission I will now read the answer which I sent to His Royal Highness with reference to the letter of the Secretary of State for War. I said—

“In reply to the question asked by Mr. Stanhope in his letter of yesterday, I have the honour to state that the quotations given in it from the speech of last Monday at the dinner to Sir John Pender are practically correct, so far as I can remember the words I used. It certainly describes very accurately the opinions I hold with regard to Party Government, and I was not aware, till I read the letter in question, that any exception could be taken by Her Majesty's Government to an officer like myself, who does not hold any political appointment, expressing his views in the most open way upon what he conceives to be a grave fault in our Constitution. I made no attack of any sort or kind upon the Government of the day or upon any Member of it. I attributed our shortcomings to the vicious system of Party Government, and not to any particular individual on one side of the House or the other. My reference to Ministers was to Ministers in the abstract, quite independent of the political Party to which they belong, and I would not, on any account, take any steps which would tend to weaken Lord Salisbury's Government,” and so on. It is not necessary for me to read the rest. Well, my Lords, I have no wish in any remarks I am about to make—and I never had any wish—to attack Her Majesty's Government, for I am no politician, and I hope I never may be one. But even if I were, I could not with any honesty attack Her Majesty's Government for neglecting to attend to the interests of the Army and Navy. From the position which I occupy in the administration of the Army, no man is more thoroughly aware than I am of all that the present Secretary of State for War has done and is doing in order to render the naval and military forces of the Crown efficient in every way and worthy of the nation.

Instead of attacking the military policy of Her Majesty's Government, my object has been at all times to support it to the best of my ability, and when upon previous occasions I endeavoured to do so, when I have expressed myself in still far stronger terms as to what I believe to be the wants of the Army, I have done so without entailing any censure upon myself from the Secretary of State for War or from the Prime Minister. I shall refer to this later on, when I venture to quote from some public documents as to what I have stated in public. Experience tells me—and I have had considerable experience, not in public affairs, perhaps, but in military administration—that it is absolutely impossible for any Secretary of State for War to obtain for the Army all that it requires, unless the English people are at his back—unless public opinion supports him—and unless the English people feel the necessity of increasing the numbers of the Army, or of adding to its military equipment, and of making it more readily and better prepared to take the part it is intended to play in the event of trial and danger to this country. It was in order to call public attention to these points—to the Army and its wants—that I said what I did. I think everyone knows that, in this country, the people are too prone to care little for the organization of the Army and for its affairs. They take it as a matter of course, when they are told—as everyone tells them at public dinners, and in speeches delivered from both sides of the House—that Her Majesty's Army and Navy have always done their duty, and will do it in future, they take these views as correct, and carry them home, and think they may sleep quietly in their beds, because the Army and Navy are strong enough. There is abroad in England an enormous amount of ignorance on the part of the English people in regard to the condition of the Army. Within the last few years, it has been found necessary by the Administration of India to increase their military force by 10,000 men. We have had, for some years past, to maintain a force in Egypt, where we have accepted greatly increased responsibilities, which may entail at any moment the necessity of sending out large reinforcements. We had also very recently—thanks to a Commission which sat and reported on the strength of our garrisons—become aware of the condition of things in our fortresses abroad, in our coaling stations, and in our home defences. We have been obliged to send abroad considerable reinforcements to our coaling stations; so that, though I have no wish to follow the noble Marquess into his statements of figures made on Friday, I may tell you that of the increase of 20,000 men to which he referred, 10,000 men are now in India. I may also tell you that, though in recent years, since 1884, 20,000 men have been added to the Army, the Army has, at the present moment, 23,000 men less than in 1860, 16,000 men less than in 1862, 8,000 less than in 1863, and at this moment 7,000 less than in 1864. How, then, can it be possible for the noble Marquess to come down and say that the Army has been increased in recent years? I have already said that my position at the War Office makes me know the earnest desire of the present Administration to make not only the Army, but, I believe, the Navy also, perfect in every respect. It is not breach of confidence if I give very briefly the result of a conversation I had with the present First Lord of the Treasury, when he came for the first time as Secretary of State to the War Office. In answer to a question I put, he said that his endeavour would be, during his tenure of Office, to make the Army a reality—that he would deal with it on business principles, and would be guided by these principles in its administration. I can still remember the emphasis with which he said that he would be no party to a sham Army. That statement is, I think, quite sufficient to prove that the present Administration and Ministers have ardently at heart the efficiency of both the Army and the Navy. Since Lord Cardwell introduced the great reform of the Army, and changed the basis of our military organization, no Administration has done so much as the present Administration for the Army, or has introduced so many beneficial changes in the short time they have been in power. That is one reason why it would be impossible for me to attack the Government upon the subject of the Army and Navy; but there is also one more reason to which I may refer, and that is the position I now hold. The position of Adjutant General is entirely non-political. He neither comes in nor goes out with the Ministry; he has nothing whatever to do with Party politics, or with the affairs of either Whigs or Tories. It would be most improper—it would, in fact, be almost outrageous—on the part of an Adjutant General if he were to allow himself, in any circumstances whatever, either at a public dinner or in this House—if he enjoyed the honour of a seat among your Lordships—to come down here upon any occasion to attack any Administration under which he was serving. Holding these views, is it likely that I should wish, in the remotest degree, to speak against Her Majesty's Government, to whose continuance in Office I, in common with a large portion of the nation, attach so much importance at the present moment? No, my Lords; I repudiate the accusation made against me on this point with all the force of which I am capable. But I cannot help feeling that the line of conduct I have pursued, much as it may be objected to by some people, if it has called public attention to a subject which is of such great importance, has fulfilled the object I had in view. That subject, which is always uppermost in my mind, and, I am sure, is uppermost in the minds of most of those who hold high positions in the War Office—certainly as far as the military side of the War Office is concerned—is this: Is the effective strength of the Army and Navy sufficient to fulfil for this country the objects and functions that the country has in view in maintaining these forces; is it able to guard the defences of this country and to maintain its honour at home and abroad; are the forces strong enough to maintain its commerce on all the seas and to defend our coaling stations and our Colonies, which are essential to that commerce? Such a question is uppermost in the minds of a considerable section of the people of this country also. I know how sincerely and deeply the Secretary of State for War desires to make the Army efficient. I have already alluded to what he has done in the short time he has been in Office to improve not only the efficiency and organization, but also the discipline of the Military Forces. I say deliberately that I do not believe there is at the present moment, or that there ever has been since he took Office, the slightest shadow of difference between the Secretary of State for War and myself as to what are the requirements of the country, and as to what is necessary at the present moment to place the Army in a thoroughly efficient position. When I speak of increased efficiency, I refer not merely to increase of numbers, important as that increase may be; but to what I believe is still more urgently required than an increase of numbers—namely, that whatever we have got as Military Forces in this country—whether Regulars, Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers—should be made thoroughly efficient, and should be placed in a condition, whenever the necessity arose, to be able to act effectively as an Army, and not merely as dispersed units, which they merely are at the present moment. There were two points in the observations of the noble Marquess concerning myself which, in some newspapers, have been graphically described as a “severe wiggling.” One of these points was that I had attacked the Government. With that I have already dealt. The other point was that if I had anything to say about the Army I ought to have come down to your Lordships' House and have said it. I hope I have convinced your Lordships that I had no intention, and never had the intention, of attacking Her Majesty's Government. I shall, therefore, allude simply to the charge which the noble Marquess made against me—that if I had anything to say about the Army I ought to say it from my seat in the House of Lords. During the five or six years I have had the honour of a seat in your Lordships' House I have never yet presumed to speak here; and it will always be to me a matter of sincere and deep regret that the first time I have felt it necessary to speak has been to repudiate charges made against me by the Prime Minister; and to defend my character against what I believe to be charges that ought never to have been brought against me, and that have no foundation in fact. From the time that I first entered this House I laid it down as a rule—and it was a rule that found favour in high quarters—that as long as I occupied the position of Adjutant General I should never speak here. My reasons for this determination were because, being no politician, and taking no interest in politics it would be unbecoming in me as Adjutant General to mix myself up in current politics. There are few questions which come before your Lordships' House that have not some Party interest; and it is very difficult to draw a distinction between subjects that are and are not free from Party politics. Another reason was that I felt that, as Adjutant General, it would be most improper for me to come down here to speak on military matters in the presence of my superior officer, the Commander-in-Chief. As long as His Royal Highness takes part in the debates in this House, it would be unbecoming of me to criticize any remarks that may fall from him upon Army subjects with which he is so connected, and of which he is so intimately informed. Experience has proved how right I was in the rule which I laid down in this matter. At the same time, I cannot help feeling—indeed, it is a self-evident fact—that the noble Marquess is right in saying that if I wished to attack Her Majesty's Government I ought to have come down here and have done so. I had no intention to attack the Government. I have to make one statement which, I think, of considerable importance, and it is this—that in this speech, with which so much fault has been found, and which has been, as I consider, so severely, I may almost say unjustly, criticized, there is nothing bearing either directly or indirectly upon the Army that I have not said on previous occasions, not as on the occasion referred to at a private dinner, but in what I may call open court. I expressed my opinions in the evidence given before the Royal Commission some 18 months ago. That evidence has been made public, and has been circulated in Blue Books to every Member of both Houses of Parliament. I know that very few of those who receive these Blue Books open a page when they see they refer to military matters; but if anyone has done so, or if anyone will take the trouble by-and-by to peruse the evidence that I gave to the Commission presided over by Sir James Stephen—the Ordnance Commission—he will find in that evidence, almost word for word, every fact and argument which I adduced in the unfortunate speech which has attracted so much attention. If you will turn to the Reports it will be seen that I was asked—

Viscount Wolseley

“Is it not a fact that we never tell the truth to the English people, and that they never know what our military position is?”

and this was the answer I gave. I said—

“That we never take the English people into our confidence, we never tell them what are our shortcomings. They have no means of ascertaining what are the military views of the highest military officers they employ. The highest military officers are paid very well; but the English people have no means of knowing what their military views are.”

Further on, I said—

“I consider the position of England, at the present moment, as regards its Army, as very unsatisfactory; and if a hostile force were to land upon our shores of, say, 100,000 men, there is no reason why those 100,000 men, if properly led, should not take possession of London.”

It is proper I should call attention to the fact that when I made that statement—not in a hole-and-corner meeting, but before that highly critical and judicial Royal Commission—the present First Lord of the Treasury was Secretary of State for War, and the noble Marquess was Prime Minister, and yet no comment was made upon those remarks, and I was not censured in any way for them. I was never asked for an explanation. I would ask your Lordships if it was possible for me to say, or whether I did say, anything stronger in my recent speech than I said in the evidence I have read? What I said 18 months ago, and what I said lately, I adhere to literally and word for word. As regards the substance of that speech, I have nothing to withdraw, and nothing to be ashamed of. The noble Marquess has forced from me what I may call an exposition of faith. I give it freely for what it is worth. I give it in plain and unmistakable terms, without entering into any of those particulars which the noble Marquess so pointedly objected to in his remarks last Friday. When I make this statement I am fully aware of the responsibility I incur. My statement is as follows:—That as long as the Navy is as weak as it is at this moment, Her Majesty's Army cannot hold its own all over the world, dispersed as it is; that our defences at home and abroad are at this moment in an unsatisfactory condition, and that our military forces are not organized or equipped as they should be to guarantee even the safety of the capital in which we are at this present moment. My Lords, I am well aware of the responsibility I incur in making the statement; but, at the same time, forced as I have been to make this statement, I feel that there is no need whatever for panic. I am not in the secrets of Her Majesty's Government, and, as the noble Marquess observed, I am not aware of all that takes place in the Cabinet; but what I do know leads me to believe there is no imminent danger impending over this country, and that, therefore, there is plenty of time to do all that is necessary to place, at least, the Army in a state of efficiency before its services are required. Panic is the offspring of ignorance. For the people to realize their danger and the power of meeting it, is, in my opinion, the first step towards doing all that is required. For that reason, it has been my desire at all times to take the English people into our confidence, and tell them exactly what the condition of Her Majesty's Army and Navy is, and what is the proportionate strength of our Navy compared with the Navies of foreign countries. If there are wants and shortcomings I should like to tell them what they are. So complete is my confidence in the wisdom of Parliament and in the good sound sense of the English people that I cannot believe anything will be wanting in their efforts to place the two great Services of the country in a thoroughly satisfactory and serviceable condition. If, my Lords, by any action I have taken in this matter I have done anything to further that end, it will be, in my estimation, a most important event in my life, and one I shall always look back to with the greatest possible satisfaction. My Lords, I am well aware that in political life it is the common practice that when a Member of an Administration differs seriously from his Colleagues, or has been censured severely by his Chief in the Administration, it has been the invariable practice for that Member of the Government to resign the position he occupies; but, in my opinion, a subordinate military officer who occupies no political position whatever under the Government takes a wrong view of his position when he follows that example. As a rule, the resignation of a military officer, in these circumstances, answers no good purpose. I have been, I confess, at times sorely tempted to adopt that course myself, and never more so than I was last Saturday morning when I read the severe strictures made upon me in this House by the Prime Minister. It was no love of office that restrained me from doing so; but the view I took of my duty in the position I occupy as Adjutant General. At the same time, I wish it to be clearly understood that, although in my judgment it would be wrong on my part to take the initiative in this matter, I place myself entirely and unreservedly in the hands of the Prime Minister. I believe that the views I have expressed this evening, and upon many previous occasions, are those entertained by nine out of every 10 soldiers and sailors whose opinions are worth having; and I believe they are the opinions of those soldiers and sailors who, if danger comes on this country, will have to lead Her Majesty's Army and Navy—who will be the captains of our ships and the Admirals of our Fleets, the colonels of our regiments, and the Generals of our armies—in fact, the very men upon whom the people of this country will have to rely in case of sudden emergency. I have been careful in the remarks I have made to refrain from referring to details which the Prime Minister, in the course of his observations on Friday last, said it would be objectionable to make public; but I can say, from my own knowledge, that there is no deficiency or weak point in our defences which is not as well known to the Military and Naval Authorities of every great foreign nation as it is to ourselves. My Lords, I thank you for having listened so carefully and so attentively to what I have said. I would wish, in conclusion, to allude to a point I have not yet referred to, and it is this. To my astonishment and extreme regret I read this morning in the papers a speech made by the Secretary of State for War on Saturday, in which he took to himself personally some remarks I made, perhaps in too strong terms, at the dinner to which reference has been made. I wish to assure your Lordships, for his information and for the information of the public, that nothing was further from my mind than to attach any possible slur to the character or the intentions of the Secretary of State for War, whom I have known for so many years as a friend, and lately as a Member of the present Administration. I hope the Secretary of State for War and every Member of the Government will understand that I deeply regret that the words I made use of in that speech, to which reference has been made, could by any possibility be considered as reflecting in any way upon any Member of Her Majesty's Administration. Whatever my course of action may have been, I shall at least have the satisfaction of reflecting that I have acted according to my lights, and that I have been influenced by a desire to do my duty in the interests of my Sovereign and of the English people, whom it has been my earnest endeavour always to serve to the best of my ability.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, the noble and gallant Lord who has just sat down referred at the beginning of his speech to one matter which he spoke of as small, but of which I am bound to take notice. He expressed himself as feeling that he had not been fairly treated in having received no Notice of the remarks which I made on Friday. I can only say that if the noble and gallant Lord feels that, I very much regret it; but I have been in the habit of answering other speeches by Members of this House without giving Notice, and it did not occur to me that it was necessary to do so in this instance. If I have placed the noble and gallant Lord at a disadvantage by taking that course in the present instance I must express my regret for having done so. But when the noble and gallant Lord goes on to say that the strictures which I passed upon his speech at Sir John Pender's dinner were unjust and ought not to have been made, I do not think that he can entirely remember what the character of those remarks was. Nothing could be more handsome than the manner in which the noble and gallant Lord has spoken of the present Administration—nothing could be more complete than the disavowal which he has made of his intention of directing his speech at that dinner against Her Majesty's Government, or any Member of it. But, unless he has been grievously misrepresented, certainly the first impression which any ordinary reader would attach to the language which he used was that all Secretaries of State for War were men of "a low and vicious standard of morality."

VISCOUNT WOLSELEY: I beg pardon. Will the noble Marquess read that portion of my speech?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am going to read it; but I say that the impression conveyed by it was not only that, but was that the most prominent offenders were those who had most recently come into Office. I will read the whole passage. It is so vigorous that it is a pleasure to read it, apart from the application it may receive. These are the words—

"The answer to the question why the Army and Navy are not as strong as they ought to be is to be found in the system of our government by Party—that curse of modern England which is sapping and undermining the foundations of our country—which is depriving our statesmen of the manly honesty which was once their characteristic. What do we see when any new Administration comes into Office?"

Remember that a new Administration came into Office about 18 months before.

"What directly takes place? It is the same with all Parties. The first thing is an endeavour made by the Minister in Office to obtain some claptrap reputation by cutting down the expenses of the Army and Navy, and if he is able to produce an Army or a Navy Estimate which represents in some degree a smaller sum than that of his Predecessor, he plumes himself upon the victory he has gained; he is proud that he has succeeded better, perhaps, than his Predecessor who sits upon the Bench opposite to him; and as he chuckles over his success he says, 'See what a good boy am I.' This is the result, of what?—the result of a low and vicious standard of morality which is now uppermost in men's minds. In speaking so light-heartedly of such a matter he forgets, this Minister who has just come into Office, in his pride at having reduced the Estimates, the fault he has committed, the crime of which he has been guilty against the country."

Now, my Lords, I must say that I do not think I was hypercritical in thinking that these words apply to all Advisers of the Crown without distinction, or if there was any distinction it was that they applied especially to those who had most recently taken Office. But we are all alike on our defence; and I invoke the sympathy of noble Lords opposite when I say in regard to the last four changes of Office that, as a matter of fact, the result has been that the Estimates have risen, and not that they have fallen. That charge, therefore, cannot be supported. As against us, it is especially hard for us to be accused of the crime of cutting down the Estimates by a lump sum, when a year or two ago we made the greatest sacrifice politicians can make—we sacrificed an important Colleague rather than suffer the very thing which is charged against us. My Lords, I am bound to say that the noble and gallant Lord has disavowed in ample terms any intention of referring to the present Administration. I accept entirely his disavowal; and I can only say that if he had made it sooner I should certainly have not ventured to trouble your Lordships on the subject. The cause of the delay to which he refers was that very correspondence which he has mentioned. I fully expected that after the letter he had written to the illustrious Duke he would have taken some public means of explaining and removing the misapprehension which anybody who read the speech must have formed. I found that he did not do so; and when I found that this speech was having what seemed to me a most disastrous consequence of panic on men's minds I felt it my duty to make the observations that I did. I can only say I heartily accept the disavowal which he has made; and I only hope that if he has occasion to attack us in future he will do it in this House. I do not mean to say that I think that a desirable course; but I think it is propriety itself compared to saying what he did at a dinner to Sir John Pender. Lastly, with reference to some other observations made by the noble and gallant Lord, I hope he will not take this incident too seriously, for I should regard his leaving the Public Service as the greatest blow that could fall upon our military administration. The noble and gallant Lord gave us his confession of faith. I cannot charge my memory with having seen it before; but I can only say that it is a very grave statement indeed, and that it shall receive the closest possible attention and examination that we can give to it with the assistance of the illustrious Duke, the noble and gallant Lord himself, and the Secretary of State for War. I cannot at all coincide with those who think that these matters can be referred to anybody outside the Government. So long as our system of Government is what it is the Government are responsible, and the responsibility must rest upon them. If you are dissatisfied with them you must change them; but you must not think that you can infuse efficiency into them by setting up an independent body by their side to advise them. I would only notice two other observations that the noble and gallant Lord has made. He spoke of the danger which we were incurring owing to the present weakness of our Navy. That seems to me, so far as my judgment goes, an inappropriate phrase. Weakness and strength are relative terms; what I wish to bring before the House, lest they should run away with a false impression upon the subject, is an account of the exertions this country has made now for several years past to place its Navy in a condition fit for the great duties it is called upon to perform. Allow me to read to your Lordships the total sums that have been applied year after year to the new construction of ships and the armaments of ships since the year 1880, the beginning of the last Administration. In 1881-2 the total was £2,100,000; in 1882-3, £2,447,000; in 1883-4, £2,592,000; in 1884-5, £2,927,000; in 1885-6, when the last Budget of noble Lords opposite was introduced, £4,895,000; in 1886-7, £5,095,000; in 1887-8, £5,358,000; and in 1888-9, £5,467,000. The annual expenditure on the new construction of ships and armaments has risen since 1880 from £2,100,000 to £5,467,000. The rise is enormous; and although, of course, you may say that it is not yet enough, it is undoubtedly the fact that our exertions for preparation and our state of preparation are, in my belief, and as those figures show, greater than they have ever been under any previous Government. The noble and gallant Lord treated with some contempt my plea for secrecy. He said that every defect we had was as well known to every foreign country as to ourselves. I hope that that is not the case; but even if it were the case it would not exhaust my reasons. It would not represent the real ground why any public discussion in all its details of our military and naval preparations is an impossibility. We are to make ourselves safe, it is said. But safety is not an absolute term. You cannot write down so many soldiers and so many ships are what will make England safe. They are what will make England safe against some supposed attack; you must know what your enemy is likely to be before you know whether your preparations are likely to be sufficient; you cannot know what force under any possible circumstances can be brought against you without discussing matters which I need not prove to the House it is utterly impossible to discuss in public. The question of defence is a question which involves not only the War Office and the Admiralty, but the Foreign Office as well; and if anybody doubts that fact let him read carefully that great speech of the Chancellor of Germany, delivered at the beginning of this Spring, in which he discussed the defensive and offensive position of Germany, and it will be seen that throughout it there is one point upon which he evidently laid stress. The consideration that was uppermost in his mind was, "Who are our allies?" and "Who are likely to be the enemies with whom we should have to fight?" Therefore, my Lords, I deprecate the idea that it is possible for any Government to lay down an absolute standard of safety. They must place the country in such a position that it will be safe against any danger which it is reasonably likely to incur; and, in so doing, I am sure your Lordships will believe that the more we deprecate publicity the more deeply sensible are we of the intense responsibility that lies upon us. There is no part of the speech of the noble and gallant Lord against which I should wish to enter so earnest a protest as that in which he attributes to public men in England—I care not of what Party they are—that for the sake of making a good Budget and winning a Party advantage they would consciously risk the interests of the Empire. I do not believe that such an accusation could be fairly directed against any public man on any side. We feel that we are working a Constitutional instrument of extreme difficulty. It is a task not a little arduous for men who are, and must be, in the main civilians, and responsible to civilians, to obtain and make use of all the best professional assistance, and to govern for professional purposes professional men of the highest intelligence and skill. That duty is laid upon us, and we shall perform it to the best of our ability. We are deeply sensible of the debt we owe to experts, and how carefully we should consult and weigh their opinions. We feel that the prospect of obtaining any success will, indeed, be jeopardized if the practice should gain of their speaking over our heads to the public, and destroying our authority and shattering the administrative machine we wield by invoking the opinion—the uninformed opinion—of out-of-doors critics against us. I am sure that in protesting against this practice I shall have the sympathy of your Lordships' House; and I feel convinced we shall have the sympathy of the noble and gallant Lord himself in endeavouring, when any difference of opinion arises between experts and civilians, to do our best, to give to each his proper place, to work together for that end which under our peculiar Constitution is so difficult of attainment—that of uniting all the securities of a Military Monarchy with a system which is penetrated through and through by the instincts and practices of freedom.

Viscount Wolseley

The Marquess of Salisbury

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I wish to enter my protest against the attribution of motives to Members of preceding Governments by the noble and gallant Viscount. Such a charge is, I think, entirely unfounded. I do not agree in the advice or the opinion the noble Marquess has given, that the proper course was for the noble and gallant Viscount to come down to the House, and in his place make such an attack upon the Government. It appears to me to be the obvious duty of those at the head of our great Naval and Military Professions to state to the Government, in the fullest and most detailed manner, their views as to the necessities of their Departments. I very much regret to hear from the noble Marquess that no statement was made to him by the noble and gallant Viscount.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I did not speak quite so strongly. I said that the precise statement the noble and gallant Viscount has made to the House had not been made to the Government.

EARL GRANVILLE: The noble and gallant Viscount stated that he was not a politician, and that he hopes he never will be. On the whole, I am rather inclined to coincide with him in that view; and I certainly do most devoutly hope that he will continue to devote exclusively his extraordinary energy and his remarkable abilities to the Profession which he adorns.

I will not complain that, though the noble and gallant Viscount has made the most ample apology I ever heard to the noble Marquess who so vigorously attacked him, not one word of apology did he offer to us who had remained perfectly silent. Really, the satisfactory thing in this incident, which threatened, in the minds of some persons, to lead to the loss of the valuable services of the noble and gallant Viscount, is that such a possibility is entirely put away by the explanation of the noble Marquess. I will not, on this occasion, go into the much larger and more important question as to what the military and naval defences of this country should be. I certainly feel that it is the duty of military men to state in the strongest manner to the Government of the day, whatever that Government may be, their notions of the deficiencies which exist; but I cannot admit that their views are always to be obeyed. I would remind your Lordships of the old story of Dean Swift who, in his Instructions to Servants, advised the servant in a particular department to ascertain the gross amount of his master's income and to endeavour to apply the whole of that amount to his own particular department. The Government of this country must take other facts into consideration, and must think a little of finance. They must take care not to cripple us in times of peace, for that is by no means the safest way of preparing us for war. But with regard to that, I am very much pleased to hear what the noble and gallant Viscount laid down as the principle of the reforms in which he wished to move—not merely to get more money, but to provide for the efficiency and the most complete training and preparation of the Army.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, in view of the agreeable manner in which this incident has ended, and which I am glad to think will be acceptable to my noble and gallant Friend, I do not know that I have anything to say beyond this—that I feel it to be a duty which I owe to your Lordships and to my noble and gallant Friend to state distinctly that I have always highly appreciated his consideration in not coming and taking part in any debates in this House in my presence. I do not for one moment wish that he should hide his views. Every now and then we may not agree; but we always disagree without quarrelling. If, however, these matters were to be discussed by the Commander-in-Chief in this House in one sense and by the Adjutant General in another I think that would be most detrimental to the interests of the Service, and most serious to the individuals concerned. Therefore, I take this opportunity of assuring your Lordships that I am, perhaps, quite as much to blame as the noble and gallant Viscount, since I have always encouraged him not to take part in debates in your Lordships' House.

PUBLIC HEALTH—SUPPRESSION OF RABIES IN DOGS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he desired to trespass on their Lordships' attention for a very few minutes while he put a Question to his noble Friend below him in regard to a much less exciting subject than that which had just engaged their attention. He wished to ask his noble Friend, Whether Her Majesty's Government propose to introduce any Bill, or to issue any instructions, for the more effectual suppression of rabies in dogs, in conformity with the recommendations of the Committee of that House who last year reported on this subject? There was one Member of their Lordships' House who last year was with them, and this year was not with them in consequence of this mortal disease. The case was one which attracted great attention at the time. All the remedies of M. Pasteur were tried, and tried early. Everything that medical skill could accomplish was done, and the greatest courage was shown on the part of the sufferer, but all was absolutely in vain. A Committee was appointed last year with reference to this subject; and the general conclusion at which that Committee arrived was that they were prepared to accept the scientific conclusion that rabies could only be produced by the bite of the animal, and that there were no spontaneous generation of the disease. Consequently, the possibility of dealing with hydrophobia was brought within practical limits. Some countries, he might observe, had established a system of quarantine which had been completely successful.

LORD MOUNT TEMPLE said, the recommendation of the Committee that Local Authorities might order dogs to wear badges and fix the responsibility on owners and not on the dogs, and might receive the dog licences, was amply supported by the evidence. It justified the Bill he had presented last year, which led to the appointment of the Committee; but his Bill was necessarily confined to the Metropolis. Whatever legislation was passed ought to extend to the whole country; and now that the Government were carrying through Parliament a Local Government Bill greater power and improved machinery ought to be at the disposal of the new Local Authorities for the efficient prevention of rabies, independently of the muzzle, which had proved unsuccessful.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK) said, the Government entirely sympathized with the views expressed by his noble Friend behind him (the Earl of Carnarvon); but his noble Friend would recognize that great differences of opinion prevailed as to the remedies for the evil, and that there were many people who valued their dogs more than the public good, and could not always be trusted to take proper steps, or to submit to the rules laid down by authority. His noble Friend had asked what the Government had done. They had issued Orders under the Diseases (Animals) Act, to which dogs were now subject, giving permission to Local Authorities to deal with the question, of which these authorities had largely availed themselves. There had recently been a decrease in the disease, except in Cheshire, and some of the large towns in Lancashire. He did not hesitate to express his own opinion that if muzzling were carried out effectively and universally it would prove a complete remedy; but it would be almost impossible to enforce it, as so many exceptions had to be made. It was quite true that, in certain countries, the disease had been stamped out in this way. While in Mauritius the disease prevailed, in Réunion it had been completely stamped out, and no dogs were admitted, so that there had been no case for years past. In a large district in Prussia a similar policy had proved successful. He would not go through the long list of Local Authorities which had taken action under the Order of the Privy Council; and he had just heard that in Birkenhead and other parts of Cheshire these powers were being employed. He did not, therefore, think it necessary to introduce a Bill. The Government had also, by the kind assistance of the authorities at Somerset House, procured the endorsement on dog licences of the symptoms of rabies, so that they might be easily discerned in the early stages, and precautions taken. It had been proposed to put a badge upon each dog licensed, and that precaution had been useful in some countries; but in England the licence was not for a special dog, and so long as the number of licences did not exceed the number of dogs in an owner's possession they availed. He would remind his noble Friend that the police were already authorized to deal with suspected dogs, which practically enabled them to take strays dogs; and, as he had already stated, considerable powers were vested in Local Authorities. Moreover, the Dog Tax was one of the imposts to be given up to the Local Authorities under the new Bill, and it would remain largely with the Local Authorities to put in force what regulations they chose for the future.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM said, that no one who had any experience of the Metropolis could be unaware of the great nuisance from the excessively large number of dogs there. He hoped that the Government would in a future Session see their way to increase the tax on dogs, and so endeavour to diminish the number kept. Many of the dogs kept by people were not only of no use to anybody, but were a positive nuisance. If people could afford to possess dogs throughout the year they could afford to pay a higher tax on them.

METROPOLIS—NEW BUILDINGS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD LAMINGTON said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the new buildings now in progress at Albert Gate, and to ask Her Majesty's Government, When the improvements in Parliament Street would be carried out, and what decision had been come to in regard to the new War and Admiralty Offices? He contented that the new buildings at Albert Gate would utterly destroy the beauty of that part of London. At the very time when there was a great demand for open spaces, light, and air, the authorities had sanctioned the erection of these structures, which he understood would be 20 feet higher than the monstrous and horrible buildings in the neighbourhood of their Lordships' House—Queen's Anne's Mansions. The building at Albert Gate was to be 175 feet high, or within 20 feet of the height of the Monument of London. He wished to know whether the Government had any means of preventing the disfigurement of the Metropolis in this way? He was told that the remedy which the Board of Works had in view to bring pressure upon the builders was to erect a wall to obstruct the view from the basement. That he considered to be a very undignified method of proceeding, and he earnestly recommended those responsible for the good appearance of the Metropolis to consider whether they were altogether without other remedies. Then, with regard to the Parliament Street improvements, he desired to know when it was proposed to carry them out? He disapproved the scheme for the erection of the Admiralty and War Office buildings, involving, as it did, the destruction of a large part of St. James's Park, on which it was proposed to put up a building for Admiralty purposes, leaving the old structure as it was, and the making of a subway under Whitehall to communicate with the new War Office which would be erected on the site once occupied by Carrington House. Of all the schemes in the world, nothing could be worse than that. He asked for some statement upon this question.

Lord Mount Temple

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, that the late Government were pressed to have a model of the new Admiralty and War Office buildings made, so that people could judge whether or not the new structures would be in harmony with the surrounding buildings. He thought there ought to be a model of the proposed addition to the Admiralty.

LORD TRURO said, he thought it could hardly be intended that buildings of so incongruous a nature should be permitted to be erected near Albert Gate. They were most unsightly and a grievous eyesore, and it was desirable that there should be some public official to whom plans of buildings of such an exceptional character ought to be submitted. With regard to the War Office and the Admiralty, one would not have thought that so long a time would have been taken to decide on those buildings. The delay which had occurred in respect to them entailed heavy expense to the country in the shape of rent for public offices.

LORD HENNIKER said, that the noble Lord opposite had spoken of the National Portrait Gallery being at Bethnal Green, and that such a collection was wasted on the population of the East End of London. He did not agree. He did not intend to follow the noble Lord as to this; but, although he would confine himself to answering the three Questions, he would not pass this by unnoticed, and he must repeat what he had said more than once in their Lordships' House—that three or four times as many people had visited the Portrait Gallery since it had been in the East End in comparison to the numbers who visited it when it was at South Kensington. No doubt the noble Lord who had brought forward that subject had seen the answer given lately in "another place" by the First Commissioner of Works. He had little to add to that answer. The Office of Works was at present in communication with the builders of the proposed structure at Albert Gate, which was progressing. That Office had no direct power to interfere with what any proprietor of land might do in such a case; they had no power to interfere with what any proprietor chose to do with his own land, but it had some considerable power indirectly. In this case they could build a wall or screen to prevent access of light from the public park, because, under the Acts of Parliament governing the Royal Parks, the owners had no absolute right to access of light from that direction. The First Commissioner recognized that a site like that at Albert Gate was of great value, and that if acquired by a builder it must be for placing some considerable building upon it. All his right hon. Friend desired was to secure a reasonable protection to the interests of the public, and to see that the Park which was entrusted to his care should not be injured by the erection of those buildings. The great point was to reduce their height. Queen Anne's Mansions had been mentioned. It was only fair to say that the building at Albert Gate would be of an entirely different character. It was artistic, and, if reduced in height, would be an ornament, rather than a damage, to the Park. As he (Lord Henniker) had said, a screen or wall could be erected; but the First Commissioner was in communication with the builders and the owners of the land, and he had every expectation of being able to make an arrangement for obtaining a reasonable reduction of the height, so that the buildings should not only not be detrimental to the public interest, but should be ornamental. As negotiations were proceeding, it would scarcely be right for him to enter further into details at present; but the House might rest assured that the public interests in that matter would not suffer in his right hon. Friend's hands. With respect to Parliament Street, he had stated in the House before, in answer to his noble Friend, that that question was not at all in the hands of the Government. It was altogether a private undertaking, and therefore, as far as the Office of Works was concerned, they had no power whatever over it. Parliament had thought fit last year to insert in the Bill a provision that before any of the buildings were pulled down £500,000 should be subscribed. If that condition had not been imposed he was told that the money would have been subscribed long before. The First Commissioner had recently been assured by the promoters that they had a very good prospect of securing the necessary capital before long. As to the War Office and Admiralty buildings, the plans were in the Tea Room of the House of Commons. The proposed elevation of the Admiralty buildings was contained in the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons last year. No doubt, his noble Friend on the Cross Benches had seen it. The delay with reference to the Admiralty and War Office buildings did not depend on the Office of Works. It had been caused entirely by the action of Parliament. Two Committees had been appointed, and Parliament had taken up the plans, and the Office of Works simply obeyed their orders. The plans—he spoke of the Admiralty plans only now—which had been prepared were in accordance with the recommendations of the Select Committee of the House of Commons which sat last year. These plans were to make an addition to the Admiralty. It was proposed shortly to ask Parliament to vote the sum necessary to carry out those plans. The War Office plans were in abeyance at present. He had never heard of any plan to build a War Office on the site of the house which once belonged to Lord Carrington, with a subway, as suggested. However, the First Commissioner thought that it was far better to carry out one plan at a time, and not to undertake too much. The War Office scheme, too, depended entirely on the decision come to with regard to the Admiralty, and it was impossible for his right hon. Friend to decide on any scheme with regard to the War Office until the House of Commons had arrived at a decision with regard to the Admiralty buildings. If the plans were approved by the House of Commons, his right hon. Friend would then immediately proceed to consider the scheme for the War Office.

Lord Henniker

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, he would urge the desirableness of having a model of the proposed buildings placed in one of the rooms of their Lordships' House.

LORD HENNIKER said, that the elevation was at the beginning of the printed Report of the House of Commons' Committee, and he thought it showed sufficiently what the effect of the new buildings would be. He could not say that a model was required, because he believed that the drawing gave all the necessary information as to relative height of buildings, and so on. He would, however, ask his right hon. Friend whether he thought it desirable that a model should be accessible to their Lordships?

LORD NORTON asked, was it not a fact that the Home Office had prevented an additional storey being made to the Queen Anne's Mansions, which were not intended to be so high as the Albert Gate Mansion? High buildings of the kind referred to caused not only serious disfigurement to the architecture of a town, but great danger to life, and in the unfortunate event of fire breaking out in the building no engine or fire escape could reach the top.

LORD LAMINGTON said, he hoped that a model of the intended new War Office and Admiralty, and also the model which was prepared in 1886, would be placed side by side in the Library, so that noble Lords could compare them.

LORD BASING observed, that it was scarcely correct to speak of the new plan as concocted by the House of Commons. The First Commissioner of Works was Chairman of the Committee to which reference had been made, and had complete control over its proceedings, so that the new plan, and the substitution of it for the discarded plan of Mr. Leeming, was in accordance with the design and policy of Her Majesty's Government.

LORD HENNIKER did not know whether any power existed at the Home Office with respect to the height of buildings; but, as far as the Office of Works was concerned, the powers of that Office were as he had stated. He thought, for his own part, that a model was unnecessary; but he had said he would ask the First Commissioner whether it would be possible to place a model at their Lordships' disposal, and would also ask whether the previous plan could be set, side by side, with the present, in the form of models as suggested by his noble Friend.

TITHE RENT CHARGE RECOVERY AND VARIATION BILL.—(No. 99.)

(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

THE EARL OF POWIS said, he considered the clergy were hardly dealt with in being changed at once from a septennial to a triennial average. Pharoah's lean kine only ate up an equal number of fat ones, representing seven good years, but the noble Marquess made three bad years eat up four good ones. It would have been fairer to make the average be taken first on six, then on five, then on four, and finally on three years, dropping only one year at a time. The seven years' system had been adopted for the benefit of the tithe-payers.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of Salisbury) said, that in the event of the exhaustion of the soil within a certain radius of the seaports of America and the consequent increase in the railway charges upon American wheat, causing wheat to rise in price in this country, the titheowners would gain by having a triennial tithe average rather than a septennial average.

Further Amendments made; and Bill to be read 3^d To-morrow.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) ELECTORS BILL.—(No. 103.)

(The Lord Balfour.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD BALFOUR, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the measure was of such importance that it would not be courteous to the House if he did not state in general terms the object for which it had been introduced. The Bill really formed a part of another measure which was now before the other House of Parliament, and, had time served, it would doubtless have been more convenient to their Lordships to have them both before them at the same time. Nevertheless, in consequence of the exigencies of time, it was necessary for the Bill to be passed into law as early as possible. The object of the Bill was to extend municipal franchise to counties, with the addition that in future the occupation of land to the extent of £10 a-year should be a sufficient qualification. The register would be made up in the same manner as the municipal register now was. The register of occupiers was made up with three divisions; the first contained those qualified for Parliamentary and municipal purposes; the second list was composed of those who were entitled to exercise the Parliamentary franchise only; and the third division consisted of those qualified for municipal and not Parliamentary purposes. The third division of the register would have placed upon it all the female occupiers duly qualified to vote, and any Member of their Lordships' House qualified to vote for the County Councils. One clause of the Bill made it compulsory that in all the districts of the Metropolis the register should be made up according to the situation of the property, and not alphabetically. A power to do this existed at the present time, and some districts had availed themselves of it. In future the register for the Metropolitan district must be all made up in one way, and this way had been chosen as the most convenient to the greater part. He trusted their Lordships would give the Bill a second reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Balfour.)

THE EARL OF JERSEY said that he could not allow that measure to pass its second reading without pointing to several defects which he trusted would be remedied in Committee. Under the Bill an owner of property who was not resident would have no voice in the selection of the County Council, and would not be able to sit upon it. He should like to hear from the Government whether they could not reconsider the position in which owners of property would be placed by the Bill in the event of their being non-resident?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he regarded the Local Government Bill generally as being based on a sound principle—namely, that of establishing County Councils, which were to be elected directly by the inhabitants of the county. He should have been glad, however, to have the same franchise for the election of Members of Parliament as for the election of the members of the County Boards; but he fully recognized the fact that there were difficulties which could not be at once overcome. Still, he could not help entertaining the hope that it might be found possible in the future to assimilate the franchises and to simplify those very complicated registers. He also trusted that some improvements would be introduced into the present system of registration, which was exceedingly complicated and unsatisfactory. The object now in view was to put the counties on practically the same footing as the boroughs, and to give the owners a vote in counties would be to introduce an inequality so great that he felt certain it could not be maintained. If their Lordships were not prepared to introduce the owners' vote into all the municipalities, how could they support its introduction in the counties? There was the objection to the proposed franchise that it left untouched another local franchise by which the Boards of Guardians were elected. For his own part, he could not conceive that it would be possible long to maintain those two franchises side by side with each other without serious questions arising; but he would reserve further observations until the Bill now before the House of Commons came up to them.

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, he admitted that the Government had a fair excuse for asking their Lordships to accept the Bill without discussion; but, as the noble Earl who spoke last showed, the measure in its present shape only touched the fringe of the question, and there must be further legislation in its train. He was anxious that those matters should be fully considered by their Lordships in a future Session, and he therefore gave Notice that he would to-morrow move that the Bill should only continue in force till December 31, 1889. The Government were going to lay down the serious principle that owners should be excluded from a share in electing members of the Local Councils. In endeavouring to attain uniformity between county and municipal government, he feared the Government were sacrificing the substance to the shadow. He hoped their Lordships would not lose sight of the great importance of this Bill because of the larger Bill which was to follow.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY) wished to correct a misapprehension which might arise from a remark of his noble Friend who moved the second reading. Peers were not prevented from taking part in elections by a Resolution of the House of Commons, but by the Common Law of the land.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow; and Standing Order No. XXXV. to be considered in order to its being dispensed with.

PHARMACY ACT (IRELAND), 1875, AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Pharmacy Act (Ireland), 1875—Was presented by The Earl of Milltown, read 1^a. (No. 112.)

House adjourned at quarter before Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

Lord Balfour

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 14th May, 1888.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS — Ordered—First Reading—National Debt (Supplemental)* [264].

Referred to Standing Committee on Trade, &c.— Railway and Canal Companies Charges [49].
Report of Standing Committee on Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure—County Courts Consolidation [No. 172].

Committee—Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland [261]—R.P.; Reformatory Schools Act (1866) Amendment [161]—R.P.

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS — Considered as amended—Local Government (Poor Law) (No. 4)* [218]; Local Government (Poor Law) (No. 5)* [219].

Third Reading—Local Government* [213]; Local Government (No. 2)* [214]; Local Government (Poor Law)* [215]; Local Government (Poor Law) (No. 2)* [216]; Local Government (Poor Law) (No. 3)* [217], and passed.

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, owing to the continuance of his indisposition:—

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

CORK AND BANDON RAILWAY BILL.
CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said, he wished to have an assurance in regard to the Bill. Various remonstrances against it had reached him from Cork, and among those who complained were the Corporation of Cork and the Cork Harbour Commissioners, both of which Bodies had petitioned against the Bill. He wished to know, therefore, whether, before the Bill was considered and ordered to be read a third time, they were to receive some assurance from the hon. Members in charge of it that the Petitions to which he referred would receive due consideration.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER said, the Question before the House was "that the Bill be ordered to be read the third time."

DR. TANNER said, he wished to point out that the Bill dealt with very important matters.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER said, that if the Bill was opposed it must go over until to-morrow.

Bill, as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

ULSTER CANAL AND TYRONE NAVIGATION BILL [Lords].

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir James Corry.)

MR. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.) said, he had no special objection to urge against the Bill; and if the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) would give him a satisfactory assurance that the Canal dealt with by the Bill would hereafter be dealt with in a proper manner, and that they would not lend any more money to the undertaking, his opposition to the measure would be very much removed. His special opposition rose from the fact that he had reason to believe the Government might be tempted to lend money to the Company who were promoting the Bill. He had an inherent horror of the lending of money by the English Government to such an undertaking, and he thought the experience which had been gained in regard to such loans in the past was by no means encouraging. In the case of one of these undertakings, which passed through the Northern part of Ireland, it had never yet paid interest upon the borrowed money. In another case, which involved a scheme of reclamation, a Government had lent to those who were engaged in carrying out the scheme more than the value of the property, even if the scheme had been successful. He was, therefore, desirous in this case that the Government should give an assurance that they would make no further advances to this undertaking, and in that case he would not oppose the Bill. He was afraid that, although the Secretary to the Treasury might resist further applications, yet in the end he might be tempted to lend the money. The promoters professed to offer a security; but their security would be entirely at the mercy of the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland. Certainly, if he were director of that railway, he should use all his efforts to make it impossible for the Canal to be worked in competition, seeing the amount of mischief it was calculated to do the railway without any corresponding benefit. He might further remark that, if this were a bond fide scheme, there would not be the slightest occasion to go to the Government in order to borrow money, for the reason that the Chairman of the Company was a man of large means and the head of a successful stockbroking firm. His clients would be quite ready to lend the money, and if their security were offered for any loan that was required there were plenty of people belonging to stockbroking firms who would advance the money. Those persons, however, thought it more satisfactory to deal with the Government, because the Government were not likely to enforce payment of interest. He had not only great fear that the Government might be tempted to lend money at once; but he had, however, a further fear that if a commencement were made in the way of lending money, the first loan would not be the last. What would occur would be this—the money borrowed in the first instance would be spent, and then a fresh application for another loan would be made. It was alleged that it was desirable to keep up a certain amount of competition by means of this Canal with the Great Northern Railway Company; but, if that were so, how did it happen that while the Canal was in operation, even before the railway was made, other people were able to compete with it satisfactorily? For instance, Mr. John Quinn, a successful carrier, found himself in a position to make a good business by conveying goods to and from Dungannon in competition with the Canal. Therefore, it was difficult to adduce any argument in favour of the Bill. There was another matter which only came to his knowledge a short time ago. It appeared that there was certain property now held under lease from the Government which it was proposed to transfer into a new Company, so that the tenants, instead of being under a landlord like the British Government, might find themselves dealt with in a harsh and arbitrary manner. He thought such a transference would inflict a very great hardship upon those unfortunate persons who held terminable leases which expired in 13 years. In the first instance, they had obtained the property at a very moderate rent, on the condition of paying a small fine on the renewal of the lease. If, instead of being under the British Government, they were compelled to deal with a Company which was trading for a profit, they would run the risk of having their entire property confiscated. In one case, the tenants of John Stevenson and Company paid a rent of £10, and professed to have laid out £6,000 upon the property; another tenant paid £10, and professed to have laid out £5,000. The property brought in a total revenue of £50 14s. a-year, and the tenants professed to have spent upon it no less than £30,000. It would be hard for them to find that their property was confiscated, and it must be remembered that these were not agricultural holdings that would come under the provisions of the Land Act. On the contrary, when the leases expired the tenants would be liable to be called upon to pay an unreasonable rent, or to find themselves evicted. Under those circumstances, and seeing that the Bill was one which was calculated to give rise to a considerable amount of discussion, he thought it would be better that it should be postponed until after Whitsuntide, when there would be more time to consider its provisions. He would, therefore, move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) said, he had had some expectation that when the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Armagh (Sir James P. Corry) rose, not from his usual place, but from a responsible seat on the Government Bench, to move the second reading of the Bill, he would have said something in support of it. As the hon. Baronet had not done so, his (Mr. Healy's) hon. Friend the Member for West Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had felt himself compelled to offer some reasons why the discussion should be deferred until a later date. Nobody could know better than Mr. Deputy Speaker how important this question was, and what an amount of discussion it might give rise to. This question of the Ulster Canal had for some years excited great attention, and it was altogether impossible that adequate discussion should take place upon it that day, for this reason—that Irish Business had been put upon the Paper. Most important matters were down for consideration, and it was not to be expected that the House would address itself to a calm consideration of the present Bill. He had given Notice on Friday to the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) that the Bill could not be properly discussed that day; and he would now appeal to the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) whether it was not desirable to postpone it for a few days? He would give his reasons for making that suggestion. The Bill itself was drawn on the principle of the Bills which had preceded it, all of which had been brought in by the Government. It was a Private Bill, not brought in by the Government on their responsibility. He did not complain of the course pursued by the promoters in endeavouring to obviate discussion in that House by bringing forward the Bill as a private measure; but he did think it an unreasonable course that the Government, who were the immediate parties concerned, and who were really engaged in getting rid of their own property by means of a Private Bill, should not themselves have taken the action implied in the answer which was given by the First Lord of the Treasury to the Question addressed to him on Friday, and have asked the hon. Member for Mid Armagh to postpone the Bill, in order to see whether a short postponement might not have the effect of getting rid of all opposition. He knew that there was considerable anxiety in North Armagh for the passing of the measure, and he had received telegrams requesting him to support it. He was quite ready to do so, if he found that it was possible; but, in the first place, he was anxious to see whether the Government would not make such a promise as would insure the withdrawal of all further opposition, and would allow the Bill to pass with all reasonable speed. But, before withdrawing the opposition, hon. Members should be allowed an opportunity of expressing their views to the Secretary to the Treasury. They had not yet had that opportunity, and he would suggest that a joint deputation consisting of the promoters of the Bill, such as the hon. Baronet (Sir James Corry) and some others, together with some of the opponents of the measure, like his hon. Friend the Member for West Cavan, and persons like himself (Mr. Healy), whose opposition was of a very modified character, should wait upon the Secretary to the Treasury and make representations which would be the means of enabling them to arrive at an agreement that would get rid of all opposition. He would, therefore, support the Motion for the adjournment of the debate, so that the opponents might have an opportunity of placing their views before the Government better than they could possibly have that day. If that step were not taken, of course the opponents would be obliged to enter into a debate upon the merits of the Bill. He himself should strongly deprecate any hostile demonstration against the measure at the present moment; and he had a strong hope that if the Bill were postponed until a later period, all the opposition now raised against it would disappear. If he were in Order upon the Motion for the adjournment of the debate, he would suggest to the Secretary to the Treasury that he should put into the Bill certain clauses that would have the effect of entirely modifying the objections now entertained to it. For instance, an assurance ought to be given that if the purchasing Company should be enabled to turn the Canal to useful purpose, their rights would be transferred to the County Boards of Armagh, Derry, Monaghan, Antrim, and Tyrone, should such Boards be constituted in the future. In that way, he thought, they would get rid of the opposition which his hon. Friend the Member for West Cavan felt disposed to offer to the Bill. Therefore, apart from the consideration whether to-day was a fitting day for the consideration of the measure, he thought the Government might see their way to a compromise, with the view of putting some provisions in the Bill which would have the effect of getting rid of all the difficulty. He, therefore, ventured to support the Motion of his hon. Friend. He certainly thought that the Great Northern Railway Company should never, by any possibility, be allowed to come into possession of this Canal; but the Bill, as it stood, gave no guarantee upon that point. He felt surprised that the Government had not themselves proposed the postponement of the Motion for the second reading. He asked the Secretary to the Treasury to concur in the adjournment of the debate, so that a friendly conference might take place between the Irish Members, seeing that this was a Bill upon which Irish opinion should essentially prevail—whether it was Conservative or Home Rule.

Mr. Biggar

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) said, he hoped the hon. Member for Cavan would not persist in his opposition to the Bill; and he would point out to the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), who had made an appeal to him, that the passing of the Motion for the second reading of the Bill would not prevent any arrangements from being made which it might be necessary to make. He could assure the hon. and learned Member that personally he should be glad at any time to receive any communications or representations which either he or his Friends desired to make in reference to the amendment of the Bill. Hon. Members must be aware that the Bill had been before the House for a long time—[Mr. T. M. HEALY: Not this Bill.]—well, a Bill for the same purpose had been before the House on more than one occasion, and all the present measure did was to give the Lagan Navigation Company power to acquire the Canal. No terms were as yet fixed in the Bill, and therefore it was entirely open to hon. Members opposite and their Friends to make any reference to the Treasury which they thought desirable. He, therefore, hoped that the Motion for the Adjournment would be withdrawn, seeing that the second reading of the Bill would not prevent proper precautions being taken to secure that the interests of the Treasury and the interests of the district should be duly considered, and also to secure that provisions should be introduced into the Bill to make it impossible for the Canal to be acquired by the Great Northern Railway Company. He thought that all those questions might be met without any difficulty after the Bill had been read a second time.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he also ought to have suggested that if the County Board system were established in Ireland, the Canal should be transferred to that Body.

MR. JACKSON said, he was not in a position to give an answer upon that point, as the question, which was raised now for the first time, was a somewhat important question. The proposal was that the Government should make terms or impose conditions in the event of a certain thing taking place. It was on the supposition of a County Authority being established that it was suggested by the hon. and learned Member that that County Authority should take over the Canal. No doubt, at the proper time, that question would be considered. He would only point out that the people of the district had had an opportunity of making known their wishes, but they had not signified any opposition to the Bill. He might say, in answer to the hon. Member for West Cavan (Mr. Biggar), who was good enough to inform him the other day that there had been a quantity of land let on lease by the Board of Works, that he had made inquiry upon that matter, and was told that there were some tenants in that position; but although there were a considerable number of tenancies the rental value was only £40 a-year. Some of the tenants held very long leases, and the Bill did not, in any way, affect the position of their holdings under the leases, and, of course, the leases would hold good, whatever arrangement might be made; certainly it would be the duty of the Treasury or the Commissioners of the Board of Works, who would have to make the conditions under which the Canal Company would acquire the property, to take good care, as far as was necessary, that those tenants were left in full possession of their rights. He trusted, therefore, as there was really no substantial opposition to the Bill, that the second reading would be taken at once, so that the present opportunity might not be lost for making progress with the measure. In the meantime, he would undertake that those points which had been very properly raised by hon. Members opposite should receive full consideration.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, that, as the Representative of a county which was vitally interested in the Bill, he should like to say a word or two in regard to its provisions.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The Question before the House is the adjournment of the debate, and the debate ought to be confined to that Question.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he only rose for the purpose of expressing a hope that the debate would not be adjourned. He quite agreed with the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) that all the points which had been brought forward by hon. Members below the Gangway could be considered quite as well at a later stage of the Bill as now. As that was to be a night devoted to Irish Business, he hoped that hon. Members below the Gangway would allow the Bill to be taken at once, so that they might be able to proceed to more important Business.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) said, he thought the reason which the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. T. W. Russell) had given—namely, that that was to be an Irish night, ought to be a reason for postponing the second reading of the Bill. The Bill, as it stood at present, contained provisions which were of an eminently contentious character. It was quite evident that sufficient time could not be devoted to it that day, the more especially as the merits of the Bill could not be discussed on the question of adjournment. That being so, and having regard to the fact that two Bills of much interest to Ireland, one of which involved the payment of a salary to the Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland, were upon the Paper, he hoped the Motion for the postponement of the debate would be assented to. He certainly thought that the reasons which the Secretary to the Treasury had given for opposing that Motion were somewhat inconclusive. No doubt, the hon. Gentleman had dealt very fairly with the objections which had been raised, and he had intimated that considerable concessions would be made. He had, however, understood that all matters could be considered at a later stage, and there was no reason why the second reading should not be taken that day. He (Mr. M. Healy) would point out that that would not be the case; because, if the promoters were placed in the position of having got this stage of their measure, they would be much less disposed to consider any objections that might be raised to the scheme, or any point that might be submitted to them, than they would be if the House had not assented to the second reading. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had not questioned the fact that as regarded many of the matters which had been raised—for instance, the position of the leaseholders, the ultimate disposition of the property, the control of the County Boards in the event of their being established, and others matters—were matters which must be carefully considered. It was most desirable that an agreement should be come to upon those points, and, if so, there would be a great deal more prospect of arriving at such an agreement and compromise if the Bill were not read a second time. He did not propose to discuss the merits of the Bill, nor did he desire to defeat the Bill. On the contrary, he was disposed to facilitate its passing into law, if that could be done consistently with proper attention being paid to the various interests involved. For his own part, he thought that it was an unreasonable thing to press the second reading upon the House that day.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. M. Healy) said that there were highly contentious matters involved in the Bill; whereas the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) had pointed out that the Bill was one upon which all sections of the Irish Representatives ought to agree.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, his point was, that in that part of the House, as far as he could see, there was a disposition to come to an agreement, if possible, on the subject, although there were contentious matters involved.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said, he had listened to the various reasons which had been urged against the Bill; but the only serious objection was that which had been made by the hon. Member for West Cavan, who protested, as far as he could see, to the money of the State being advanced upon what he regarded as indifferent security. [Mr. BIGGAR: Hear, hear!] For his own part, he was always glad when the State was prepared to advance money to any undertaking that was calculated to develop the resources of Ireland and give employment to its people. So far from its being an objectionable Bill, he would point out that the measure was one which dealt with one of the few questions that were of the most vital importance to the North of Ireland.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. and gallant Member must confine himself to the Question of adjournment.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said, he had understood that the argument in favour of adjournment was that the Bill contained contentious matter. He would simply venture to submit that, knowing a good deal about the Bill, and about the course which had been pursued in the part of Ireland in which he lived, a part of the country which had the advantage of being represented, he believed, by the hon. Member for West Cavan, that so far from being contentious all persons who lived in the locality, with the exception of the hon. Member himself, were of opinion that the Bill would be of great advantage to the North of Ireland. He asked the House to concur with the Secretary to the Treasury that all the objections which had been urged against the Bill, and the reasons which had been given for the adjournment of the debate could be met when the Bill got into Committee. So far as he and his Colleagues were concerned, they were quite ready to meet hon. Gentlemen opposite, and so frame the Bill as to bring it in harmony with the wishes of the people of Ireland and the Representatives of Ireland on both sides. He denied that the Bill was in any way contentious, and he thought it could be easily shown that the Bill was really for the improvement of the North of Ireland. He hoped that hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway would see that that was one of those rare occasions on which they could all join in supporting a measure which would be for the advantage of a considerable portion of the Irish people. He, therefore, trusted that the hon. Member for West Cavan would withdraw his opposition to the second reading of the Bill, and reserve the consideration of any Amendments he might suggest until the Bill came before the Committee. He could assure the hon. Member that the promoters would be glad to consider any proposals that might be made. The effect of the measure might be imperilled, if the second reading were not taken then.

Colonel Sanderson

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.) said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just addressed the House (Colonel Sanderson) told them that if the second reading were not proceeded with then, the measure itself might be lost for the Session. He would, therefore, point out that the Bill was a Private Bill, and it could be brought on in the House at the commencement of Business at any time the Authorities chose; that there was no serious opposition offered to it; and that, on the contrary, it had met with approbation on all sides of the House. Nevertheless, as one who approved of the principle of the Bill, he joined with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) in supporting the Motion for the adjournment of the debate. They had been promised by the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) that when the Bill went into Committee, some of the suggestions which had been made would be accepted; but they were told not to put their trust in princes, and he was inclined, from the performances of some Members of the Government in other matters, not to repose the strictest confidence in the performance of the promises of the Government. For that and other reasons, he would strongly support any Motion that would succeed in extracting from the Ministry some special promise that the principles and suggestions which had been put forward by his hon. and learned Friend would be accepted before the second reading of the Bill was agreed to. He should certainly join with his hon. Friends in opposing the second reading of the Bill, until the House had some better assurance from the Secretary to the Treasury, that the suggestions which had been made to him would be carried out. For that reason, he trusted that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury would not insist upon opposing the Motion for the Adjournment of the Debate.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) said, he had understood from the observations of the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) on Friday last, that he would seek an opportunity for conferring with the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Armagh (Sir James Corry), with a view of seeing whether the measure could not be postponed from that day until a subsequent evening.

having regard to the Business upon which the House wished to be engaged that day. He would put it to the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) whether it would not be proper on the present occasion to accept the proposal for the Adjournment of the Debate, that proposal certainly being in keeping with the promise of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. [Mr. Jackson said, there was no promise.] If there were not a positive promise, the First Lord of the Treasury said he would consult with the hon. Baronet, and see whether some arrangement might not be made for the despatch of Business which would prevent the present Bill from being put down that day. On his own account he joined in the appeal to the Secretary to the Treasury to consent to the adjournment of the debate, for this reason—the Bill had been introduced for three or four years in succession from the Treasury Bench, and he had consistently opposed the Bill on every occasion. The Bill now before the House was a different Bill, and the provisions contained in it were very different from some of the provisions which were included in past Government Bills. In consideration of the alterations which had been made, he was no longer disposed to oppose the transfer of the Ulster Canal to the new Company. He was bound to admit that, so far, he had not made up his mind to vote either for or against the Bill. That was a most unsatisfactory position to take up on the part of one who had for several years strongly objected to the Government Bills, and he therefore hoped that a little further time would be afforded for consideration.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 101; Noes 158: Majority 57.—(Div. List, No. 105.)

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said, he would appeal to his hon. Friend the Member for West Cavan (Mr. Biggar) not to offer further opposition to the second reading of the Bill. They had made their protest against it, and they had received some promise in the nature of a suggestion that the Secretary to the Treasury would undertake, between this and the next stage of the measure, to devote some consideration to the views which had been put forward that day. He would, therefore, simply ask for some information as to what the future course of procedure in regard to the Bill would be. He would suggest that the course to be taken should be similar to that which was taken in the year 1886—namely, that the Bill should be referred to a Committee of Irish Members. He did not know whether that would be possible under the Rules of the House, or whether the Committee of Selection possessed the power of referring it to an Irish Committee or not. As, however, the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir James Corry) had the matter in hand, he would suggest to him that a Select Committee should be appointed to consider the provisions of the Bill, that it should consist of Irish Members only, and that it should include Members from both sides of the House. He believed that such a Committee would be better able to deal with the Bill than any other, and that the consideration it would undergo would have a valuable effect. The Bill involved an entirely new departure in the history of Private Bill legislation. It seemed to him that the Government were handing over to a private Company a sort of damnosa hereditas. Government property to the value of tens of thousands of pounds was proposed to be handed over to a private Company by Her Majesty's Government. He believed there was no instance in the history of Ireland in which the State, finding that it had made a bad investment of the public money, and that it was impossible to make a profit out of it, proposed to hand it over to private individuals. If that was to be the way in which the State cow was to be milked for the Irish people, he entirely repudiated being a party to the transaction. All that he could see in the matter was that the Government had made a bad investment, and that they were now seeking to get rid of their responsibility by handing it over to private individuals. He maintained that if the canal was to be handed over to private individuals, it should be done only with proper safeguards, the first of which was that neither the Great Northern Railway Company, nor any other company, should, under any circumstances, be allowed to get hold of the canal; that it should be vested in some persons who would work it to a profit; and that if the unfortunate Lagan Navigation Company found they could not work it, it should then be handed over to a representative Board, and that the Lagan Navigation Company should not be allowed, having got the property for nothing, to apply to the Irish Courts for a winding-up order, so that the assets of the Company, including themselves, might become assets for the benefit of their creditors. He did not see why that canal property should ever be allowed to become an asset so far as the debts of the Lagan Navigation Company were concerned. On the contrary, it should be preserved intact. He would further suggest, as a third point, that wherever private rights existed, as in the case of the Tyrone Tile Making Company, they should be duly protected. His hon. Friend the Member for West Cavan had made a fourth proposition—namely, that no further sums of money should be lent by the Government. His hon. Friend thought that if money were lent, it would be lent on very bad security. The Government might think that in getting rid of their liabilities for a payment of £1,000 a-year they might be making a good bargain; but he was of opinion that if they were going to give away the money at all, they should give it frankly, and not as a loan; because he could assure them that they would never receive one penny of the money back again, as long as any water continued to flow in the Lagan, which he was advised would not cover a very lengthened period. It was quite evident that the Government had made a bad investment, and it would be just as well that they should treat the matter frankly, and part with the property with a good grace. He certainly trusted that the Secretary to the Treasury would give the House an assurance that no more money would be advanced by the Exchequer to that undertaking. Perhaps, if a strong feeling prevailed among Gentlemen who represented the minority of Ulster Members opposite, he might not feel called upon to oppose their wishes; but as the Government were making a new departure, and were proposing to hand over the assets of the State to a private Body, he thought the best course they could follow would be to provide that the provisions of the measure should be considered by a Committee composed entirely of Irish Members.

Mr. T. M. Healy

SIR CHARLES LEWIS (Antrim, N.) said, he was prepared to oppose the extraordinary suggestion which had been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. T. M. Healy). That was a private Bill and unopposed, and the question before the House was that it should be read a second time. He apprehended that under those circumstances there was only one course which the House could pursue, and that the Bill must take its ordinary and legal course. It had been suggested that the Government had placed themselves under certain pledges, and that a certain understanding had been come to; but that was no reason why the measure should only be considered by a Committee composed of Irish Members. The Question before the House was, whether the Bill ought to be read a second time or not. He did not think that it was possible for the House to come to any understanding such as that which had been suggested by the hon. and learned Member for North Longford—namely, that the Bill should be referred to a Special Committee of Irish Members. He understood that it could only go before the Chairman of Committees in the usual form, with one Member of the House sitting with him, and he entirely repudiated the suggestion of the second reading being taken on any understanding whatever. Why any hon. Member should object to the ordinary course being taken, he could not for the life of him understand, and he should be glad to hear definitely from the Government what they intended to do. He had understood the Secretary to the Treasury to say that he would endeavour to mediate between the promoters of the Bill and certain persons who might not have a locus standi to oppose it, but with whom it might be desirable to make some arrangement before the Bill received the sanction of Parliament. That was a perfectly fair course, and it might be desirable to insert certain safeguards in the Bill, but he altogether objected to any proposal to take the Bill out of the ordinary course.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.) said, he was most anxious that the Bill should pass as quickly as possible; but, at the same time, he must join with his hon.

and learned Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) in endeavouring to arrive at some understanding by which, if the Bill did pass, and the canal were handed over to the Lagan Navigation Company, it should not be possible for the Great Northern Railway Company or any other Railway Company to purchase or lease the canal hereafter. He thought that the Secretary to the Treasury should give some sort of assurance to that effect, or otherwise the canal would be of very little use. It was of no use at present, although it might be of great value if it were put in order. If, however, it were put in order at the expense of the State, and then allowed to be purchased by the Great Northern or any other Railway Company, it would be of very little advantage to the North of Ireland. So long as it could be used as a competing line with Northern Railways, it would be of much advantage to the commercial community in securing the lowering of rates and the price of the carriage of provisions and other goods. But if a loop-hole were left by which Railway Companies could purchase the canal, it would be of no use whatever, but would rather be in direct opposition to the interests of the North of Ireland. Representing as he did the commercial interests of that part of the country, he protested, anxious as he was that the Bill should pass, against the canal being handed over to the Lagan Navigation Company for the purpose of selling it. No one could be more anxious than he was, that the measure should pass. He had supported the provisions it contained in various forms, locally and otherwise, for many years, and he was glad that the Bill had now arrived at the stage it had reached in that House, but he thought there ought to be some guarantee before they consented to pass it, that it should be worked in the interests of the people of the North of Ireland. He thought it was not unreasonable to ask the Secretary to the Treasury to give an assurance to those who were anxious that the Bill should pass, that it should not be handed over to a Railway Company which up to the present time had saddled the people of the North of Ireland with very high and prohibitive rates. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) had also made another valuable suggestion—namely, that if it could not be worked with advantage it should not be permitted to be sold, or thrown into a bankrupt estate; nor was the suggestion unreasonable that the Committee appointed to consider the provisions of the measure should consist of Irish Members only. He thought it was only fair that Members from the North of Ireland, whose constituents were most interested in the measure, should be selected to consider the Bill. If it were found that it was a measure for the good of the country, it would certainly not be against the interests of the Lagan Navigation Company or the North of Ireland that the Committee should be composed of Irish Members. He therefore approved of the suggestion that the Committee should be an Irish one, and he would further press upon the Government the propriety of giving a guarantee that the canal should never be handed, by lease or otherwise, over to the Great Northern or other Railway Company, but maintained as an independent competing medium.

MR. JACKSON said, a question had been asked as to the desirability of inserting provisions in the Bill, to take care that in handing over the canal to the Lagan Navigation Company, they should be prevented from transferring the property they acquired to a Railway Company. He regarded that suggestion as a most reasonable one, and he had no hesitation, therefore, in saying, in view of bringing the present discussion to a termination, that he would himself undertake to say that no such provision should be inserted in the Bill, or in the agreement which it would be necessary to make for carrying it into effect. He need hardly point out that in regard to forming a Committee composed of Irish Members only, that was a matter that was not in his power to control. The Bill stood at present as an unopposed Bill, and in the ordinary course would be before the Chairman of Committees. What he had promised the hon. and learned Member for North Longford was, that he would be prepared to accept any information in regard to the measure which he or his Friends were prepared to place before him.

SIR JOHN MOWBRAY (Oxford University) said, it would not be in the power of the Committee of selection to do what the hon. and learned Member for North Longford desired, or to place on the Committee to which the Bill would be sent, any one interested in the matter. If the hon. and learned Gentleman desired something out of the ordinary course, it would be necessary for him to make a Motion to that effect to the House.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he wished to ask as a question of Order, whether it would be regular to give Notice that day, that he would move to-morrow that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member can give Notice; but he cannot make such a Motion now.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE
(IRELAND) ACT, 1887 (CONVICTION OF MR. CONDON).

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER acquainted the House that he had received the following Letter, relating to the Conviction of a Member of this House:—

Limerick,
10th May, 1888.

Sir,

I have the honor to report that on the 7th instant, at Mitchelstown, Mr. Condon, M.P., was tried and convicted before a Court constituted under "The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887," of which I was a member, and sentenced to 14 days' imprisonment without hard labour. The offence charged was for taking part in an unlawful assembly, under Sec. 2 of said Act.

I have the honor to be,

Sir,

Your obedient servant,

J. B. IRWIN, R.M.

To the Right Honble. the Speaker,
House of Commons.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE
(IRELAND) ACT, 1887 (CONVICTION OF MR. DILLON).

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER acquainted the House that he had received the following Letter, relating to the Conviction of a Member of this House:—

County of Louth.

Drogheda,

12th May, 1888.

Sir

I have the honour to report that on yesterday,

Sir John Mowbray

11th inst., at Mells, in this county, before a Court of Petty Sessions, under "The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887," of which I was Chairman, found Mr. John Dillon, M.P., guilty of having on 8th ulto., in this country, taken part in the "Plan of Campaign," and the sentence of the Court was that Mr. Dillon be imprisoned in Dundalk Gaol for six months, without hard labour.

Mr. Dillon was again tried to-day, before the same Court, on a charge of having on the same occasion incited others to take part in the "Plan of Campaign," on this charge he was also found guilty and sentenced to the same term of imprisonment, to run concurrently with first sentence.

From these orders Mr. Dillon has appealed to the County Court Judge, to be heard on 20th June next.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your obedt. servt.

THOS. HAMILTON,

Resident Magistrate.

Right Honble. Arthur Wellesley Peel, M.P., Speaker, House of Commons.

Q U E S T I O N S .

—o—

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—DILL MILL FARM CROFTERS—APPEAL.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is true that an appeal to the Court of Justiciary has been lodged at the instance of the Procurator Fiscal against the recent judgment of Sheriff Fraser acquitting certain crofters tried before him on a charge of criminal mischief at Dill Mill Farm; whether he can mention any instances of an appeal to a Higher Court taken by a Public Prosecutor against a judgment of acquittal pronounced on the merits of the case and after proof; and, whether the Procurator Fiscal, at whose instance the appeal is said to have been taken, is agent for the proprietor of the farm in question, or connected with any firm of agents who act for the proprietor?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): An appeal was lodged to keep the matter open till Crown counsel could be consulted. The appeal is not to be proceeded with. There have been cases such as are referred to in the second paragraph; but of course they are rare, and are not having regard to the Business upon which the House wished to be engaged that day. He would put it to the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) whether it would not be proper on the present occasion to accept the proposal for the Adjournment of the Debate, that proposal certainly being in keeping with the promise of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. [Mr. JACKSON said, there was no promise.] If there were not a positive promise, the First Lord of the Treasury said he would consult with the hon. Baronet, and see whether some arrangement might not be made for the despatch of Business which would prevent the present Bill from being put down that day. On his own account he joined in the appeal to the Secretary to the Treasury to consent to the adjournment of the debate, for this reason—the Bill had been introduced for three or four years in succession from the Treasury Bench, and he had consistently opposed the Bill on every occasion. The Bill now before the House was a different Bill, and the provisions contained in it were very different from some of the provisions which were included in past Government Bills. In consideration of the alterations which had been made, he was no longer disposed to oppose the transfer of the Ulster Canal to the new Company. He was bound to admit that, so far, he had not made up his mind to vote either for or against the Bill. That was a most unsatisfactory position to take up on the part of one who had for several years strongly objected to the Government Bills, and he therefore hoped that a little further time would be afforded for consideration.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 101; Noes 158: Majority 57.—(Div. List, No. 105.)

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said, he would appeal to his hon. Friend the Member for West Cavan (Mr. Biggar) not to offer further opposition to the second reading of the Bill. They had made their protest against it, and they had received some promise in the nature of a suggestion that the Secretary to the Treasury would undertake, between this and the next stage of the measure, to devote some consideration to the views which had been put forward that day. He would, therefore, simply ask for some information as to what the future course of procedure in regard to the Bill would be. He would suggest that the course to be taken should be similar to that which was taken in the year 1886—namely, that the Bill should be referred to a Committee of Irish Members. He did not know whether that would be possible under the Rules of the House, or whether the Committee of Selection possessed the power of referring it to an Irish Committee or not. As, however, the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir James Corry) had the matter in hand, he would suggest to him that a Select Committee should be appointed to consider the provisions of the Bill, that it should consist of Irish Members only, and that it should include Members from both sides of the House. He believed that such a Committee would be better able to deal with the Bill than any other, and that the consideration it would undergo would have a valuable effect. The Bill involved an entirely new departure in the history of Private Bill legislation. It seemed to him that the Government were handing over to a private Company a sort of damnosa hereditas. Government property to the value of tens of thousands of pounds was proposed to be handed over to a private Company by Her Majesty's Government. He believed there was no instance in the history of Ireland in which the State, finding that it had made a bad investment of the public money, and that it was impossible to make a profit out of it, proposed to hand it over to private individuals. If that was to be the way in which the State cow was to be milked for the Irish people, he entirely repudiated being a party to the transaction. All that he could see in the matter was that the Government had made a bad investment, and that they were now seeking to get rid of their responsibility by handing it over to private individuals. He maintained that if the canal was to be handed over to private individuals, it should be done only with proper safeguards, the first of which was that neither the Great Northern Railway Company, nor any other company, should, under any circumstances, be allowed to get hold of the canal; that it should be vested in some persons doubtedly, occurred in the settlement of pending questions through the disinclination of Newfoundland to adopt the arrangement arrived at in Paris.

EDUCATION (IRELAND) — CATHOLIC SCHOOL AT ANNALITTON, CO. MONAGHAN.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it the fact that, upon a Catholic school being opened at Annaliton, Castleblayney, County Monaghan, the parents of several Catholic children who attended, and who had hitherto been obliged to go to a Protestant school kept by an Orangeman, were visited by the police and asked to explain why their children were sent to a school of their own denomination?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The District Inspector of Constabulary reports that it is not the case that the parents of any of the Roman Catholic children who recently left the Annaliton National School—which, though taught by a Protestant, is a mixed school—have been visited by the police for the purpose mentioned in the Question.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If I supply the right hon. Gentleman with the names of the parents so visited, will he make inquiry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Certainly, I shall be glad to make inquiries. I think that certain parents were visited; but, as far as I can make out, not with the object stated in the Question; but I will give the hon. and learned Gentleman all the information I have.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman state what was the object with which they were visited?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What I understand is this—that the Roman Catholic clergy objected to the National school, presumably on the ground that it was taught by a Protestant, and started a new school in the place, to which all the Roman Catholics went over, with the exception of three families who were in the employment of a Loyalist (Mr. H. Cuming). It was stated that Father Gaughran, C.C., was bringing pressure to bear on these three families to make them send their children to the new school, and it was on this subject the police made inquiry.

Sir James Fergusson

SOUTH AFRICA — SOUTH AFRICAN (TRANSVAAL) REPUBLIC AND THE NEW REPUBLIC TREATY OF UNION.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is the case that a Treaty of Union has been entered into between the South African (Transvaal) Republic and the New Republic; and, whether, in accordance with Treaty rights, the sanction of Her Majesty's Government was given to such union?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Such a Treaty has been entered into, and it will be found in the Papers relating to Zululand lately presented to Parliament. The sanction of Her Majesty's Government has not yet been given.

SOUTH AFRICA — THE TRANSVAAL GOVERNMENT—RAILWAY CONCESSION.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is a fact that a concession has been granted by the Transvaal Government to a Dutch-German Syndicate for a railway from the Portuguese border to Pretoria; whether one of the conditions of the concession is the right to take in goods free of Customs Duty; whether Her Majesty's Government consider such a concession is consistent with the Treaty rights secured to this country; and, whether any Correspondence has taken place between the two Governments regarding the matter; and, if so, when it will be laid upon the Table?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.) (who replied) said: The answer to the first two paragraphs of the Question is in the affirmative. Her Majesty's Government have under their consideration the question whether such a concession is consistent with the Treaty rights secured to this country. Correspondence is in progress with the South African Republic on the subject; but no decision can be arrived at as to presenting it to Parliament until it is concluded.

and learned Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) in endeavouring to arrive at some understanding by which, if the Bill did pass, and the canal were handed over to the Lagan Navigation Company, it should not be possible for the Great Northern Railway Company or any other Railway Company to purchase or lease the canal hereafter. He thought that the Secretary to the Treasury should give some sort of assurance to that effect, or otherwise the canal would be of very little use. It was of no use at present, although it might be of great value if it were put in order. If, however, it were put in order at the expense of the State, and then allowed to be purchased by the Great Northern or any other Railway Company, it would be of very little advantage to the North of Ireland. So long as it could be used as a competing line with Northern Railways, it would be of much advantage to the commercial community in securing the lowering of rates and the price of the carriage of provisions and other goods. But if a loop-hole were left by which Railway Companies could purchase the canal, it would be of no use whatever, but would rather be in direct opposition to the interests of the North of Ireland. Representing as he did the commercial interests of that part of the country, he protested, anxious as he was that the Bill should pass, against the canal being handed over to the Lagan Navigation Company for the purpose of selling it. No one could be more anxious than he was, that the measure should pass. He had supported the provisions it contained in various forms, locally and otherwise, for many years, and he was glad that the Bill had now arrived at the stage it had reached in that House, but he thought there ought to be some guarantee before they consented to pass it, that it should be worked in the interests of the people of the North of Ireland. He thought it was not unreasonable to ask the Secretary to the Treasury to give an assurance to those who were anxious that the Bill should pass, that it should not be handed over to a Railway Company which up to the present time had saddled the people of the North of Ireland with very high and prohibitive rates. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) had also made another valuable suggestion—namely, that if it could not be worked with advantage it should not be permitted to be sold, or thrown into a bankrupt estate; nor was the suggestion unreasonable that the Committee appointed to consider the provisions of the measure should consist of Irish Members only. He thought it was only fair that Members from the North of Ireland, whose constituents were most interested in the measure, should be selected to consider the Bill. If it were found that it was a measure for the good of the country, it would certainly not be against the interests of the Lagan Navigation Company or the North of Ireland that the Committee should be composed of Irish Members. He therefore approved of the suggestion that the Committee should be an Irish one, and he would further press upon the Government the propriety of giving a guarantee that the canal should never be handed, by lease or otherwise, over to the Great Northern or other Railway Company, but maintained as an independent competing medium.

MR. JACKSON said, a question had been asked as to the desirability of inserting provisions in the Bill, to take care that in handing over the canal to the Lagan Navigation Company, they should be prevented from transferring the property they acquired to a Railway Company. He regarded that suggestion as a most reasonable one, and he had no hesitation, therefore, in saying, in view of bringing the present discussion to a termination, that he would himself undertake to say that no such provision should be inserted in the Bill, or in the agreement which it would be necessary to make for carrying it into effect. He need hardly point out that in regard to forming a Committee composed of Irish Members only, that was a matter that was not in his power to control. The Bill stood at present as an unopposed Bill, and in the ordinary course would be before the Chairman of Committees. What he had promised the hon. and learned Member for North Longford was, that he would be prepared to accept any information in regard to the measure which he or his Friends were prepared to place before him.

SIR JOHN MOWBRAY (Oxford University) said, it would not be in the power of the Committee of selection to do what the hon. and learned Member for North Longford desired, or to place

Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that, in spite of an assurance given to their solicitor that the cases had been adjourned, three persons were tried and convicted, when absent from Court through the refusal of the constabulary to allow them to enter, by Mr. Tynte, R.M., at Loughrea Courthouse, of participating in the proceedings at Loughrea, on the 8th of April; and, whether such a practice of trying and convicting persons in their absence has the sanction of the Government?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Resident Magistrate named reports that this Question does not accurately represent the facts. The cases against the three persons referred to had been originally entered for hearing at Petty Sessions on the 19th of April, before Mr. Paul, R.M., who adjourned them, informing the counsel for the defence that they would not be taken until after a Crimes Court case, which was also adjourned, on the application of the defendants' counsel, to the 26th of April. On the latter date Colonel Tynte, R.M., unaware of what Mr. Paul had stated on the 19th, came to the Court at the usual hour, and began to hear the ordinary business. He heard the cases against the three defendants, their names being first duly called in Court. The District Inspector of Constabulary reports that there is no ground for the allegation that the defendants were refused admittance by the police. Later on, the counsel for the defendants appeared, and stated that he had a promise from the presiding magistrate on the previous occasion that the ordinary Petty Sessions business would not be taken until after the Crimes Court case. Colonel Tynte, having satisfied himself that there was a misunderstanding as to the time for the defendants to appear, and, not having signed the order, ruled that these cases should be re-heard.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: Then am I to understand that Colonel Tynte had come to a decision?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If he gave his decision, he evidently rescinded it, because the cases are to be re-heard.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: Did he not come to a decision?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no further information.

Mr. J. E. Ellis

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked, was it not the fact—as he was present in the Court—that these three persons were excluded from the Court and kept out of the Court when their own trial came on; and that, notwithstanding that, Colonel Tynte proceeded with the cases, and that it was only after the appeal of counsel that he rescinded his decision?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he understood that there was no foundation for the allegation that the police refused admittance to the defendants; and it was perfectly clear, from the facts he had laid before the House, that the defendants suffered no loss in the matter, and that full justice was done them.

MR. T. M. HEALY asked, would the right hon. Gentleman give an undertaking that no person would be tried under such circumstances; because, had it not been for the intervention of counsel, Colonel Tynte would have signed the order, and great injustice would have been done?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, no one will be intentionally tried under such circumstances.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): May I ask, whether the Government will grant these men compensation for the loss of time for having been brought to the Court, and their cases not having been tried?

[No reply.]

GAME ACTS—SALE OF RUSSIAN PARTRIDGES AND HARES.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Why Russian partridges and hares may be sold in Leadenhall and Central Markets but not by licensed retail dealers?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): So far as I am aware, there is no difference as to the right of selling foreign game in Leadenhall and Central Markets, or in any retail shop. The same licences apply to wholesale and retail dealing in game, and the same restrictions apply to both.

CHARITY COMMISSIONERS—CHRIST'S HOSPITAL SCHEME.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside) asked the Vice President of the raised with a view to a second trial before the Summary Court, but only to obtain an authoritative decision on points of law, which is the only matter on which appeal is permissible in summary cases. The Procurator Fiscal is not agent for the proprietors. His partner is the local agent. The criminal proceedings in the case were not at the instance of the proprietor, but at the instance of the tenants, for whom neither the Procurator Fiscal nor his partner acts as agent.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL, SCHEDULE 4—MUNICIPAL BOROUGHES (TRANSFER OF POWERS, &c.)

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, having regard to the representations that have been made to him on behalf of the Municipal Boroughs, he proposes to make any additions to the boroughs to be included in Schedule 4 of the Local Government Bill?

THE PRESIDENT (MR. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Government are sensible of the strength of the representations which have been made to them on the subject referred to by the right hon. Gentleman. The matter is now being carefully considered; and I propose, when the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James), which is one of the first Amendments in Committee on the Bill, comes on for consideration, to make a statement on the subject. I am afraid I cannot do so until then, as it is essential that I should enter into particulars, which could not satisfactorily be done in answer to a Question.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION, SUB-COMMISSIONERS' AND CIVIL BILL COURTS—FAIR RENT.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, If the Land Commission will in future Returns state the number of applications to fix fair rents under the Land Acts of 1881 and 1887 brought before the Sub-Commissioners, as also the number of fair rents fixed, distinct from the fair rent applications brought and fixed by the Civil Bill Courts; and, if he can state the number of fair rents fixed respectively by the Sub-Commissioners and by the Civil Bill Courts for the three months ended December 31, 1887, as also for the three months ended March 31, 1888?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN) (Dublin University): The Land Commissioners inform me that it is their intention to make in future monthly Returns the distinction indicated in the first paragraph of this Question. The number of fair rents fixed during the three months ended December 31, 1887, was, by Sub-Commissions, 2,578; by Chief Commissioners on reports of valuers, 8; by Civil Bill Courts, 62—total, 2,643. The number of fair rents fixed during the three months ending March 31, 1888, was, by Sub-Commissions, 3,423; by Chief Commissioners on reports of valuers, 41; by Civil Bill Courts, 404—total, 3,868.

NEWFOUNDLAND SALMON FISHERIES—FRENCH ENCROACHMENTS.

MR. SAMUELSON (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, it is a fact that last year the French erected, or caused to be erected, for the taking of salmon, a weir in the River of Ponds, on the West Coast of Newfoundland, which barred the said River, and prevented the ascent of salmon to its upper waters; whether such obstruction exceeds the fishing rights possessed by the French by virtue of Treaties; whether the British naval authorities in those waters have power to remove the weir; and, whether the Report of the officer commanding H.M.S. Emerald on the weir at River of Ponds has been taken into consideration by the Government, with a view to prevent the erection of a similar obstruction next summer?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): These matters are at present the subject of correspondence between the Governments, and I would rather be excused from making any statement regarding them. Many questions relating to fishing on the coasts of Newfoundland have been discussed between the Governments of Great Britain and France, and difficulties connected with them have been obviated by mutual forbearance. Delays have, un-ther, although the summons was dismissed on the ground that the complainant should have been the Town Commissioners, the presiding magistrate stated that—

“So far as the emblem was concerned there was nothing to object to in it. We cannot understand why Captain Payne interfered with them;”

and added, in giving judgment,—

“That both Mr. Furlong and himself considered that Mr. Payne had acted not only with very bad taste but with the most extreme imprudence and danger. By the insult he committed he not only placed himself in danger, but also other people who might be supposed to regard Mr. Payne's action with favour; but on the legal point they did not see their way to a conviction;”

to what military command is Captain Payne attached; and, do his superiors intend to take any notice of his conduct?

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL (A LORD of the TREASURY) (Wigton) (who replied) said: The gentleman referred to in this Question is a Militia officer, whose battalion is not out for training. He is not employed on any military duty, and nothing is known of the matter by the Military Authorities in Ireland beyond what they have seen in the newspapers.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he considered that a very unsatisfactory reply. There was a captain of the Militia who committed so grave an offence that the magistrate who tried the case said—

“So far as the emblem was concerned there was nothing to object to in it. We cannot understand why Captain Payne interfered with them;”

and added, in giving judgment—

“That both Mr. Furlong and himself considered that Mr. Payne had acted not only with very bad taste, but with the most extreme imprudence and danger. By the insult he committed he not only placed himself in danger, but also other people who might be supposed to regard Mr. Payne's action with favour; but on the legal point they did not see their way to a conviction;”

I beg to ask, whether Her Majesty's Government will allow the gentleman to remain in the Service?

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, he was prepared to make further inquiries into the case; but he doubted whether the Military Authorities could do anything to a gentleman who was not on military service at the time.

Mr. T. M. Healy

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL RESOLUTIONS —THE HORSE TAX—INCUMBENTS OF PARISHES.

SIR JOHN MOWBRAY (Oxford University) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, having regard to the fact that clergymen going on duty did not pay turnpike tolls, he will exempt from taxation horses kept by incumbents in charge of parishes with large area, who are compelled to keep such horses for the pastoral visitation of their parishes?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): It is provided in the Bill that duty be repaid in respect of one horse used by a minister of religion in the course of the year; and beyond this I do not think that any concession should be made.

INLAND REVENUE — MEDICINE STAMPS TAX—LEGISLATION.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If, in view of the widespread dissatisfaction existing at the manner in which the Medicine Stamps Tax has lately been enforced, especially in Scotland, he would be prepared, pending the introduction of a Bill dealing with the whole question, to repeal the clauses which apply to medicines not coming under the head of patent or secret compounds?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): I am not aware that there has been any expression on the part of the chemists and druggists of the “widespread dissatisfaction” which the hon. Member's Question assumes to exist. In fact, the leading trade journals have on more than one occasion expressed an opinion that these duties are administered in a considerate manner. There is no difference between England and Scotland in the mode of enforcement. The adoption of the hon. Member's suggestion would destroy the greater part of the produce of the duties.

WALES — RATES ON TITHE-RENT CHARGE—THE VICAR OF LLANFIHANGEL, DENBIGHSHIRE.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Vicar of Llanfihangel, near Cerrig-y-Druidion, Denbighshire, declines to pay his rates to the overseers of the parish; whether Mr. W. Kerr, a magistrate of the Petty Sessional Division of Cerrig-y-Druidion, refused to sign the summons to bring the case before the Petty Sessions; and, whether such a refusal on the part of the magistrate is in accordance with the law, and, if not, whether he will bring the conduct of the magistrate under the notice of the Lord Chancellor?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; I am informed that the Vicar did decline to pay the rate on the tithe rent-charge, on the ground that it had not been paid to him. The magistrate did refuse to sign the summons. I have no authority to express opinions on points of law. If the magistrate has claimed to have a discretion in the matter of issuing the summons, which the law does not give him, a simple remedy is provided by 11 & 12 Vict., c. 44, s. 5.

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND)—ADVANCES TO THE MACGILLYCUDDY OF THE REEKES.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kerry, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How much money has been advanced to the MacGillycuddy of the Reekes by the Board of Works since the year 1879; what is the Poor Law valuation of the property on which this money is chargeable; how much, if any, of this loan has been paid back into the Treasury; who inspected the works for which this money was advanced; and, what provision is made to satisfy the Board of Works that money advanced for drainage purposes is so expended?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.), in reply, said, he had made inquiries on getting Notice of the Question; but had not yet got the information which would enable him to answer the Question fully.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) — INSTRUCTION IN THRIFT.

SIR JOSEPH BAILEY (Hereford) for Mr. NORTON (Kent, Tunbridge)

asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, If his attention has been directed to the following passage in the Report issued last year by the Select Committee on National Provident Insurance:—

“Your Committee are of opinion that it is highly desirable that the Legislature, which has made education compulsory, should cause instruction in sound principles of thrift and insurance to form part of that education;”

and, whether he has considered the propriety of introducing an elementary text book on the principles of provident insurance into the routine of elementary schools?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): The Department have had under consideration the passage referred to by my hon. Friend; and will place no difficulty in the way of managers exercising their discretion as to the choice of such a reading book as he describes if it fulfils the ordinary conditions.

VACCINATION ACT, 1871—HALESOWEN PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has received a letter, dated March 11, 1888, from Enoch Harper, of Quinton, Staffordshire, making complaint that he was not allowed to appear to a vaccination summons at Halesowen Petty Sessions by a representative, duly authorized in his behalf, under Section 11 of “The Vaccination Act, 1871,” and that the Chairman, having refused a hearing to his representative so authorized, proceeded to impose a fine of 20s. and 9s. costs; whether the statements in Enoch Harper’s letter are correct; and, whether such fine and costs were legally imposed; and, if not, whether he will take steps to cause the amount of fine and costs to be refunded to Mr. Harper?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; I have received such a letter. The statement is correct that the Bench refused to hear Mr. Harper’s representative. Under these circumstances, the proceedings were, in my opinion, irregular; and I have accordingly advised the remission of the fine, and have written to the Justices that the defendant should also be re-imbursed the costs.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—CLAUSE 3—TOWN COUNCILS.

MR. HULSE (Salisbury) asked the President of the Local Government Board, What will be the future position of the Town Council under Clause 3, Sub-section 4, of the Local Government Bill; and, whether the County Council will maintain and have entire control over buildings in boroughs which are used for the Assize Courts, now belonging to the Council of such boroughs, and in which Assizes may be, and are, held?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. Ritchie) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's), in reply, said, that neither the County Council nor the Joint Committee of the Quarter Sessions and County Council will have transferred to them any powers with regard to any Assize Court which are not now possessed by the Quarter Sessions of the county. The Local Government Bill will not interfere with the powers of the Town Council of a borough as to their control over buildings which belong to the borough, and which are used for the Assize Courts.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—JOHN S. DEANS, OF THE ENNIS POLICE FORCE.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Why Constable John S. Deans, of the Ennis Police Force, has been dismissed; and, whether, on the occasion of his dismissal, any cause was assigned?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): This man was discharged, on the ground that his retention in the Force would no longer be of advantage to the Public Service.

MR. CONYBEARE asked, if the Chief Secretary would state on what ground that conclusion was arrived at.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he was afraid he could not go into the question.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he should again call attention to the matter.

Mr. Matthews

PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT (INDIA) —OFFICIALS IN SERVICE OF PRIVATE COMPANIES.

MR. MALLOCK (Devon, Torquay) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, What number of officers belonging to the Public Works Department in India are now in the employment of Private Companies or private persons in whose undertakings the Indian Government has no pecuniary interest?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): Twenty-eight. Of these, 22 are employed in Native States, mostly in connection with railways, and six are lent to the Government of Egypt.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—SITTINGS AT CARRIGALLEN.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether there were 71 applications recently listed for hearing before the Land Commission from the district of Carrigallen; whether the Land Commission was applied to to fix Carrigallen as the place for hearing these applications; whether that request was refused, and on what grounds; and, whether, in consequence of this refusal, the suitors were obliged to walk 14 or 15 miles, and most of them to be absent from their homes from Tuesday to Saturday, being detained to suit the convenience of the landlord, who did not attend when the cases were called?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Land Commissioners inform me that the number of applications listed from the Carrigallen District was about 71. The Land Commission has been applied to to fix Carrigallen as the place for hearing these applications; but they were of opinion that the balance of convenience was against selecting that place, and that it would conduce to the more rapid discharge of business to hear the cases elsewhere. The cases taken up and heard each day were fixed in advance, so as to avoid the possibility of any loss of time.

INLAND REVENUE — EXCISE — BREWERS' HOUSES.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the G vernment could obtain and give the House a Return of the number of public-houses owned by brewers in half-a-dozen typical towns in England and Wales?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied) said, he was afraid that the Return could not be granted, because if the information could be obtained it would not be of a reliable character.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM said, he had been able to obtain the information from the Mayor of Bath, and asked if it could not be obtained from other towns?

[No reply.]

THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL (INDIA)
—THE CALCUTTA MUNICIPALITY
BILL.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the new Calcutta Municipality Bill, now before the Bengal Legislative Council, contains novel features unknown to like legislation in the United Kingdom; for example, giving the power of voting under the municipal franchise to the Calcutta Chamber of Commerce and to the Calcutta Trades' Association, the members of which Bodies already possess the right of voting in their private capacity as citizens; and multiplicity of votes, it being alleged that plurality voting according to property qualification and by the cumulative system obtains in English municipal franchise procedure; whether he is aware that the proposed measure is unpopular with a large majority of the inhabitants of Calcutta, owing partly to the inclusion on arbitrary grounds of certain suburban places within the future municipal limits of Calcutta, although such places are already included in a local municipality; and, whether the Secretary of State will instruct the Viceroy in Council not to sanction the Bill until the inhabitants of Calcutta have had an opportunity, by deputation or otherwise (advantage to be taken of such opportunity before the close of the present Session) of expressing to the Secretary of State their objections to the measure as at present framed?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham):

The Calcutta Municipality Bill, which contains provisions of the kind referred to by the hon. Member, has been for two years under discussion in the Bengal Legislative Council; and the inhabitants of Calcutta have had ample opportunities of expressing their objections to the measure and making representations to the Secretary of State, if they thought fit to do so. No such representations have been made; and the Secretary of State has no intention of interfering with the discretion which the Governor General possesses under the Indian Council Act of assenting to or withholding his assent from the Bill after it has passed the Bengal Legislative Council.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT—OFFICERS, &c.

MR. FIRTH (Dundee) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the "officers of the Central Criminal Court," mentioned in section 23, sub-section (k.) of the Local Government Bill, include the Recorder, Common Serjeant, and Commissioner; and, what are the authorities of the Metropolitan Board of Works to incur costs mentioned in section 37, sub-section (3)?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's), in reply, said, that the term "officers of the Central Criminal Court," was not intended to include the Recorder, Common Serjeant, and Commissioner. The authority referred to was conferred on the Metropolitan Board of Works by the Metropolitan Management Act, the Acts amending the same, and numerous other Acts. The Metropolitan Board of Works had no power to rate the City under the Artizans' Dwellings Act; the authority for administering which in the City was the Commissioners of Sewers. The City was also not rateable for the administration of the Cattle Plague Acts, for explosives, offensive trades, and slaughter houses.

POST OFFICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)
—CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE—
PROMOTIONS.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Postmaster General, Whether he is aware that the specific promise made by him on the 28th of February, 1887, in relation to Central Telegraph Office promotions, is now being departed from, in that it is proposed to promote certain transferred telegraphists to the first class over London men of longer service; and, whether this new departure has his approval?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): I have no recollection of the specific promise to which the hon. Member alludes. I find that on the 28th of February, 1887, I answered him to the following effect:—

“I am not quite sure that I understand the Question; but if the hon. Member will call at the General Post Office, I will take care that he shall receive the fullest information.”

On February 23 last, in answer to the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. M'Cartan), who asked me a similar Question, I stated—

“That since January 1, 1882, 84 telegraphists have been transferred from the country to London; that out of this number eight have been promoted in advance of London telegraphists of equal or longer service; and that all these promotions have taken place since March 1 of last year. The 84 telegraphists, most of whom have been brought to London at a time of extreme pressure, and who were all transferred in the direct interest of the Service, were incorporated into the London Establishment according to their qualifications and pay; and in the case of the eight to whose promotion the hon. Member refers, it happened, owing to the fact of their having joined the Department as skilled telegraphists, that both their qualifications and pay were higher than those of their Metropolitan colleagues of equal service, who had joined as learners direct from the School of Telegraphy.”

This seems to show the practice of the Department in the matter, which has not since been varied, and I have no present intention of varying it.

THE TRUCK ACT—BRISTOL.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Inspector of Factories for the Bristol District has made any further Report on the alleged breaches of the Truck Act within such district, and if he will state the nature of the Report; what further action is being taken in the case; and, whether he will state the date and substance of any Circular issued to Inspectors of Factories since the passing of and relating to the Truck Law Amendment Act of last Session?

Mr. Bradlaugh

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; a further Report has been made. The matter has been placed in the hands of the Solicitor to the Treasury, with a view to the immediate prosecution of the offenders. An abstract of the Truck Act was circulated among the Inspectors of Factories for their instruction in January last.

DISPENSARIES (IRELAND) — LOCAL DISPENSARIES COMMITTEE, CLONES UNION—JOSEPH GRAYDON.

MR. H. CAMPBELL (Fermanagh, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a bailiff named Joseph Graydon, residing at Rosslea, County Fermanagh, is a member of the Local Dispensary Committee in Clones Union; is his house used as a dispensary; is he in receipt of rent from the Union for the use of the house; is it the fact that he is paid by the Union for permitting his servant to act as attendant to the medical officer; does he also receive a salary for acting as Deputy Registrar of Births, Deaths, and Marriages; was the rent of the dispensary increased some time since; and, if so, on what grounds; is it true that this man's son is a shopkeeper in Rosslea, and that it is to him the people requiring tickets entitling them to medical relief have to apply; and, whether, if the facts are as stated, he will take steps to remedy the matters complained of?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The answer to the first three paragraphs of the Question is in the affirmative. It is the case that the rent paid by the Union included remuneration for the servant's attendance. Mr. Graydon did not receive any salary from the Union, or any other public fund, for acting as Deputy Registrar of Births, Deaths, and Marriages. The rent of the dispensary has not been increased since 1878, when it was raised from £8 to £12. The Board of Guardians appeared to be unanimous in granting the increase, on the ground that the accommodation was equal, if not superior, to that at Rosslea. It is the case that Mr. Graydon's son is a shopkeeper at Rosslea. He has no legal authority to issue tickets for medical relief.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) asked, if the Chief Secretary, when he said that this man received no salary from a public fund for acting as a Deputy Registrar, was aware that the salary which was given to him was portion of that given to him by the Registrar who employed him?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, if the Registrar chose to remunerate someone to assist him he was not aware that that should be considered as coming out of the public funds.

MR. H. CAMPBELL asked, on what grounds had the rent of the dispensary been raised?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, on the ground that the accommodation, in the opinion of the Guardians, was superior to that which was being paid for already by them.

MR. H. CAMPBELL asked, whether this man, while in receipt of rent from the Union, was eligible to be a member of the Dispensary Committee?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he did not imagine that his receiving rent disqualified him.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) said, he understood the Chief Secretary had stated that it was not legal that the son of this man to issue medical relief tickets. Did the right hon. Gentleman, then, approve of the fact that the people who required medical relief were obliged to go to his shop?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he had told the House that he was not aware there was any ground for believing that the son did issue tickets.

MR. H. CAMPBELL asked, was it not the fact that Graydon's son actually did issue these tickets; and would the right hon. Gentleman ascertain whether he did so or not?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he was not aware that he did; but if the hon. Member would give him any evidence of the fact he would make further inquiry.

WAR OFFICE—"FORTRESS AND RAILWAY ENGINEER CORPS" FOR EDINBURGH AND LEITH.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) asked the Secretary of State for War, What has been the cause of the great delay, extending over two years, in giving the sanction of the War Office to the proposed "Fortress and Railway Engineer Corps" for Edinburgh and Leith; and, whether he will take steps to have a definite decision given at the earliest possible moment?

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL (A LORD of the TREASURY) (Wigton) (who replied) said: Provision has been made in the Estimates of this year for the formation of four companies of the Fortress and Railway Engineer Corps for Edinburgh and Leith. The existing Volunteer battalions and regiments at Edinburgh and Leith have strongly protested against the formation of this corps, on the ground that it would be likely to interfere with recruiting. The matter has been referred to the General Officer commanding in North Britain for further Report.

TURKEY (ASIATIC PROVINCES)—
ARMENIA — PERSECUTIONS OF THE CHRISTIANS.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to a statement circulated by the Armenian Patriotic Association setting forth the horrible sufferings and persecutions of the Christians of Armenia, owing to which many of the Southern and Eastern Districts of the Province of Van are nearly depopulated of the Christian element; whether it is true, as alleged, that the British Consuls in Armenia are well aware of the facts set forth in the said statement, amongst others, that in certain districts—

"The prisons are filled by numberless Armenians (many of whom are clergymen), all of them arrested for groundless reasons."

That—

"Some of them have been kept more than 40 hours without food and water, their hands, feet, and necks in chains extended cruciform on the wall, in a dark, cold, damp underground cell;"

whether, under the 61st Article of the Treaty of Berlin, Turkey did not engage to ameliorate the condition of its Christian subjects, and to introduce indispensable reforms; and, whether the Government has addressed any remonstrances to the Turkish Government on the subject, and with what result?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): A copy of the statement in question has been communicated to the Foreign Office. The particular facts mentioned in the Question have not been reported by any British Consular officer. A previous Memorial of the Armenian Patriotic Association was forwarded to Sir William White, who has replied that the statements contained in it go over so much ground, and that the means of testing their accuracy at his disposal are so limited, that he must ask for time before he can report upon them. The engagements of the Porte contained in the 61st Article of the Treaty of Berlin are contracted with all the Signatory Powers in common. No useful object would be attained by official representations to the Porte unless they are made upon well-substantiated facts, and in common with the other Powers.

ISLANDS OF THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC —SAMOA.

MR. W. A. M'ARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether, so long ago as 1886 or early in 1887, the British Government agreed with the German Government to give them practically a free hand in their dealings with Samoa; whether the United States Government, as one of the parties to the agreement between Great Britain, Germany, the United States, and Samoa, was consulted prior to the decision of the English Government being communicated to Germany; whether any attempt was made to ascertain the opinions of the Colonies of Australia and New Zealand before taking a step so important to their interests; whether, when the Conference on Samoa met at Washington, the United States Government were informed of the agreement of Great Britain with Germany; if not, when was that information given to the United States Government; what were the instructions given to our Commissioner at the Washington Conference; whether any remonstrance has been addressed to the German Government as to their treatment of our faithful ally Mahitoa, and whether any guarantee has been asked for, or given, that he shall be well treated by the Germans at the Cameroons; and, whether the Government know if it is proposed to detain him permanently in that unhealthy district?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): I answer the first two Questions in the negative. But the policy of Her Majesty's Government was stated at the Colonial Conference early in 1886. It will be found on page 167, vol. ii., of its proceedings—namely, Sir John Thurston, Her Majesty's High Commissioner for the Pacific, advised Her Majesty's Government that—

Sir James Fergusson

“The only satisfactory mode of preventing the peace of the Islands from being disturbed by rival Native claimants to the Throne, and of securing the interests of the three civilized nations on an equal footing, would be found in an agreement between Great Britain, Germany, and the United States, that one of them should, as the mandatory of the other two, exercise for a limited term, to be renewed if it should be so determined at its expiration, supervision and control over Native affairs in the Islands;”

and although, as was stated at the Colonial Conference—

“Her Majesty's Government had arrived at the same opinion, and were prepared to advocate at Washington an agreement of this nature,” no “decision” could be taken by Her Majesty's Government before the conclusion of the Conference for the consideration of Western Pacific affairs.

(3.) The Colonial Representatives were so informed on the 23rd of April, 1887.

(4.) On the meeting of the Conference at Washington, the proposal was laid before it. (5.) Until that Conference has been concluded its proceedings, and the instructions given to our Representative, cannot be made known. (6 and 7.) Her Majesty's Government have no doubt that Mahitoa is treated in a proper manner.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES)—SECONDARY SCHOOLS —REGISTRATION OF TEACHERS.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the Government will consider the question of registration of teachers of secondary schools at an early date, in order to insure their greater professional efficiency; and, whether the Government will offer to inspect those private secondary schools, the proprietors or masters of which may desire to submit them to inspection?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): The questions raised by my hon. Friend form part of the whole subject to which the Government are pledged to give their attention, and are, therefore, being considered in connection therewith.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT.

MR. HARRIS (Galway, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it be true that, in consequence of not having been paid their wages, the labourers who were in the employment of Mr. J. S. Eyre, of Kiltormer, County Galway, refused to continue working for that gentleman, and that they informed the Constabulary, who strove to influence them, that they were quite willing to return to work if Mr. Eyre paid them their wages out of the £95 he had got from the Board of Works for such purposes; and, whether Constable Boardman spent three days last week ploughing and harrowing Mr. Eyre's land, and was also engaged on the 7th instant putting out manure for that gentleman; and, if so, is it allowable that constables may supplement their incomes by wages earned as day labourers, or has instructions been issued which would compel members of the Police Force to work for landlords who may be unable or unwilling to pay their labourers?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): All, or almost all, of the statements of fact in this Question are declared to be incorrect. It is not true that these workmen left their employer for not having been paid their wages, having been paid in advance. The reason they left him appears to have been that they desired to Boycott him. They did not complain to the police; and the police did not try to induce them to remain with, or return to, their employer. It was not a fact that Constable Boardman had done any agricultural work for Mr. Eyre.

MR. HARRIS: I fear very much that the right hon. Gentleman is very much misinformed.

PRISONS (ENGLAND AND WALES)— CHELMSFORD GOAL.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether any Report has been received from Her Majesty's Inspector of Prisons on the alleged defective ventilation of prison cells at Chelmsford?

THE SECRETARY of STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): No Report has been received from Her Majesty's Inspector of Prisons on this matter; but in consequence of representations made by the Visiting Committee last year, such steps were taken as seemed necessary to make the means of ventilation act properly. The medical officer of the prison has since reported, and has not suggested the necessity for any further provision being made, as the sanitary condition of the prison is, as far as he can judge, satisfactory. The subject, however, will continue to be kept in view.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL RESOLUTIONS—HAWKERS' LICENCES.

MR. JACOBY (Derbyshire, Mid) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If a retail draper who travels with a horse and trap, but sells from samples only, will be considered by the Excise Authorities to be a hawker?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): In strictness he would be liable; but it has not been our practice to require a hawker's licence to be taken out in cases where a draper called for orders with samples only on his regular local customers.

INLAND REVENUE—EXCISE—LICENCES TO BREWERS' HOUSES.

MR. CALEB WRIGHT (Lancashire, S.W., Leigh) asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return of victuallers, beerhouses, and other licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors that have been refused during the five years ending 1886, on the ground that they were not required; and, whether he can give the number of public-houses and other licensed premises for the sale of intoxicating drink that belong to brewers and spirit merchants?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have no information as to the number of cases in which licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors have been refused on the ground that they were not required; neither can I give the number of public-houses and other licensed premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors that belong to brewers and spirit merchants.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) asked, whether it would not be possible to get some such Return before the Local Government Bill came on for discussion in Committee?

MR. RITCHIE said, the matter was one with which the Home Office was concerned; but he would make inquiry.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—THE SUNDAY CLOSING ACT—MR. A. E. FLEURY AT LISBURN.

MR. P. M'DONALD (Sligo, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether A. E. Fleury, reported in The Lisburn Standard, of the 14th of April last, as having been appointed incumbent's churchwarden, at a meeting of the annual Easter Vestry of the parish of Christ Church, Lisburn, held on the 4th of April last, the Rev. Arthur J. Moore, M.A., in the chair, is the Constabulary District Inspector of Lisburn; and, whether Mr. Fleury was present at said meeting, when a Resolution in favour of the continuance of the Irish Sunday Closing Act and its extension to the five cities now exempted was passed unanimously; and, if so, whether it is in conformity with the regulations of the Service for a member of the Constabulary Force to accept or hold any such appointment, or to support or assist in the passing of a Resolution at any meeting condemnatory of any Act of Parliament which it is his duty to enforce?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I have not yet been able to get the necessary Report to enable me to answer the Question. Perhaps the hon. Member will put it on a subsequent occasion.

POST OFFICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—RECEIVING HOUSE FOR PICCADILLY.

MR. W. BECKETT (Notts, Bassetlaw) asked the Postmaster General, What is the reason of his not having yet re-established a Post and Telegraph Office in place of the one abolished a year ago by the demolition of houses in Down Street, Piccadilly; and, if he is aware of the great inconvenience caused by there being no Post or Telegraph Office in Piccadilly from Burlington House to Knightsbridge?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): All efforts to find a person to undertake the duties of receiver in or about Down Street, Piccadilly, or to obtain premises for a branch post office at an expense which the amount of the business would warrant, have hitherto proved unsuccessful. I can assure the hon. Member that I shall be ready to entertain any proposal for providing an additional post office between Burlington House and Knightsbridge at a reasonable cost.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—COMPENSATION FOR IMPROVEMENTS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the recent decision pronounced under the Land Law Acts by the Sub-Commissioners sitting respectively in the Counties of Dublin and Cork—namely, that where a lease contains a clause precluding a tenant from claiming compensation for improvements at its determination, all improvements made by the tenant are to be treated as the property of the landlord, and that on the tenants applying to have a fair rent fixed under the lease-breaking clause of the Act of last year, the landlord is entitled to claim rent on such improvements, though he has not in any way contributed to the cost of them; whether he is aware that nearly every lease made in Ireland since the Land Act of 1870 contains such a clause, where the valuation of the holding exceeded £50, and that the result of the decision in question, if upheld, will be to confiscate tenants' improvements to an enormous extent, and in the case of the most improving class of tenant; and, whether the Government will take the opportunity provided by the Bill now before the House to redress this injustice?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University): I have ascertained that a decision to the effect mentioned in the first paragraph of the Question was pronounced by one of the Sub-Commissioners referred to, and I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of the entire paragraph. I have no information as to the matters of fact stated in the second paragraph; but I cannot admit that the operation of the decision referred to, whatever be its extent, can fairly be described as confiscation. It is not the intention of the Government to introduce any legislation for the purpose of nullifying clauses in leases defining the respective rights of landlord and tenant with regard to property in improvements effected by the tenants.

Mr. Ritchie

RIOTS, &c. (IRELAND)—THE MITCHELS-TOWN INQUEST.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) (for Mr. LABOUCHÈRE) (Northampton) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether in view of the fact that two old men and a youth were killed by shots fired by the Irish Constabulary from their barracks at Mitchelstown; that a Coroner's Inquest found a verdict of murder against certain of the constables who fired from the barracks; that this verdict and the proceedings at the Coroner's Inquest were quashed upon technical grounds in regard to the proceedings; it is intended to direct that a second inquest be held upon the bodies of the three persons who were killed; or to prosecute the constables who killed them; or to hold any sort of public inquiry, at which the evidence of the constables and of those present at these deaths may be forthcoming, in order that a prima facie decision may be arrived at in respect to the legality of the action of the constables concerned in this matter; and, whether, in the event of such inquiry taking place, it will be entrusted to persons who have not expressed an opinion upon the matter under investigation, and who were neither directly nor indirectly responsible for what occurred?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Having regard to the fact that the Coroner's Jury, while inculpatating some members of the Constabulary for firing in the Mitchelstown affray, wholly exonerated the District Inspector, who ordered the firing, and to the fact that the inquisition as regards those members of the Constabulary who were inculpated was quashed by the unanimous decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, not alone for technical errors, but for matters of substance—namely, the misconduct of the Coroner—and to all the circumstances of the case, it is not intended to hold another inquest, or to prosecute the constables, or direct any other inquiries than the Departmental one already held.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman what was the misconduct of the Coroner?

[No reply.]

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE ALLEGED INSURANCE FRAUDS AT BELFAST.

MR. TUIE (Westmeath, N.) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, with reference to the insurance frauds at Belfast, Whether he can now state if the Government intend to make any inquiry or to take any proceedings in connection with the forgery of the name of Mr. Finlay M'Cance, J.P., Belfast, as proven by that gentleman during the recent trials at Belfast, and by means of which a policy of assurance was obtained on his life in favour of Mr. James Henderson, proprietor of The Belfast News Letter, notwithstanding that Mr. Henderson had no insurable interest in the life of Mr. M'Cance; and, whether, considering the shocking practices which have been recently carried on in Belfast with respect to assurances by certain persons on the lives of others who were supposed to be in delicate health, and in whose lives the assurers had no insurable interest, the Government will make a searching inquiry into these cases, and take steps to have the offenders brought to justice?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University): I must again deprecate being called upon to answer Questions relating to individuals whose names have been mentioned in the course of the proceedings to which the Question relates. In answer to a former Question I have already stated that the Attorney General for Ireland has assumed the conduct of the prosecution on behalf of the Crown; that a searching investigation is being made into the entire matter; and that no effort will be spared to bring all guilty persons to justice.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) ELECTORS BILL—RATING OF OCCUPIERS.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.) (for Mr. LAWSON) (St. Pancras, W.) asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether it will be necessary for each occupier to be separately rated in order to secure the municipal franchise under the Local Government Electors Bill?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): In my opinion, as the Bill at present stands, it will not be necessary for each occupier to be separately rated, provided that he is, in fact, the occupier of buildings which are separately rated to the poor.

THE SWEATING SYSTEM—THE LORDS' COMMITTEE.

MR. KENRICK (Birmingham, N.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the fact that the "sweating system," now being inquired into by a Committee of the House of Lords, is not confined to London, the Government will consent to the reference to the Committee being extended so as to include the chief Provincial towns in the scope of the inquiry?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The Committee referred to being one of the House of Lords, any steps to be taken for an extension of the powers of the Committee must be taken not here, but in "another place."

METROPOLITAN POLICE — ALLEGED BLACKMAILING.

MR. DARLING (Deptford) (for Mr. HOWARD VINCENT) (Sheffield, Central) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, having regard to the serious nature of the public charge made on the 19th ultimo by the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Firth)—

"That the London police levy blackmail on the great distributors of goods in London,"

Whether the promise to furnish Her Majesty's Government with the grounds of the allegation has been fulfilled; and, in such case, if all possible inquiry has been made into the facts, and with what result?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): On the 19th ultimo, when the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Firth) made in this House his charge against the police of levying blackmail on the great distributors of goods in London, he was at once challenged by my right hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie), by me, and by other Members for the authority on which this grave charge was made. The hon. Member then said that, of course, the charge was not against the police as a body, and went on to say that he would give me the names of his informants. I at once said that if the names were given it must be under such conditions as would enable the Government to test the accuracy of the statement; and the hon. Member, as I understand, and as I think the House understood, accepted my conditions. Some few days having elapsed, I wrote to the hon. Member to remind him of his promise, and on the 25th ultimo he gave me the names of his informants, but said they objected to have their names brought into public notice, "unless the whole police system is subjected to a public inquiry." I replied that it was not for his informants to make such conditions, and asked him to carry out the pledge given in the House. The hon. Member, in answer, said he understood that I objected to a public inquiry, and expressed approval of the conditions imposed by his informants. My reply stated that I had never objected to a public judicial inquiry into any specific charges against the police; that the accusation was a criminal one; and if he would bring it forward, or if his informants would do so, the Public Prosecutor would at once be directed to take such measures as were necessary to bring the incriminated to justice. The hon. Member, in reply, stated that his charge was merely meant as an illustration to his speech; that he always understood a Member of Parliament took the responsibility of his own statements; and that his informants adhered to their decision. The House has now all the facts before it; and I must leave it to hon. Members to judge how far the hon. Member has redeemed his pledge, and how far "illustrations" which contained criminal charges against a large body of public servants, and which are made on grounds apparently not sufficient to stand judicial investigation, are justified.

MR. FIRTH (Dundee) was bound to say, with regret, that he took the statement of the right hon. Gentleman as amounting to a suggestion that he had not completely fulfilled the undertaking into which he had entered. He trusted he should always be prepared, when he gave an undertaking upon certain allegations, to withdraw both undertaking and allegations unequivocally if he could not, or did not, fulfil them. Throughout he had taken the advice of men whose judgment upon questions of Order in that House they all respected, amongst them being the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), and they were all of opinion that he had completely fulfilled the letter and spirit of his undertaking. He wished to draw the attention of the House to what had passed between the First Lord and himself. Challenged by the First Lord of the Treasury to produce his authority, he wrote to his informants and then to the right hon. Gentleman, telling him that they were prepared to prove the truth of the allegations, but that they objected to their names being brought into public notice unless the whole police system were subjected to a public inquiry. The First Lord of the Treasury wrote back, saying that his informants had no right to impose the condition which they had laid down, and that he (Mr. Firth) had failed to fulfil his undertaking. He then submitted the case to several Members of the House, who all said that, in their judgment, he had fulfilled, both in the letter and in the spirit, the undertaking which he had given. He wrote again to the right hon. Gentleman, pointing out that as the matter was one of public importance it ought to be inquired into publicly; and that the unsatisfactory nature of the recent police inquiry was hardly such as should encourage a repetition of proceedings of the kind. The right hon. Gentleman subsequently wrote, saying that he had never objected to a public judicial inquiry into specific charges; and that if he was prepared to bring forward any specific charge the Public Prosecutor would at once take steps. That letter he brought to the notice of his informants, and they replied that they were not prepared to modify the conditions on which they would give evidence; that they did not think that a prosecution would succeed; and that their names must not be made public unless a public inquiry were allowed into the whole system. That letter he sent on to the First Lord of the Treasury—

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER (interposing) said, the hon. Member was, of course, entitled, as a personal explanation, to give his version of the occurrences referred to by the First Lord of the Treasury; but he must not introduce extraneous matters.

MR. FIRTH, in conclusion, said, that he pointed out to the right hon. Gentleman that a Member of Parliament might be satisfied as to the truth of statements laid before him without being able to control the decisions of his informants; but that if at a future time the public inquiry which had been asked for were granted, he had no doubt that the evidence of his informants would be forthcoming.

MR. W. H. SMITH: By what I said just now I did not wish to cast any reflection upon the hon. Member. My original request to him was to furnish me with evidence on which judicial action could be taken, and judicial inquiry made into the criminal charges brought against the police; and I understood the hon. Member, from his place in the House, to promise that I should have that information.

MR. FIRTH said, there was nothing in the right hon. Gentleman's statement as to the judicial inquiry. What he (Mr. Firth) said was that he would give the names under such conditions as to test the accuracy of what he had said.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON AND MR. PARNELL—PRIVATE CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Will the Government lay upon the Table of the House the written communication, stated by the Earl of Carnarvon in the House of Lords to have been sent by him to the Prime Minister in 1886, on the subject of the interview between the Earl of Carnarvon and the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), relating to the future Government of Ireland, together with a copy of the reply of the Marquess of Salisbury, and any further Correspondence on the subject?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The hon. and learned Member will see that the Correspondence to which he refers, if it exists, was obviously of a private and confidential character as between Colleagues in the Government, and it would be entirely contrary to all precedent to produce it.

WAR OFFICE—MANUFACTURE OF GUNS.

MR. HOYLE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood) asked, Whether the Secretary of State for War had seen the letter from Lord Brassey, published in The Times of Saturday, in which the writer said that the resources of the Whitworth Company's works were being largely applied to the manufacture of guns of the heaviest calibres for the French Government; and whether there was any foundation for the statement?

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL (A LORD of the TREASURY) (Wigton) (who replied) said: My right hon. Friend has communicated with the Whitworth Company, and has received a reply, stating that they are not making any guns for the French Government, and have not any intention of doing so.

NEW MEMBER TAKING HIS SEAT—MR. BRADLAUGH'S MOTION ON FRIDAY.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a Question of which I have given him private Notice. I wish to ask, Whether he is aware that on Thursday last the Attorney General intimated to me that if the words "unless the House otherwise resolve" were inserted in my Amendment on going into Committee of Supply, the Government would accept the Amendment; whether such words were inserted; and, whether, in spite of the insertion, 17 Members of the Government voted against the Amendment, and only four in favour of it?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): It is a fact that the Attorney General, with my sanction, did give the hon. Member to understand that, as far as I was concerned, and as far as my Colleagues were concerned, the course which the hon. Member has described would be taken. I am not aware that so many of my Colleagues as 17 voted against the Resolution. As I stated in the House on Friday I was obliged to be absent from the debate, having to attend elsewhere to matters of urgent public importance. It was only after the Division that I was made acquainted with the circumstances that had occurred.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a Question with reference to the course of Public Business. I understood from his answer on Friday that after 10 o'clock to-night the Resolution with reference to Imperial Defences would not be brought forward, and that if that Order were not reached before 10 o'clock there would be a Morning Sitting to-morrow. Now, in that case the very important Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) will be postponed to a 9 o'clock Sitting, which will be the second time within a very few days that an important public Motion will have been so postponed. I wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will not consent at 10 o'clock to-night to proceed with the Imperial Defence Bill, whatever may have been the progress made with the two Irish Bills that precede it upon the Order Paper, and so to obviate a Morning Sitting to-morrow?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am anxious to consult the convenience of the right hon. Gentleman opposite; but we cannot consent to interrupt the proceedings upon the Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland Bill or the Land Law (Ireland) (Land Commission) Bill at 10 o'clock to-night. We shall be bound to endeavour to pass those two Bills through Committee; and if we do not succeed in getting them reported before 10 o'clock we shall have to take the Imperial Defence Bill at a Morning Sitting to-morrow. It is very important that we should adhere to that arrangement.

MOTIONS.

—o—

PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE.

RESOLUTION.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) said, he wished to bring before the House a question which affected the Records of the House. The Deputy Speaker had read out a letter apprising the House that one of its Members—

Mr. W. H. Smith

the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon)—had been sentenced to imprisonment on the following charge—"For having taken part in the Plan of Campaign." He (Mr. T. M. Healy) wished to ask, whether it were possible in case of inaccuracy, or, as he would charge, a deliberate misstatement, or to the legal effect of the conviction, on the hon. Member for East Mayo, it would be in Order to move a Motion on the subject? The practice was to move that such letter be inserted on the Journals of the House; but he proposed to move that as it contained a falsehood such record should be deferred, and that the Clerk of the House should communicate with the Resident Magistrate, and the exact terms of the sentence on Mr. Dillon be communicated to the House. He referred to the informations on which the hon. Member for East Mayo was charged. He was not charged on any summons, but was arrested on April 18 by a District Inspector, and brought before Mr. Kilkelly, R.M., charged with taking part in an illegal assembly and criminal conspiracy to induce certain persons not to pay their rents, and upon that charge only could he have been convicted. The Magistrate invented a charge, which was not a legal charge, with the deliberate object of prejudicing his hon. Friend, and chiefly, it might be, in regard to a recent Papal document. The statement which this Resident Magistrate wrote was as follows:—

"County Louth, Drogheda,
"12th May, 1888.

"Sir,—I have the honour to report that yesterday, the 11th instant, at Mells, in the county of Louth, before a court of petty sessions, under 'The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887,' of which I was chairman, found Mr. John Dillon, M.P., guilty of having, on 8th ult. in this county, taken part in the Plan of Campaign."

Now, there was no such offence known to the law. The law under the Criminal Law and Procedure Act took cognizance of and enabled magistrates to convict the Members of that House and non-Members of taking part in an illegal conspiracy. There was no other offence known to the law, and he therefore submitted that as formerly the practice of the House always was, when those letters were read by the Chairman, for some Member of the Government to move that they be laid on the Table of the House. Where a gross and deliberate misstatement was made by a responsible Executive officer as to the charge upon which an hon. Member was convicted, it ought not to appear that the House gave its sanction to its insertion on the Minutes. He wished to know whether he should be in Order in moving—

"That as it was alleged this letter from the Resident Magistrate conveyed a false impression as to the ground on which the hon. Member for East Mayo was convicted, that the Clerk do communicate with the Resident Magistrate as to the exact terms of the conviction, and that in the meantime the letter be not inserted on the Minutes."

If he was in Order, he begged to make that Motion.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) said, he wished to call the attention of Mr. Deputy Speaker to the fact that the hon. Member for the Loughborough Division of Leicestershire (Mr. De Lisle) drew the attention of Mr. Speaker to the fact that the Crimes Act last year was described in a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) as a Coercion Act, and the hon. Gentleman asked the ruling of Mr. Speaker as to whether it was right to apply to the Statute the popular instead of the legal title, and Mr. Speaker ruled that that title was out of Order.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order! As far as I am aware, it is not the practice to make a Motion to lay such a communication on the Table of the House. Many communications are made to the Speaker, such as, for instance, those of Election Judges. They are read from the Chair as a matter of Order, and inserted as read from the Chair. They can be inserted in no other fashion. If the hon. Member desires to make on a subsequent day any Motion in respect of this, he will be in Order to do so; but having been read in discharge of a Ministerial duty from the Chair they appear on the Journals as a matter of course.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then I would ask you, Sir, whether in the meantime, a deliberate statement having been made by me as a Member of this House that this letter must be false on the face of it, whether the Clerk will insert it in the Minutes pending the moving of such a Resolution?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The letter will appear with the authority of the being startled at such a declaration from the hands of a gentleman who has been entrusted with the power of life and death, for a sentence of six months' imprisonment for a man in the position of my hon. Friend the Member for Mayo may very well involve death. As soon as I heard the letter read I proceeded to the Table and obtained a copy of the letter, and I found that it bore out, in every respect, the reading of the O'hair. That being so, I considered that it was necessary for some hon. Member to take action in the matter in view of requiring in future that the legal form of Procedure under the Crimes Act should be carried out with common decency. I beg to move—

"That it is a Breach of the Privilege of this House to communicate to Mr. Speaker a letter containing an inaccurate and untruthful statement concerning the arrest and conviction of a Member of this House."

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Longford that the Motion he has submitted is purely an abstract Resolution, and in order to raise the question of a Breach of Privilege, there ought to be attached to the Resolution some reference to a specific Breach of Privilege.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: May I ask if it has not been the practice in most cases of Breach of Privilege to have, in the first case, a general allegation of Breach of Privilege, and then to allow it to be followed up by a specific Motion afterwards.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will move the Resolution in the following form:—

"That the letter of Mr. Thomas Hamilton, Resident Magistrate, dated the 12th May, addressed to Mr. Speaker, is a Breach of the Privilege of this House, as containing an untruthful statement in regard to the arrest and conviction of a Member of this House."

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Will the hon. and learned Member bring up the corrected Resolution?

MR. T. M. HEALY: Certainly.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the letter of Mr. Thomas Hamilton, Resident Magistrate, dated the 12th May, addressed to Mr. Speaker, is a Breach of the Privilege of this House, as containing an untruthful statement regarding the arrest and conviction of a Member of this House."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Perhaps it would be for the convenience of the House if the letter of Mr. Hamilton were read again by the Olerk at the Table, as many hon. Members have not heard it read.

Letter again read. (See page 139.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University): The hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) has taken occasion from the reading of this letter to make accusations against the magistrate who presided at the trial of the case against the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) of the most serious, and, I may say, of the most unfounded character—accusations which ought not to have been made, and insinuations of motives which I submit ought not to be made in this House upon such grounds as the hon. and learned Member has alleged. The hon. and learned Member has complained that the magistrate, to use his own expression, went on "hot foot" from the trial to write this letter. Now, surely it was the bounden duty of the magistrate, when he had convicted, to lose no time in apprising Mr. Speaker of the fact, and if all the grounds which the hon. and learned Member had for the suggestions he has made are as unfounded as that, I submit to the judgment of the House whether they ought to be made against a magistrate who writes a letter in the simple discharge of his duty. Now, Sir, what is the nature and character of a letter of this kind? It is a notification given to Mr. Speaker of a certain alleged state of facts. If it be the case of the hon. and learned Member that in this instance the hon. Member for East Mayo was convicted of what was not an offence, and for which the Court had no power to convict and sentence him, I need hardly say that the legality of the sentence would depend not on the notice given to the House, but on the record and certificate of conviction. If the certificate of conviction is for a something which is not an offence, and if the hon. Member for East Mayo has been convicted for taking part in a criminal conspiracy, that would appear on the certificate of conviction and will speak for itself. If he has not been so convicted, the hon.

hot-footed the moment the conviction has taken place. I beg, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to call your attention to the letter which you read to the House in your Ministerial capacity. (See page 139). The sentence of the Court was that the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) should be imprisoned for six months without hard labour. Now, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I say that that statement in itself is a falsehood. Either the hon. Member for East Mayo was convicted or he was not. If he was convicted, he must have been convicted of an offence within the terms of the section; but this section takes no cognizance of the Plan of Campaign. I myself could not, without having legal evidence before me, and this House could not, determine without legal evidence what the Plan of Campaign is. The Plan of Campaign may be a thing good, bad, or indifferent; but no magistrate is empowered to go outside the Statute. Yet this magistrate, for the purpose of creating a prejudice, debauching public opinion, and misleading this House, has committed a deliberate and wilful falsehood. I submit to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that the records of this House ought not to be tainted by having placed upon them a corrupt and wilful falsehood of this kind, although it be invented by a man of whose legal knowledge the Lord Lieutenant is satisfied. I maintain that it was invented for a deliberate purpose, and that the only purpose for which this communication was made was to incite prejudice in this House, and to convey a false impression as to what the hon. Member for East Mayo had been convicted of. This House considers it wise and prudent that it should be made acquainted with any offence of which one of its Members has been convicted, and yet here we have a case in which a solemn judicial sentence has been passed upon a Member of this House of six months' imprisonment with hard labour. [Cries of "No, no!"] Well, six months without hard labour; but the difference is so slight that I do not think my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo will appreciate it. Immediately after the conviction has been made, this magistrate, of whose knowledge of the law the Lord Lieutenant has satisfied himself, sends off a notification to Mr. Speaker that my hon. Friend has been convicted of taking part in the Plan of Campaign. I would ask the House to observe the effect of that statement. If this House had on its records under a process of certiorari a certificate of the conviction of one of its Members, and my hon. Friend, instead of appealing, had applied for a writ of habeas corpus, if the certiorari was found to be bad, there would be no power residing in any of Her Majesty's Courts to detain my hon. Friend; and if it could be shown that my hon. Friend had been convicted by the Resident Magistrate of an offence not sanctioned by the Statute, but an offence which did not exist, and that appeared in the certificate of conviction, my hon. Friend would be entitled to walk out a free man. No magistrate has a right to obtain cognizance on certiorari of a crime that does not exist, and yet the legal knowledge of this Resident Magistrate is such that he has penned a letter which is not only false, but which shows that he does not understand the Statute. I submit that the sending of this document to the House by Mr. Thomas Hamilton is a Breach of Privilege, that we should compel Mr. Hamilton to appear at the Bar and apologize for this libel on a Member of the House, and also for this insult and flagrant deception which he has endeavoured to practice on the House itself. This man has acted deliberately. I do not know whether he penned the letter in conjunction with any of the Law Officers of the Crown, I do not know whether the letter is one which has been drawn up as part of a common form suggested by the Law Officers of the Crown, but, at any rate, I think that the distinct withdrawal of the letter by Mr. Hamilton is absolutely necessary. Further, I am of opinion that the letter should not only be withdrawn, but apologized for, and that the author of the libel should appear at the Bar in person to make such apology. We may gather what the character of the persons is, of whose legal status the Lord Lieutenant is satisfied, when we find one of them writing a document which is not only false in law, but false in fact in every way in which you may view it. What chance would any unfortunate persons have who might be brought before such a Resident Magistrate who has such slight attachment to the forms of law. When, Sir, I heard you read the letter of Mr. Hamilton, I could not help being startled at such a declaration from the hands of a gentleman who has been entrusted with the power of life and death, for a sentence of six months' imprisonment for a man in the position of my hon. Friend the Member for Mayo may very well involve death. As soon as I heard the letter read I proceeded to the Table and obtained a copy of the letter, and I found that it bore out, in every respect, the reading of the Chair. That being so, I considered that it was necessary for some hon. Member to take action in the matter in view of requiring in future that the legal form of Procedure under the Crimes Act should be carried out with common decency. I beg to move—

“That it is a Breach of the Privilege of this House to communicate to Mr. Speaker a letter containing an inaccurate and untruthful statement concerning the arrest and conviction of a Member of this House.”

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Longford that the Motion he has submitted is purely an abstract Resolution, and in order to raise the question of a Breach of Privilege, there ought to be attached to the Resolution some reference to a specific Breach of Privilege.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: May I ask if it has not been the practice in most cases of Breach of Privilege to have, in the first case, a general allegation of Breach of Privilege, and then to allow it to be followed up by a specific Motion afterwards.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will move the Resolution in the following form:—

“That the letter of Mr. Thomas Hamilton, Resident Magistrate, dated the 12th May, addressed to Mr. Speaker, is a Breach of the Privilege of this House, as containing an untruthful statement in regard to the arrest and conviction of a Member of this House.”

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Will the hon. and learned Member bring up the corrected Resolution?

MR. T. M. HEALY: Certainly.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That the letter of Mr. Thomas Hamilton, Resident Magistrate, dated the 12th May, addressed to Mr. Speaker, is a Breach of the Privilege of this House, as containing an untruthful statement regarding the arrest and conviction of a Member of this House.”—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Perhaps it would be for the convenience of the House if the letter of Mr. Hamilton were read again by the Clerk at the Table, as many hon. Members have not heard it read.

Letter again read. (See page 139.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN) (Dublin University): The hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) has taken occasion from the reading of this letter to make accusations against the magistrate who presided at the trial of the case against the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) of the most serious, and, I may say, of the most unfounded character—accusations which ought not to have been made, and insinuations of motives which I submit ought not to be made in this House upon such grounds as the hon. and learned Member has alleged. The hon. and learned Member has complained that the magistrate, to use his own expression, went on “hot foot” from the trial to write this letter. Now, surely it was the bounden duty of the magistrate, when he had convicted, to lose no time in apprising Mr. Speaker of the fact, and if all the grounds which the hon. and learned Member had for the suggestions he has made are as unfounded as that, I submit to the judgment of the House whether they ought to be made against a magistrate who writes a letter in the simple discharge of his duty. Now, Sir, what is the nature and character of a letter of this kind? It is a notification given to Mr. Speaker of a certain alleged state of facts. If it be the case of the hon. and learned Member that in this instance the hon. Member for East Mayo was convicted of what was not an offence, and for which the Court had no power to convict and sentence him, I need hardly say that the legality of the sentence would depend not on the notice given to the House, but on the record and certificate of conviction. If the certificate of conviction is for a something which is not an offence, and if the hon. Member for East Mayo has been convicted for taking part in a criminal conspiracy, that would appear on the certificate of conviction and will speak for itself. If he has not been so convicted, the hon.

Member will have the benefit of it in any proceedings which he may institute. It has, however, been suggested, and I earnestly protest against the suggestion, that because it does not appear from the letter that the hon. Member has been convicted of criminal conspiracy, but of taking part in the Plan of Campaign, that, therefore, the writer was influenced by motives of the basest kind. Whether the letter to Mr. Speaker should be expressed with all the accuracy of the certificate of conviction or not, can any human being doubt what was the meaning and purport of the communication? Is it not the fact that the Court took judicial notice that the Plan of Campaign has been pronounced by the Lord Chief Baron in a recent case to be a criminal conspiracy? The Plan of Campaign is perfectly well understood, and every Court must take judicial notice that it has been pronounced a criminal conspiracy. Can anybody say that the Resident Magistrate, in describing the offence as the Plan of Campaign, when he knew that the Judges of the land had pronounced the Plan of Campaign to be a criminal conspiracy, has been guilty of wilful and deliberate falsehood, because he has not followed the exact language of the certificate of conviction? Whether the magistrate ought to have followed the terms of conviction or not, I will leave to be discussed by hon. Members more experienced in the Forms of this House. But if no offence has been committed, no letter to Mr. Speaker from the magistrate convicting can make it so, and the suggestion which has been made by the hon. and learned Member for North Longford is, I think, not one which will commend itself to the judgment of any fair-minded man on either side of the House.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Madden) has not, I think, touched the real point of this matter. As I understand the hon. and learned Member (Mr. T. M. Healy) who brought forward the Motion which the House is now considering, his contention is that by the law of Parliament any magistrate or judicial functionary who proceeds by sentence against any Member of this House is bound by the Rules of Parliament to communicate the cause of his action to the House. I need hardly point out that that can only mean the true cause of the conviction. The hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland tells us that it is a mere matter of extreme technicality to follow the precise words of the Act of Parliament. Now, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I humbly submit that it is a great deal more than that. It is perfectly true that certain Judges in Ireland have expressed opinions with reference to what is called the Plan of Campaign. But they have been for a great part obiter dicta, and not decisions of the Judges at all. Does the hon. and learned Member opposite mean to say that the House is to accept these obiter dicta pronounced by certain learned Judges in Ireland as applying beyond the particular case in which they were uttered, or to take anything which any removable magistrate chooses to call the Plan of Campaign as necessarily covering a legal offence? I dispute that altogether, and I must say that hon. Members on the other side of the House must not be surprised if we on this side take every legitimate opportunity which may present itself of bringing before the House and the public the action of these magistrates, and the mode in which the law is being administered. The right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite well knows that I never concealed my view of this Act—namely, that it is noxious in its inception, and injurious every day in its operation. So far from serving the purpose for which it was stated to have been introduced—namely, the putting down of real crime as we understand it, it is not being so directed. This is our justification for the Motion—namely, that the Act is being insidiously directed against matters with which it was never intended to deal.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (SIR JOHN GORST) (Chatham) said, he was not astonished that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Hackney (Sir Charles Russell) should take every possible opportunity of attacking the Act which was passed by Parliament last Session, and the way in which it was being administered by the Irish magistrates. What, however, the House had a right to expect was that the attacks of the hon. and learned Gentleman should be moderately reasonable. The question now before the House was that of a Breach of Privilege; and what was the allegation? It was that one of the magistrates of Ireland, in the fulfilment of his duty, had written to inform the Speaker of that House what he had done, and it was maintained that in doing so he was not to use popular language which would be intelligible to Mr. Speaker, and intelligible to every Member of the House, but that he was to use some technical terms which were to satisfy the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), and, as had been said, to stand the test of a special demurrer. That was the only question the House had to settle. There was no pretence for saying that the certificate of conviction when it came to be examined would not accurately describe the offence.

MR. T. M. HEALY: How do we know that?

SIR JOHN GORST: The magistrate has written to Mr. Speaker to say that he has convicted the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) under this Act, that he has convicted him for an offence which he describes in popular language as taking part in the Plan of Campaign; and the only question before the House is whether that letter is to be declared by the House to be a Breach of Privilege? Having now said what the real question before the House is, I do not think the matter is further debateable.

MR. PARNELL: I would like to ask the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) if he could inform the House what is the object of communicating this information to the House at all? Does it not indicate that the House desires to know the offence of which the person tried has been convicted, and not some other offence of an imaginary character coined for the political exigencies of the moment, which the magistrate or Judge may assign as having been the offence, but which really has not been the offence at all? Now, Sir, I will assume that the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Madden) has made a mistake in supposing that this is not a communication to the House, but a communication to the Speaker only, for it is a communication to Mr. Speaker as a servant and agent of the House, and is for the information and judgment of the House as the highest Court of the Realm. Undoubtedly the House desires to know, if a Member of the House has been convicted, why he has been convicted; and I submit that a mistake and error of this kind, which would not have been committed by one of the humblest Petty Sessions clerks in Ireland, should not be passed over in silence when committed by a magistrate, who has the responsibility of meting out cumulative sentences of hard labour for political offences. [Cries of "No, no!"] Hon. Members say "No!" I contend that this magistrate has shown his entire ignorance of all law by writing to the House, and informing us that the hon. Member for East Mayo has been convicted for the offence of taking part in the Plan of Campaign. He is a magistrate who is entitled to inflict cumulative sentences of imprisonment with hard labour for any number of years that he may choose to inflict them. His power is an unlimited power, and, as was very fitly stated by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), it is absolutely a power of life and death, because we have it on the authority of one of the Irish Judges that a sentence of two years' imprisonment with hard labour is the severest sentence which can be inflicted by the Criminal Law in Ireland. Now, Sir, here is this Irish Magistrate who has sent to this House an incorrect and inaccurate statement; and who is he? He is a Mr. Hamilton, of whose knowledge of law the Lord Lieutenant—who knows, by the way, a great deal about law—is satisfied, because he has chosen him as one of those magistrates who had a sufficient knowledge of the law to administer the Act. This magistrate is not a barrister; he has never passed a legal examination in his life; and yet in a case of this extreme delicacy, involving the liberty, and perhaps the life, of one of the most important of his political opponents, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant is not ashamed to entrust such issues as this to such a man in order to show his utter flippancy and disregard, not only of the decency of the law in Ireland, but of the lives of his political opponents, by entrusting the consideration and decision of such questions as these to a man who has been obliged to admit that he has had no legal education, and never passed even an examination in law. These are the kind of men whom the Government put over us in Ireland to carry out the notions of the Front Bench as to the administration of law and justice. How can you expect that the Irish people, even if this House chooses to swallow such a letter as this, written as it is in such colloquial phrases—how can you expect the Irish people, after such evidence as this of the utter incapacity of these persons to fulfil judicial functions, to have any regard for your law or your administration?

Sir John Gorst

MR. LOCKWOOD (York): I should not have joined in this debate had it not been for the way in which the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) has chosen to deal with the remarks of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for South Hackney (Sir Charles Russell) and the late Attorney General. The hon. Gentleman, whose more recent experience in connection with India may possibly have led him to forget some of the extensive experience he had at the English Bar, addressed this as a matter of no importance. Now, I venture to think that it is a matter of much importance both inside the House and out of it. It is a matter of importance inside of this House that we should see that the Privileges of the House are complied with by those who have duties to discharge, and if it is part of the duty of a judicial officer to return to this House an account of the conviction of a Member of this House, surely it is the duty of the House itself to see that the record of conviction is accurately returned. Now, Sir, on the face of this letter, we know that we have no such accurate record of the conviction of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), because we know perfectly well that it returns a conviction for that which is not known as any offence under our statutory law. Then surely the House is entitled to take notice of the matter, and I think the House would best consult its own dignity by communicating to the person who has made this statement to the House, and requiring him to give accurate information to the House of the conviction which has taken place before him. It is almost too much—although the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) has drawn a picture which made one's mouth water—to expect to see a Resident Magistrate standing at the Bar undergoing the process of apology. I am afraid that that is too much to look forward to, but I think we are entitled to have from the Resident Magistrate an accurate account of the conviction which has taken place. So much for the view which I think this House is entitled to take, so far as it is itself concerned. But what will be said outside the House when persons read the letter which contains the record of a conviction for an offence which is not an offence at all as known to our statutory law? They will say this—that the Resident Magistrate in writing, aye, with hot foot, such a letter, showed by the terms he used that he had got the Plan of Campaign on his brain. It was the Plan of Campaign he was thinking about, and it is not what I may say of this judicial officer, but it is what people will say outside the House. In order to protect responsible judicial officers from having reflections of a serious character made upon them outside the House, I think this Resident Magistrate should be required to make an accurate return of the conviction which took place before him.

MR. DARLING (Deptford): Sir, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for York (Mr. Lockwood) is concerned to know what will be the opinion of people outside the House with regard to this question. I am quite sure that the first thing they will say will be that those inside the House have their feelings remarkably well under control, and that they have been able to get into a terrible passion about a very little matter. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] I take the interruption of hon. Gentlemen opposite as a distinct compliment. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) has simply described as incorrect and inaccurate a statement which the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) has described as a corrupt and wilful falsehood, intended to convey a false idea. I think that is a tolerably warm description of what the hon. Member for Cork has described as incorrect and inaccurate. But what is there incorrect or inaccurate in the statement of the magistrate? I venture to say that to his statement neither the term inaccurate or incorrect is applicable. That an hon. Member of this House has been convicted of taking part in a criminal conspiracy there is no doubt. If any one doubts that statement, he must first of all pretend that he does not know what the Plan of Campaign is. It is not denied that the Plan of Campaign has been pronounced by the highest Courts in Ireland to be a criminal conspiracy. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Hackney (Sir Charles Russell) said that that was an obiter dictum. Happily for the right hon. and learned Gentleman, his remarks are obiter dicta, and he has made many remarks on this subject that are of that character. The question in the case which was to be decided was whether the Plan of Campaign was a criminal conspiracy or not, and it was decided that it was so. We must therefore shut our eyes very hard if we pretend not to see that the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) has been convicted of taking part in the Plan of Campaign. We must pretend very much that we do not learn that the hon. Gentleman has been convicted of taking part in a criminal conspiracy from the letter sent by the magistrate to Mr. Speaker. But I do not know that the magistrates are told anywhere to make their reports in the technical language of an indictment. The material part is to know that the hon. Member has been convicted. [Interruption.] If hon. Members have not yet appreciated the point, I will state it again. The material point is to know that the hon. Member for East Mayo has been convicted of an offence against the law, for which he has been sentenced to undergo treatment which will seclude him for a time from this House. No doubt, it is convenient that the House should know whether the offence committed is that of burglary, conspiracy, or larceny, or anything else; but there is no need of such accuracy in the communication of the magistrate to this House, and the hon. and learned Member for North Longford himself well knows that no certiorari lies to this House. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] I am glad that my remark has called forth that manifestation. The material point is that a Member of the House is absent, and how long he is likely to be absent. But so far as the language of the hon. and learned Member for North Longford is concerned—namely, that this is a corrupt and wilful falsehood, I say that even the language of the hon. Member for Cork, which is by comparison a temperate statement, does not represent the case correctly. We are told that the hon. Member has been found guilty of taking part in the Plan of Campaign, and we all know, and have known before, that the Plan of Campaign was the hon. Member's own invention. Everyone knows the law, or is presumed to know it, and if the hon. Member did not know it he has not done his duty by himself as a subject. We are told that the Plan of Campaign is a criminal conspiracy, that he has taken part in it, and therefore that he has taken part in a criminal conspiracy. But we are told something more—namely, what that criminal conspiracy is, and because the magistrate has told us this, we are asked to bring the magistrate to the Bar of the House to apologize for what has been called a libel on a Member of the House. But does not the House know that the hon. Member for East Mayo started the Plan of Campaign; do we not know that he gloried in devoting himself to taking part in it; and is the House to be told that a magistrate has written a libel upon him when he says that he has done what he has been constantly boasting of doing? That, I say, is asking the House to take up a ridiculous position. It is quite true that the magistrate has not written the letter in the words of a legal indictment; but I submit that he has told the House in decent, becoming, and perfectly comprehensible language all that the House need to know, and it is, therefore, an abuse of language to call the letter a libel, or corrupt, or even inaccurate.

Mr. Darling

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I thought that the comments which the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) made upon this letter were the most unfortunate comments that it was possible to make; but when the hon. and learned Member for Deptford (Mr. Darling) got up I found out my mistake. I do not think I ever heard a counsel make a case much worse than the hon. and learned Member has done in the case which he was defending. This matter is a very plain one. When a Member of this House is arrested or convicted, notice has to be given of such arrest or conviction. A Member of this House is not to be kept away from it without the House knowing he cause why he is kept away. For that purpose the cause, and the true cause, must be stated in order that the House may know whether there is any justification of the conduct of the tribunal or authority who detains an hon. Member. This was according to the ancient law of Parliament, and in former days the judgment of a Court for Contempt, by which a Member was imprisoned, was not recognized by the House of Commons as a valid ground for his detention, and it was disputed and resisted. I do not mean to say that this law in recent times has not been altered. I put it forward as an illustration. Supposing that the old law was in operation in these days, when a Member was detained, and it was not stated that it was for Contempt, the House would be ousted of its right to know the cause of the detention of the Member. Therefore, it is necessary that the true cause of detention should be stated in order that the House may judge whether or not it should take cognizance of what has been done; and, therefore, to send to Mr. Speaker a letter which does not state any legal cause or cause known to the law on which the House can proceed is, on the face of it, an insult to the House. It is as much as to say—"I have detained the Member, and I will not give you any legal cause whatever for his detention." The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India says—"Oh, it was done out of consideration for your understanding, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and for fear that if the cause had been stated in the statutory language of the Act of Parliament, you might not have understood it; it was couched in popular language in order to meet the feebleness of your apprehension." This is the only defence we have heard offered by the Government for this act. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India said that the letter should be couched in popular language. I think that advice a little dangerous to those unlearned gentlemen who are called Resident Magistrates; and I feel that a more extraordinary comment on the learning of those gentlemen could not have been given. But I will suggest another form of popular language, which will be perfectly familiar to the House, and perfectly satisfactory, no doubt, to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A.

J. Balfour). Suppose a Resident Magistrate were to write a letter and say—"Mr. Speaker, I have got hold of a Nationalist Member, and I have sent him to prison." That is a very popular way of expressing exactly what is going on in this case. It would be perfectly intelligible even to your intellect, Mr. Deputy Speaker; you would then know exactly what had happened, and the House and the country would also know; while the Resident Magistrate would be spared the trouble of exhibiting his ignorance of the law. In order to save the trouble of writing such a letter, I suggest that there should be a common form lithographed, and that a parcel containing them should be supplied to Resident Magistrates—a dozen or so might be served out, and they might be in this form:—"We have got hold of a number of Nationalist Members; we do not exactly know what we are to try them for, but we have sent them to prison, and I beg to inform you of the fact." Now, that is exactly what has been done in this case, and that is what the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India calls popular language. Hon. Gentlemen on these Benches raise their protest against, what I will call, the unbecoming levity of the hon. Gentleman in adopting this form of defence of the present transaction, which, however, is the only defence that has been offered. There has not been the smallest attempt to offer any serious explanation to the House. I do not impute anything to the Resident Magistrate, except crass ignorance. The Resident Magistrate did not know what it was that Mr. Dillon was sent to prison for; and, therefore, we cannot impute to him any bad motive—[Cries of "Order!"]. He is described here as Mr. Dillon.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is usual in this House to refer to an "hon. Member."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: All I complain of is that the magistrate, in informing the House that he had committed the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) to prison, has not adopted the ordinary form of satisfying the House of Commons that he had sent him to prison for some offence known to the law. It was all very well for the hon. and learned Member for Deptford to say that we knew all about the Plan of Campaign; but it is necessary that the magistrate should state that the hon. Member had committed some offence of a statutory character. But he has not done that, and therefore, not merely with reference to this case alone, but with reference to future cases in which Members of this House may be detained, I think that we ought to take some proceedings to assert that a legal offence should be stated as the cause of imprisonment of a Member of this House.

SIR HENRY JAMES (Bury, Lancashire) said, he was desirous of narrowing the discussion to the only question which ought to be brought to the attention of the House—namely, whether a Breach of Privilege had been committed or not. He did not quite share the views enunciated by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Deptford (Mr. Darling), and he quite agreed with his right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) that if the House had had such a flippant communication as he had sketched, stating that a Member had been caught and sent to prison, the writer of such a communication would deserve the greatest possible censure of the House. He (Sir Henry James) would ask the House to take into consideration what it had before it, not from outside sources, but from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy). The House would agree that if they had had from this Resident Magistrate the most technical statement of the offence that he learnt from the hon. and learned Member for North Longford had been committed, he should have sent to the House a communication that “Mr. Dillon had been convicted of taking part in a certain criminal conspiracy—to wit, the Plan of Campaign.”

MR. T. M. HEALY: No, no! According to the report in The Times, informations were sworn by District Inspector M'Donnell, before Mr. Kil Kelly, R.M., charging Mr. Dillon with taking part in an unlawful assembly at Tallyallen—that was afterwards departed from—and in a criminal conspiracy to induce certain tenants to refuse to pay their rents.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, they were asked to find that a Breach of Privilege had been committed on the statement of a newspaper that there had been a conviction for a particular offence. If the letter of the magistrate had stated that Mr. Dillon had been convicted of taking part in “a certain criminal conspiracy—to wit, the Plan of Campaign,” there would have been no Breach of Privilege. All that the magistrate had done was to omit the words “a certain criminal conspiracy—to wit.” No doubt, looked at from the narrow view of a lawyer, the letter was couched in slipshod language; but persons who were not lawyers would simply say that the result had been stated briefly without reciting the legal means by which it had been arrived at. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby did not impute any motive to the magistrate, and only charged him with ignorance; but was an error committed in ignorance to be treated as a Breach of Privilege? He was afraid that he and others had often committed Breaches of Privilege in ignorance. Taking the admission that this gentleman had not intended any insult to the House, and that he had to satisfy the Lord Chancellor of his legal knowledge—[MR. T. M. HEALY: No; the Lord Lieutenant]—it was scarcely worth the while of the House to consider what penalty should be imposed upon him for a Breach of Privilege committed in ignorance.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) has come to the assistance of the defence of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) in this matter with his usual gallantry. He has stepped into the breach on behalf of the Government, and endeavoured to induce us to dispose of this matter on the ground that there was no intention or apprehension of giving offence to this House. I do not know whether my right hon. Friend is right in so pronouncing upon this matter; but I believe that I am quite right when I say that in debates on this question, whether it is a Breach of Privilege or not, we have nothing whatever to do with the intention of the person who has committed it. The intention of the person is a matter for after action. The custom of this House is first to decide whether a Breach of Privilege has been committed or not, and subsequently it is the duty of the House to consider whether it has been innocently committed or not—whether it has been an innocent or a guilty Breach of Privilege, and on this head the House takes what course it may in its wisdom deem right. In considering the conduct of Mr. Hamilton, we have to look at the facts by themselves. I do not want to go into the motives that my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) and others think they see in what has taken place. I want to restrain them from looking at any motive, or of presumed innocence, there may be associated with the whole matter at this stage. What are the facts with which we have to deal? It appears to be supposed by the hon. and learned Member for Deptford (Mr. Darling) that there is nothing to be done in a case of this kind except to certify a certain fact to the House, that the House is minus one of its own Members, and that when they are put in possession of that information as functi officio in the matter, they had nothing to do but to receive it and to record it, and to have nothing whatever to say upon the proceedings that have taken place. I think, Sir, that this is one of the gravest matters in which we can possibly be engaged. I think I see a smile on the face of some of the right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench, but I do not think that I have said anything in my utterance which should have provoked that smile. Sir, there is no question that can come before this House more important than the personal liberty of the Members. If this House is bound to respect the tribunals of this country, then the tribunals of this country are bound to respect this House. When we have had to deal with the Judges of the land in matters of this kind, not one of those Judges failed in the proper discharge of their duty; but we are here dealing with a case where the Judges of a Court have infringed the Privileges of this House, and I want to know, after the smiles I have observed on the Front Government Bench, if the Government does not consider the question raised of the highest Constitutional importance that this House should be made aware of what has happened to one of its Members according to legitimate authority, and whether the powers vested in the magistrates by the law have been properly exercised, and how can the House know that unless the Judge states a legal offence? This, I say, is a matter of the highest Constitutional importance. I do not say that the House ought now to enter into the merits as to whether the magistrates were actuated by right motives or not; but what we have a right to know is, whether the magistrate has acted within the limits of the law. My right hon. and learned Friend (Sir Henry James), with his boundless ingenuity, has, hypothetically, patched up a form of expression which the magistrate might have used, but which, as he says, the magistrate has not used.

Sir William Harcourt

SIR HENRY JAMES: What I said was that the magistrate ought to have used certain words which I stated. What I did say was, that if he had used certain language which I repeated, he would have accurately described what took place before his tribunal.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I confess that when I heard that from my right hon. and learned Friend I did not then estimate the high importance of it; but I think the way in which the magistrate has communicated with this House is one of the most extraordinary, strange, and unnatural that it has ever before experienced. But my right hon. and learned Friend says that the magistrate has omitted only four or five words, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman asks whether we were going to find that there was a Breach of Privilege because of the omission of those words; but it so happens that those are the only words that are in the slightest degree material. It is the duty of the House to know that the magistrate has been acting within the law; but the magistrate left out the words that would afford the information, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman said—"I will supply them." What the House desires to know is why the hon. Member has been prevented from attending in his place in this House. If it is necessary that the intimation should be made to the House, we ought to know that the ground of the conviction is a legal offence; but no statutory knowledge, no judicial knowledge of the legal offence on which the hon. Member for East Mayo has been detained, is conveyed by the magistrate's letter. It is the duty of the House to maintain with strictness the regularity of these proceedings; and unless it does so it will be better that these letters should be discontinued altogether, for they will become a mockery if they are to convey to the House, in what is called popular language, only what the newspapers have already conveyed. We want to be assured of the legality and the regularity of the proceeding. This is the purpose of the letter. If the letter does not convey such an assurance, the writer of the letter, however innocent, seriously failed in his duty to the House, and it is the duty of the House to take note of the Breach of Privilege; and if inquiry into the circumstances justifies the conclusion of innocence, which has been prematurely assumed, the honour of the House will have been vindicated. I so regard it.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The hon. and learned Member for York (Mr. Lockwood) in his desire to place this question clearly before the House, asked what would be said by those outside the House when they read this debate. I think, Sir, that those outside will say that a great many and very learned and distinguished Gentlemen have been occupied in discussing a very trivial and frivolous question; that the storm which has been raging has been a storm in a tea-cup, and that it is really difficult to believe that the avowed motive of the debate to which we had been listening is the real one. It will also, perhaps, be said that the House by this debate has shown no very great anxiety to approach the Business which appears next on the Paper. They will probably say, when they read the speech of the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) and the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), and, of course, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), that the hon. Members opposite could not lose an opportunity—however ill-chosen that opportunity might be—for the purpose of attacking a Resident Magistrate. The hon. and learned Member for North Longford has taken the opportunity which this debate allowed him to use language not only of extreme violence but absolutely and totally without foundation with regard to this magistrate (Mr. Hamilton). He has attacked his morals and attacked his learning. There is not the slightest ground, as far as I know, for believing that this gentleman acted otherwise than in the most perfect good faith. As to his learning and his qualifications, and as to the Lord Lieutenant testifying to them, I do not say much, but what I say will be sufficient—namely, that if any Lord Lieutenant is to be attacked on the question at all, that Lord Lieutenant is Lord Spencer. For not only was the appointment of Mr. Hamilton one of Lord Spencer's appointments, but it was Lord Spencer who declared that he had adequate legal knowledge. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby gave us his view of the object with which these letters are written to the House. They are written to the House in order that the House may become cognizant of the reason why it is deprived of the service of one of its own Members. That is the reason, and I apprehend that every letter couched in respectful language giving the House that knowledge is a proper letter. It may not satisfy the appetite for technicalities which consumes the legal mind, but it may well satisfy the lay mind; and I would ask, have those who have made a most violent attack on the magistrate concerned maintained for a moment that he has misled the House with regard to the detention of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon)? Can anybody, even under the influence of the violent passions which the very name of Resident Magistrate excites in the breasts of hon. Members below the Gangway, maintain for a moment that any deception has been practised on the House of Commons by this gentleman? I humbly admit that I approach this question as a layman, and without that refinement of technicality which the right hon. Gentleman opposite regards as of so much importance. Surely when you say that a man is convicted of taking part in the Plan of Campaign, if it be admitted that the Plan of Campaign is an illegal conspiracy, do you not assert by implication that he has been proved to be guilty of an illegal proceeding? If it be true that the Plan of Campaign is an illegal conspiracy, for the magistrate to state that the hon. Member has been convicted of taking part in the Plan of Campaign is to say that he has convicted him of illegal conspiracy. The Plan of Campaign has been distinctly stated by more than one Judge of the High Court to be illegal without qualification or drawback, and what has been stated by a Judge of the High Court in Ireland may surely be stated by a Resident Magistrate and accepted by this House. This debate is a happy illustration of the kind of language which hon. Gentlemen opposite are prepared to use with the very smallest provocation when they think any political capital can be made out of it. The hon. and learned Member for North Longford thinks he has a good opportunity of attacking a Resident Magistrate and myself because a political opponent has been sentenced to imprisonment. [Cries of "Hear, hear!"] Exactly; in those cheers lies the explanation of the debate. It is not the dignity of this House, it is not the Privilege of this House which hon. Gentlemen have at heart. They are animated, not by love of this House, but by a hatred of the tribunals in Ireland. That is the motive and that is the mainspring of the whole debate; and I think it is really wasting the time of the House to pretend for one instant that any great question involving the dignity or Privilege of this Assembly is concerned in the fact that one Resident Magistrate has, in perfectly clear language, but not in language technical enough to suit lawyers, explained to Mr. Speaker that the hon. Member for East Mayo has been sentenced to imprisonment.

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) said, that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) had, as usual, infused into the debate a spirit of bitterness. [Ministerial cries of "Oh!"] Yes; he had deliberately imputed the lowest motives to his opponents that he could possibly find; he had said that the public would see that hon. Members below the Gangway and right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench had been actuated solely by a desire to make a little political capital, and were determined to lose no opportunity of discrediting Resident Magistrates. He (Mr. John Morley) maintained that they ought to lose no opportunity of bringing before the scrutiny of the House every act committed by every Resident Magistrate done in pursuance of the Coercion Act of last year. If he could be amazed at anything after the circumstances of the passing of that Act, he was amazed that hon. Members opposite should think that anything relating to the arrest of a Member of that House could be a light and frivolous matter, and could only be made the subject of debate by hon. Members from frivolous, vexatious, and partizan motives. The right hon. Gentleman had attempted to make the point which he was always attempting to make, in referring them to something that had been done by Lord Spencer. The right hon. Gentleman had said that it was Lord Spencer who appointed Mr. Hamilton. He (Mr. John Morley) was prepared to believe that that was perfectly true; but it was not the point. Lord Spencer might have appointed Mr. Hamilton; but his selection was for duties very different to his present course of action, for his action now was action taken by virtue of what the present Lord Lieutenant had done pursuant to a clause in the Coercion Act of last year. The question was not the original appointment of Mr. Hamilton, but the selection of that gentleman by the Lord Lieutenant as a person of whose legal knowledge and competency to administer the Crimes Act he was satisfied.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said, that his point was that Lord Spencer had certified to Mr. Hamilton's legal knowledge.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY said, he must be allowed to question whether Lord Spencer had certified to the legal competency of Mr. Hamilton in respect of a legal subject so delicate and intricate as conspiracy. Conspiracy was not an offence under the Act of 1882, and, therefore, the allusion of the right hon. Gentleman to Lord Spencer had no bearing whatever upon Mr. Hamilton's present position. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Well, the truth was, that the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Gentlemen behind him, who were so ready to make light of these arrests of Members, were only showing the same arbitrary and reckless disregard of the spirit of legality which they showed at every stage of the discussion of the Act of last year. If the case were that of an English Member the Party opposite would be as earnest as any of those on his (Mr. John Morley's) side of the House in taking care that every formality and technicality was scrupulously followed. But their views regarding hon. Members from Ireland were well known. Anything was good enough for an Irish Member. It was against that view that he and his hon. Friends protested, and they would lose no opportunity, however light and frivolous hon. Members opposite might regard it, of insisting that every formality should be strictly and scrupulously respected. It was clear that in the present instance, the formalities had not been observed. It was not even contended by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) that the magistrate had used the proper language. He had not done what he ought to have done, and had therefore been guilty of a breach of the Privileges of this House. The circumstances were so serious—[Laughter]—the circumstances of the arrest of any of their Colleagues were so serious, that they ought to let no opportunity ever pass without insisting that the letter of the law and the usual practice should be rigidly and strictly observed.

SIR HENRY JAMES: I desire to make one correction of my statement. I spoke from memory when I said that the legal knowledge of the Resident Magistrate was certified by the Lord Chancellor. I find on reference to the Act, subsequent to that which I referred to, that this rested with the Lord Lieutenant. The hon. and learned Member for North Longford was, therefore, correct in saying that it was not as I stated.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: The slight explanation we have just heard from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) is an instructive commentary on his appearance in this debate. The right hon. Gentleman got up with the air which he always assumes in speaking on affairs of Ireland; he contradicted the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), and his ignorance is exposed. The House, however, will not expect that the exposure of the right hon. Gentleman's ignorance will lead to any diminution of that self-confidence with which he always speaks on Irish affairs. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, if he has not succeeded in getting a portion of that programme carried out—which, in a moment of singular and unexpected frankness, he expressed with regard to Mr. Blunt,—has at least succeeded in getting the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) sent to jail, and, therefore, he has an opportunity in carrying out that Christian, gentle, and courteous policy of torturing, but not killing a Member of the Nationalist Party. On one occasion I endeavoured at Question time to draw the attention of the House to the fact that Mr. Speaker would not allow popular terms to be employed in Questions addressed to Ministers in the House of Commons. A Member on these Benches put a Question on the Paper relating to the Crimes Act which was referred to as the Coercion Act. Attention was called to the fact, and the Speaker ruled that the term "Coercion Act," although popular, was not a term that ought to be used in this House. Why should not we apply the same test to a letter sent to the Speaker by a Resident Magistrate as we apply to a Question addressed to a Minister in the House of Commons? If the Speaker rules it to be necessary not to employ popular language in a Question addressed to Ministers, a fortiori, it is necessary in Reports made by Resident Magistrates to the House with regard to the conviction of Members of Parliament. The hon. and learned Member for Deptford (Mr. Darling) is in the habit of giving the House legal disquisitions. I rejoice at the fact, but the more I hear these disquisitions the more I wonder how the constituency which he represents could have chosen him in preference to Mr. Blunt. The hon. and learned Member for Deptford laid it down that the terms of the report did not matter, and that the only thing that the House wanted to know is that the Member was convicted.

MR. DARLING: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. Those are neither my words, nor do they represent the sense of what I said.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I should like to know what was the sense of the hon. and learned Member. But I think it is in the knowledge of the House that I represent the meaning of the hon. and learned Member with sufficient accuracy, when I say that his point was, whether the hon. Member for East Mayo was in prison or not. This admirably sums up the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland that the charge is immaterial on which the Resident Magistrate has convicted the hon. Member. The opinion of the magistrate is not the question under discussion. We have first to decide whether or not he has given an accurate representation of the case. If we decide that he has not done this, we can by-and-bye summon him to the House and compel him to make an apology. But I say there is a corrupt intention in sending this letter. Why does he use the term Plan of Campaign? Because he knows that it is a term discredited in this country, and that it has been discredited by the Holy Office, which might, I think, be better employed than in interfering in the political affairs of Ireland, an intervention which will be repulsed by Irish Members with emphasis. We know that the words Plan of Campaign are what Jeremy Bentham would call an odious term. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) said the letter would have been all right if the words "criminal conspiracy" had been put in after the words "Plan of Campaign." Why did the Resident Magistrate not say that the hon. Member for East Mayo was convicted of a criminal conspiracy to induce people in Ireland not to pay rent? It was because if he had used the words "criminal conspiracy to induce people not to fulfil their contracts," he would show that a man can be convicted in Ireland for doing that which a man in England is entitled to do. There is no such thing in England as criminal conspiracy of this kind. I will go further, and say that under the Trades Union Acts an artizan is distinctly entitled to induce others to break their contract; he is safeguarded in doing so, and that is the reason why Mr. Hamilton used the words "Plan of Campaign" instead of the legal term "criminal conspiracy to induce people to break their legal contracts." The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland has said that Mr. Hamilton was appointed by Lord Spencer. I am not prepared to say that Lord Spencer did not make many appointments in Ireland that were not very good; but surely it is one thing to appoint a man as Resident Magistrate for a particular kind of work, and another to appoint him for work of an entirely different character. If he appointed a Resident Magistrate to do the humble work of Petty Sessions, is it to be held that he is competent to go into a Court of Equity and decide questions of a very delicate kind? Why did not the right hon. Gentleman inform the House that under the Coercion Act which Lord Spencer administered Mr. Hamilton could not have tried this case? Mr. Hamilton was employed on Coercion work by Lord Spencer, but in the Crimes Act of 1872 there was no conspiracy section. The only section analogous was that which dealt with intimidation, which has nothing to do with conspiracy; and because Mr. Hamilton was employed by Lord Spencer for this comparatively trivial work of trying Coercion offences, we are to be told that he was also employed by Lord Spencer in trying important and delicate questions of criminal conspiracy. This is only another specimen of the way in which these affairs are conducted in Ireland. I find that in the enactment, which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury did not take the trouble to peruse, it is provided that some of the Resident Magistrates are to be certified as competent by the Lord Lieutenant and others by the Lord Chancellor. Mr. Hamilton has been certified to be legally competent by the Lord Lieutenant, but not so by the Lord Chancellor. This is a remarkable circumstance, because the Marquess of Londonderry, although probably qualified to give his judgment on a race-course, is wholly incapable of forming any opinion as to a man's legal knowledge. Then, he asked, why was Mr. Hamilton sent to try this most delicate and most important case; delicate because of the nature of the charge involved, and important because of the person brought before the Court. Why was Mr. Hamilton, who was an uncertificated lawyer, if he might use the phrase, but who, possibly, was a certificated judge of horse-flesh — why was this man sent to try the case of the hon. Member for East Mayo? Mr. Harrington, the counsel for the hon. Member for East Mayo, asked in Court which of the Resident Magistrates he was to regard as legally qualified to try the case, and Mr. Hamilton replied that he was to be regarded as legally qualified. What were his qualifications; he was Lieutenant of the Revenue Police, and, secondly, he was a Constabulary Officer, but he certainly never passed a matriculation examination. This was a man legally qualified to try one of the most trusted and important Members of the Irish Party. Why was he sent there at all; not because of his legal knowledge, because he had none; not because of his impartiality, because he had none; but he was sent there by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary because he was thought the best instrument to do the dirty work of the Government.

Mr. John Morley

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 189; Noes 250: Majority 61.—(Div. List, No. 106.)

QUESTIONS.

ARMY (INDIA) — THE CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS—CAMP FOLLOWERS.

MR. STANSFELD (Halifax): I wish, Sir, to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he is now prepared to make the statement he promised as to the recent correspondence with the Government of India on the subject of the Contagious Diseases Acts?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): (1.) In consequence of the action taken by the Secretary of State upon the Questions put to him in "another place" last year by the Lord Bishop of Lichfield, what is known as the regimental system has been absolutely stopped. The Commander in Chief has prohibited women from accompanying regiments on march or to camp, and also from residing in regimental bazaars. (2.) The administration of the Contagious Diseases Act in Bombay, Madras and Bassein, the only places in which it is in force, has been suspended by the Government of India under a power contained in the Act. (3.) The Government of India is now engaged in a revision of the Regulations made for preventing the spread of venereal disease in cantonments, under Section 27 of Act III. of 1880; and a despatch is going out to India from the Secretary of State in Council which will prohibit the compulsory examination of women, and the making of any regulations which can be justly construed into a legalization of prostitution.

SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.

In reply to Dr. CLARK (Caithness),

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand,

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

Westminster) said, that whether he should move the adjournment of the House on Thursday or Friday depended entirely on the pleasure of the House. If it were to be on Thursday, it must be understood that the Government Business would be disposed of, and that the Motion would be made at a late hour, and agreed to without discussion. If not, and the Motion was to be made on Friday, it would be necessary to have a Morning Sitting on that day. It would be necessary to take a Vote on Account before the adjournment on Thursday.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY TO THE LORD LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND BILL.

(Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Arthur Balfour, Mr. Jackson.)

[BILL 201.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Office not to disqualify for seat in Parliament).

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, he rose to move an Amendment to this clause, which empowered the Treasury and the Lord Lieutenant to provide a salary for the additional Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. He objected altogether to the proposal to establish and endow what he believed to be an useless and unnecessary Office, and he proposed to strike out what he regarded as the essential words of the clause, the words "to be" in order to raise the whole question again, as he considered the vote taken on the second reading was not taken on the merits, or perhaps, he should say, on the demerits of the Bill, but was taken rather for personal reasons on account of the personal and political controversial points which were introduced into the discussion. This was not the first time that a Bill had been dealt with in this way. A Bill of a very similar character was brought in in 1884, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers). In that Bill there were proposed annuities to Lord Wolseley and Lord Alcester. The House then allowed the second reading of the Bill to take place, because they thought it would be a disparagement to those officers if th

Bill were opposed on the second reading, but immediately the Bill was set down for Committee the hon. Member for Staffordshire put down an Amendment to strike out the word "annuity" and thus raised the whole principle of the Bill. The Government opposed the Amendment for some time, but afterwards finding that the feeling in the House was strongly against the measure, they withdrew it. He did not believe there was ever a stronger feeling on all sides of the House against a Bill than there was against this Bill. He believed that nearly every Member sitting on the Opposition side of the House looked upon it as a most objectionable measure from every possible point of view, and he did not believe there was the slightest support of it on the other side, but that hon. Members opposite would gladly have got rid of it long ago if they could have done so. What was the case for this new Office? Did the Lord Lieutenant require any further assistance in Dublin? What were the duties which the Lord Lieutenant and the Attorney General for Ireland had to do which they could not now perform? These gentlemen were always resident in Dublin, neither of them had any Parliamentary work, they had not to take journeys to and from London, they had no Cabinet meetings to attend, they had the whole of their time at their own disposal to do the work of their respective offices. The present Lord Lieutenant was in a much better position than his Predecessor, because the Lord Chancellor of Ireland was a Cabinet Minister, and he could, with all the responsibility of a Cabinet Minister, not only assist in the Government of Ireland, but he could go over to London and move Bills, or take part in the debates in the House of Lords. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) told them that he required assistance in that House. Now, he (Mr. Heneage) believed that no Irish Secretary was ever in a better position than his right hon. Friend. The right hon. Gentleman had very little to trouble him in Dublin; indeed, he hardly ever went there.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman's Amendment upon the Paper does not appear to prevent the creation of the Office, but provides that the salary shall be paid out of moneys already provided by Parliament for the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary. If that is the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment, he must direct his argument to it.

MR. HENEAGE said, that, of course, he would bow to the Chairman's ruling; but he imagined that the question before them was whether the Under Secretary was worth the salary which was proposed to be given to him. He maintained that the country would derive no benefit whatever from the payment of this salary. He proposed to show that there would be no work for the Under Secretary to do; because those Ministers who were already doing the work, or ought to be doing the work were perfectly competent to perform that work. If that line of argument were out of Order, of course he must depart from it; but he did not see how it was possible for him to prove that the salary was not required unless he proved that the Office itself, to a certain extent, was not required also. He asserted that the Chief Secretary for Ireland was not only in as good a position to perform his duties, but in a better position to do that than any of his Predecessors; because he had very few journeys to Ireland to undertake in comparison, for instance, with the late Mr. Forster; because he had no heavy legislation on hand, and because the hours during which the House sat had been considerably curtailed.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I must point out to the right hon. Gentleman that he must speak to his own Amendment. He proposes that the salary of the Parliamentary Under Secretary shall be taken out of the salaries of the Lord Lieutenant, and the Chief Secretary. It is not pertinent to that to argue the question of the creation of the Office.

MR. HENEAGE said, that he was in great difficulty as to how to argue the question; because, if he could not argue that there was no work for the Under Secretary to do, he must admit that every man was worthy of his hire, and so he was bound to admit that the salary ought to be paid. Perhaps the best course he could take under the circumstances was not to move the present Amendment, but to wait until the end of the clause, and move to omit the clause entirely.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) said, that he agreed with the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Heneage), and he felt justified in making a proposal to him, which was that he should stick to his Amendment. As he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) understood the ruling of the Chairman, they were not entitled to discuss the creation of the Office of Under Secretary, but they were entitled to discuss whether the Under Secretary should be paid by means of a new demand upon the Exchequer, or paid out of funds already at the disposal of the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary. He would take up the argument which the right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to enforce upon the House—namely, that the present Chief Secretary for Ireland was so sparsely employed as compared with his Predecessors that it would only be decorous in him, not to say, generous, if he gave up so much of his salary as would pay for the employment of the new Under Secretary. He had said that the present Chief Secretary was less employed than previous Chief Secretaries, but he did not intend to make any allusion to the tenure of Office of his right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) who probably would take part in the debate, and would be better able to speak concerning his own period of Office. But he would point to the example of the late Mr. Forster; he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) was a very fierce opponent of the late Mr. Forster, but at the same time he did not think there was ever a public servant more devoted to the discharge of his duties. What did the late Mr. Forster do compared with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour)? He was here at Question time almost invariably, and the Questions then were very different to the Questions now; in those days there were 10 Questions put to every one asked now. The right hon. Gentleman had a much more disturbed Ireland to deal with than the present Chief Secretary, and he was interrogated constantly as to the administration of the Coercion Act then in force; whereas the present Chief Secretary was shocked if even a couple of hours were occupied, as there were to-night, in discussing the merits or demerits of the imprisonment of a Member of Parliament. The late Mr. Forster attended to business in Ireland;

but one of the most remarkable things about the present Chief Secretary was the absolute want of attention on his part to the duties of his Office in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman never took an opportunity of going to Ireland in order to remove a certain small proportion of that gigantic ignorance under which he laboured. He did not say that the right hon. Gentleman should go to Ireland while the House was sitting, though he might remark that the late Mr. Forster went no less than 13 times in the course of half a single Session, and in spite of the enormous work he had to do in the House of Commons. But the right hon. Gentleman opposite did not go to Ireland during the Session, neither did he go to Ireland during the vacation. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) saw it announced in the public Press that the right hon. Gentleman was going to spend the forthcoming vacation by the sounding sea. That might be a very pleasant way of spending the vacation to the right hon. Gentleman, but he thought that the right hon. Gentleman would be better discharging his duties if he would go to the country over which he was at the present moment almost as supreme as if he were appointed by the Russian Autocrat as Governor General. The right hon. Gentleman received a very large salary indeed; £5,000 a-year was an extremely good salary, and it was a salary which very few other Ministers of the Government got. Everybody knew that £5,000 a-year was confined to one or two Secretaries, like the Colonial Secretary, the Foreign Secretary, and the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Under these circumstances, he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) thought the right hon. Gentleman might very well afford to cut out of his salary £1,000 or £1,200 a-year for the benefit of the Gentleman who discharged his duties; duties which were discharged by all his Predecessors, but which he was either too lazy or too unwilling to discharge himself. If the right hon. Gentleman were a poor man, he could quite understand his opposing this Amendment, but the right hon. Gentleman was well known to be a man of wealth.—[Mr. A. J. BALFOUR dissented.]—Well, he would regard the right hon. Gentleman's income as establishing the

the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon)—had been sentenced to imprisonment on the following charge—"For having taken part in the Plan of Campaign." He (Mr. T. M. Healy) wished to ask, whether it were possible in case of inaccuracy, or, as he would charge, a deliberate misstatement, or to the legal effect of the conviction, on the hon. Member for East Mayo, it would be in Order to move a Motion on the subject? The practice was to move that such letter be inserted on the Journals of the House; but he proposed to move that as it contained a falsehood such record should be deferred, and that the Clerk of the House should communicate with the Resident Magistrate, and the exact terms of the sentence on Mr. Dillon be communicated to the House. He referred to the informations on which the hon. Member for East Mayo was charged. He was not charged on any summons, but was arrested on April 18 by a District Inspector, and brought before Mr. Kilkelly, R.M., charged with taking part in an illegal assembly and criminal conspiracy to induce certain persons not to pay their rents, and upon that charge only could he have been convicted. The Magistrate invented a charge, which was not a legal charge, with the deliberate object of prejudicing his hon. Friend, and chiefly, it might be, in regard to a recent Papal document. The statement which this Resident Magistrate wrote was as follows:—

"County Louth, Drogheda,
12th May, 1888.

"SIR,—I have the honour to report that yesterday, the 11th instant, at Mells, in the county of Louth, before a court of petty sessions, under 'The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887,' of which I was chairman, found Mr. John Dillon, M.P., guilty of having, on 8th ult. in this county, taken part in the Plan of Campaign."

Now, there was no such offence known to the law. The law under the Criminal Law and Procedure Act took cognizance of and enabled magistrates to convict the Members of that House and non-Members of taking part in an illegal conspiracy. There was no other offence known to the law, and he therefore submitted that as formerly the practice of the House always was, when those letters were read by the Chairman, for some Member of the Government to move that they be laid on the Table of the House. Where a gross and deliberate misstatement was made by a responsible Executive officer as to the charge upon which an hon. Member was convicted, it ought not to appear that the House gave its sanction to its insertion on the Minutes. He wished to know whether he should be in Order in moving—

"That as it was alleged this letter from the Resident Magistrate conveyed a false impression as to the ground on which the hon. Member for East Mayo was convicted, that the Clerk do communicate with the Resident Magistrate as to the exact terms of the conviction, and that in the meantime the letter be not inserted on the Minutes."

If he was in Order, he begged to make that Motion.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) said, he wished to call the attention of Mr. Deputy Speaker to the fact that the hon. Member for the Loughborough Division of Leicestershire (Mr. De Lisle) drew the attention of Mr. Speaker to the fact that the Crimes Act last year was described in a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) as a Coercion Act, and the hon. Gentleman asked the ruling of Mr. Speaker as to whether it was right to apply to the Statute the popular instead of the legal title, and Mr. Speaker ruled that that title was out of Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order! As far as I am aware, it is not the practice to make a Motion to lay such a communication on the Table of the House. Many communications are made to the Speaker, such as, for instance, those of Election Judges. They are read from the Chair as a matter of Order, and inserted as read from the Chair. They can be inserted in no other fashion. If the hon. Member desires to make on a subsequent day any Motion in respect of this, he will be in Order to do so; but having been read in discharge of a Ministerial duty from the Chair they appear on the Journals as a matter of course.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Then I would ask you, Sir, whether in the meantime, a deliberate statement having been made by me as a Member of this House that this letter must be false on the face of it, whether the Clerk will insert it in the Minutes pending the moving of such a Resolution?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The letter will appear with the authority of the Lord Lieutenant for the purpose of providing the salary for the new official.

MR. HENEAGE said, that what he proposed was, that the salary should be paid out of monies now provided by Parliament for the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary. Therefore, the salary of the new Office might be taken out of either one or the other, or both.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Heneage) proposed to cut down the salary of both the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary, but he understood the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. J. Morley) to restrict this mulcting process to the salary of the Lord Lieutenant. The Amendment, however, would not carry that out, because the salary of the Lord Lieutenant was not voted by Parliament, but came out of the Consolidated Fund. The Amendment, therefore, would require to be entirely recast, in order to carry out the object which the right hon. Gentleman who moved it had in view. He would, however, leave that point to go to the substance of the Amendment. Now, the salary proposed to be given to the Under Secretary was not an addition, as some Members supposed, of £1,500 a-year to the cost of the Irish Establishment. The new burden thrown on the Irish Establishment would be £300 a-year, because they took power, in a latter clause of the Bill, to abolish an Office which now cost £1,200 a-year. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne went on to say that the cost of the Irish Administration had long been a scandal. Let him (Mr. A. J. Balfour) remind the House that if the cost of the Irish Establishment was at one time excessive, or was even now excessive, it was far less excessive than it used to be. In other words, the amount of work thrown on the Irish Administration was enormously greater now than it was at the time when these salaries were fixed. He apprehended that no one would doubt that. There was a well known story told of Mr. Horsman, who was Chief Secretary about 30 years ago, but never found it necessary to go to the office at all. He declared he had nothing to do in his office, and lounged down to the House, and had, practically, an extremely easy time of it. He (Mr. A. J. Balfour) was not sure that at that time the salary was not even greater than at present; at any rate, it was higher in the earlier part of the century. No one would say that the Chief Secretary was not, at that moment, a tolerably hard worked official. Of course, he could not please the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor). The hon. Gentleman was unhappy when he (Mr. A. J. Balfour) was in London, and he was unhappy when he was in Ireland; when he was here the hon. Gentleman regretted that he was not in Ireland; and when he was in Ireland the hon. Gentleman regretted he was not in England. He was sorry he could not oblige the hon. Gentleman by being in the two places at one time; but he did not think that the hon. Gentleman, even in his higher flights of eloquence, would go the length of saying that the Office of Chief Secretary was not a tolerably hard worked Office. Leaving the question of the salary of the Chief Secretary, and leaving the general question of the cost thrown on the Irish Establishment, which he had shown was extremely small—namely, £300 a-year, he came to the main point urged by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne, which was that the new salary should be taken out of the salary of the Lord Lieutenant. The right hon. Gentleman said, was that not an enormous salary, considering the Lord Lieutenant was Governor of a poor country. He (Mr. A. J. Balfour) frankly admitted—he had never concealed it from the House before, and he did not conceal it now—that the whole question of the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland was one which might at the proper time require revision. He was far from considering that that was a closed question; but let not the House make a mistake—it was rather a big question, and they could not at one stroke of the pen abolish the Lord Lieutenant's Office. It was an immemorial Office, around which there had collected an incrustation of duties, social and otherwise, which they could not destroy at a blow without making a great social revolution—well, he would not say a great social revolution, but a social revolution on a scale which made anyone hesitate before he engaged in it.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

The right hon. Gentleman described the salary of the Lord Lieutenant as an excessive and an enormous salary, but it entirely depended upon what they expected the Lord Lieutenant to do. If they expected the Lord Lieutenant to do that which all Lord Lieutenants had always done up to this time, as Lord Aberdeen and Lord Spencer had done—he would not go through the long list of distinguished men who had filled the Office—then he contended that the salary evidently was not an excessive one, but was an extremely meagre salary. Everyone who knew the facts knew that the Lord Lieutenant was not only out of pocket, but enormously out of pocket always. [An hon. MEMBER: What about Lord Abercorn?] He did not believe there had ever been a Lord Lieutenant, certainly there had not been one within his experience, who did not lose money by being Lord Lieutenant. Much as the salary of £20,000 might appear to the Committee, and much as the salary, no doubt, was, he was sure there had been many years in which the Lord Lieutenant had spent out of pocket another £20,000. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Yes, he did not exaggerate in the least when he said that. Therefore, when the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. John Morley) said that the Lord Lieutenant had too big a salary, he was pointing to a revolution which would abolish the Lord Lieutenant as they had always known him. This Bill was a much humbler measure, and he asked the House to reject the Amendment, not because they thought that the Lord Lieutenant's Office must necessarily forever be kept up at its present scale, but because the Bill did not deal with that Office, and the idea of getting £300 a-year out of the salary of the Lord Lieutenant in order to supply the deficiency caused by the salary of the Under Secretary seemed to be tinkering with a question which ought to be dealt with in a very different spirit by the House. He hoped the House would reject the Amendment. He thought he had given reasons, not reasons wholly undeserving of consideration, why they should reject the Amendment and refuse in this Bill to touch the question of the Lord Lieutenant's salary, which was not voted by Parliament and which was a charge on the Consolidated Fund.

MR. JOHN MORLEY said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had said that this Bill would make an addition of £300 a-year. That would be true but for the latter part of the 2nd clause. The assumption of the right hon. Gentleman was that one of the members of the Local Government Board would disappear, and that the Parliamentary Under Secretary would do his work.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he ought to have stated that the Bill would make no permanent addition.

MR. JOHN MORLEY said, that the Government took power to employ an Inspector, from time to time, if it should be necessary, and they said that such an Inspector should be paid an allowance or salary such as the Lord Lieutenant might think fit. Unless he was very uncharitable to Dublin Castle, that Inspector would be very soon found to be wanted, and that allowance or additional salary would be very soon proposed by the Lord Lieutenant, and assented to by the Treasury. He could not assent to the statement that there would only be the difference between £1,500 and £1,200 a-year.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) thought the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) had made a very sensible and practical proposal to the Government. He was very glad the right hon. Gentleman had stuck to his guns, though he had been disappointed in the delivery of his speech, with which he intended to support the proposal. The object of the Amendment was to provide that the salary of the Under Secretary should be paid out of the moneys provided by Parliament, or out of the salary fixed for the Lord Lieutenant, which was at the present time a charge on the Consolidated Fund. He should hope to show that, in his and his hon. Friend's opinion, at least, there was ample ground for the Amendment proposed, and ample room enough, both in the salaries and allowances of the Lord Lieutenant and of the Chief Secretary, to take out the little slice wanted for the patronizing job of the Government in creating an Office for their pet, the forthcoming

Under Secretary for Ireland. The Lord Lieutenant received a salary of £20,000 a-year. He supposed it would not be very generous to say the Lord Lieutenant did not earn such a salary; but, certainly, to their mind, he did not, even having regard to the ornamental dignity supposed to be attached to the Office of the Lord Lieutenant. They believed that a salary far less than £20,000 a-year would meet the exigencies of the case. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. A. J. Balfour) had remarked that Lord Lieutenants spent in entertainments £20,000 a-year in addition to their salary. Granting the truth of that statement, whom did the Lord Lieutenant entertain and feast? Let anyone look at the list of those who partook of the Lord Lieutenant's entertainment and hospitality, and they would find that they were such men as Mr. Hamilton, who had sent the Speaker a letter that evening, and men of that class who were known for their antipathy to the Irish people. Something had been said by the Chief Secretary in regard to the duties of the Lord Lieutenant. In mercy's name they ought to talk common sense when talking of these things. What duty had the Lord Lieutenant to perform? He had merely to register whatever was the policy which the Chief Secretary for Ireland wished to put forward as the mouthpiece of the Cabinet. They never heard of the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland having an opinion of his own in regard to the government of Ireland. His most onerous duties seemed to be to engage in the game of golf, or to indulge in that manly English game of cricket, or to have his photograph taken in one of the principal streets of the City of Dublin. If the Government thought such duties worth £20,000 a-year, he (Mr. Harrington) and his hon. Friends did not; they believed that out of that £20,000 a slice might be taken for the salary of the Office which it was now wished to create. He could not now enter into the question of the propriety of creating that Office, that had been justly ruled out of Order; but he might say that they were totally against the creation of the Office, and that was the justification of the demand that the salary of the new official should not be made a burden upon the taxpayer. It was said that the Lord Lieutenant lost by the very lavish hospitality he indulged in. He (Mr. Harrington) did not think that the history of the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland would bear that statement out. But even if the present Lord Lieutenant had dispensed something over his £20,000, he received dignity and status and office in return for it, and could save in his rents. It was a well-known fact in the North of Ireland that the proclamation of the Plan of Campaign in Ireland was issued the very day after the present Lord Lieutenant's tenants had announced their intention of combining for the protection of themselves, and that was a scandalous fact that might claim the serious attention of the Executive Officers of the Irish Government. Now, turning to the Chief Secretary, they found that he had a salary of £4,225 a-year. They considered that the duties of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Balfour) were not very serious duties, but that such as they were, they were to be considerably lightened by the Bill. What did the Bill propose to do? It was proposed by the Bill to give power to transfer from the Chief Secretary to the Under Secretary the privilege of signing certain documents, and performing certain functions which would altogether lighten the burdens of the duties of the Chief Secretary. It was very hard to dissociate the two lines of argument, one of which was not in Order, and which applied to the necessity or non-necessity for the introduction of this measure, and the other which applied to the payment of the salary of the Office being made out of the moneys provided for the Chief Secretary and the Lord Lieutenant, and for the reason, as he had said, that provision was made in the clauses of the Bill for the transference of duties to the Under Secretary which were now discharged by the Chief Secretary himself. He could not discuss the propriety of having those duties discharged by one whom he must describe as an underling, though he said that with all respect. As the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was to retain his salary intact, he ought to continue to perform his duties. Certainly, it was only fair to propose that if any of his duties were transferred or delegated to a new officer, that officer should fairly, in return for the functions he performed, receive a portion of the salary of the Chief Secretary, instead of the payment made to him being made a charge upon the public funds. What was the argument the right hon. Gentleman advanced that night? It was the argument always advanced in respect of Irish appointments. The Chief Secretary had said the Office would only entail a trifling additional expense. That argument had been time out of mind advanced in favour of offices created for those place hunters, who clung on a parasitical way to every Party in power. In the case of the appointment of Resident Magistrates, even of Judges, and of every other kind of official, the same argument had been used. New office after new office had been created. Day after day they had added to the expenditure of the Government of Ireland until the cost of that Government had become a scandal. Many items might be carved out of the Chief Secretary's office, which, put together, would make a very decent salary for the Parliamentary Under Secretary. Besides the Chief Secretary there was an Under Secretary, who was paid £2,500 a-year. There was the Assistant Under Secretary, Clerk of the Council, and Deputy Keeper of the Privy Seal, and he received £1,350 a-year. There were several principal clerks, and they got £1,825 a-year. There were first clerks and second clerks; and there was a washerwoman who was paid £15 a-year. He did not object to attention being paid to the sanitary arrangements of the office, because the office really required a lot of washing and renovating. There were allowances for cost of lighting, &c., and there were special allowances for the cost of the Chief Secretary's alternate residence in England and Ireland. He ventured to say that any man who had in his mind the intention of advancing economic reform in this House would support this Amendment, and he very much regretted that, on an occasion of this kind, when economy was in question, those hon. and right hon. Members, who from time to time asked such stinging Questions here, either about the pay of a sergeant in the Army, or some small matter of that kind, had not thought it worth while to attend to support the arguments of the Irish Members. He regretted very much that these pioneers of reform to whom he had referred were not in their places to support the proposal of that reform which was now under discussion. It was a scandal to the people of Ireland to ask Parliament for this peddling sum, when they paid the Lord Lieutenant £20,000 for indulging in the recreation of cricket, or walking down to the establishment of some particular photographer in Dublin, and getting his picture taken for the purpose of sending it round as that of a landlord who had "protected himself" from the Plan of Campaign, by getting it proclaimed throughout Ireland at the very time that his tenantry had adopted it. It was no wonder to him (Mr. E. Harrington) that the Government from time to time thought it their duty to bring forward such measures as this. Poor as they were in Ireland they might somehow scrape together this £1,200 as a salary for the Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, if only for the purpose of showing the English people how well the English Parliament diverted itself from its legitimate purpose for supporting a man who had a rent roll of £40,000 a-year, at a time when there was no need for the creation of the new Office. It could be easily pointed out to the Government how they could make up the salary of this new official out of the present swollen allowances made for the purpose of carrying on the Irish Government. It could be easily pointed out to them how this salary could be made up out of scraps and odds and ends. The Government would not go in that direction, however, although they would find no difficulty in obtaining what they wanted without saddling the taxpayers with any further burden. He felt that there was a great deal to be said upon this question, but he did not like to occupy the time of the Committee unduly. He believed it would tax the legal ingenuity of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Madden), and when he used the word "ingenuity," he intended it in no disrespectful sense, for he was glad to recognize that the hon. and learned Gentleman always met them very fairly in these matters—to find out a defence for this burden of £300 even, which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary told them was the whole sum to be taken out of the public purse in regard to this new Office. But even this £300 need not be taken out of the National pocket. The whole £1,200 could be saved without derogation to Public Business, simply by not rigging up as a national cock-shy in Ireland this broken down landlord for all Irishmen to be constantly throwing at him as a living example of all that is abominable in the Irish governmental system.

Mr. Edward Harrington

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Dublin, College Green) said, before a Division was taken, he should like to say a few words in support of the Amendment before the House. The new Office had been created, and now a new salary was about to be created for the Office. The Government of Ireland in proportion to the population of the country was one of the most costly in the whole world, and in spite of that fact it was now proposed—as he contended—to put a new and totally unnecessary burden upon it. If this new salary was to be attached to the new Office, in his opinion it ought to be paid out of the sums already allocated by Parliament for the Government of Ireland. He thought the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary might very fairly be expected to take out of their own large salaries the amount required to pay the Under Secretary if they considered it absolutely essential that this appointment should be made, and that a salary should be attached to it. He thought the people of Ireland would be somewhat surprised, and perhaps edified, at all this stickling on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite for salaries. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were wealthy men, and affected to be great patriots, and yet they were to be found on the Floor of this House of Commons night after night fighting this stiff, tough, protracted battle in the matter of salaries. He should not have been so much surprised at that if they had not from time to time treated with scorn and contempt the idea of getting any money whatever for the performance of public duties. It was not so long since these self-same Gentlemen who were so anxious about this salary question, and more particularly the Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, spoke with contempt of the secretaries of the National League branches who, he alleged, received salaries for their services. So far as he (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) was aware, no salaries were attached to those positions. It might be the case that in some particular districts the branches of the National League had determined for a while to allocate some remuneration to their secretary, but he was not aware of any specific instance in which that had been done. Even if such were the case, it was not for the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Colonel King-Harman) to speak in a tone of contempt and scorn of the men who received those small salaries. He certainly thought it was a public scandal that such a Gentleman as this should be endeavouring to extort this salary from the House of Commons and the British people. He said the British people, but, of course, the Irish people had to pay their share of the expense, and it was a wonder to him that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet was not ashamed of that fact. He (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) knew perfectly well that no secretary of the National League would take any petty remuneration if it was only to be obtained after such a continuous struggle as had been made on behalf of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. As a matter of fact, the whole system of government in Ireland was over-paid and over-manned. It was a system of corruption. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had lately told the public that his chief worry was in trying to deal with the numerous applicants for place and pay under the Government of Ireland. But now they saw him creating a new Office, and endeavouring to attach a new salary thereto without any necessity for the appointment. But even if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant did require assistance in getting through the work of his Office, it was only reasonable and fair, taking all the circumstances of the case into consideration, that he and the Lord Lieutenant should pay this drudge. The Lord Lieutenant had a magnificent salary appropriated to him by the Parliament of England, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was also in the enjoyment of a splendid salary for the duties he performed, and it was no excessive burden upon these Gentlemen to require them to subscribe between them the salary of their new assistant. The whole discussion did not redound to the credit either of the Government who sought to promote this job, or to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who sought to profit by it.

Mr. Edward Harrington

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.) said, he had little to add to the arguments of his Colleagues in support of the Amendment; but he wished to refer to one of the reasons adduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary in support of the passing of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had pointed out that in adopting the Bill and appointing a new Under Secretary one member of the Irish Local Government Board would be suppressed, and that the Government would be saved nearly the whole of the extraordinary sum about to be allocated to the payment of the new Under Secretary. Well, it was once stated that Ireland was the most be-boarded country in the world; and if that were so, he would say, at any rate, let them have efficient Boards. He could not see how, by the creation of an Assistant Parliamentary Secretary to the Chief Secretary and the consequent suppression of a member of the Local Government Board, they were increasing the efficiency of the Boards in Ireland. In that country the people suffered severely from inattention to their duties on the part of members of public Boards. They suffered severely from the slipshod manner in which these Government officials performed their duties; and he certainly failed to see how the Local Government Board of Ireland would be improved by the suppression of an active member and the creation of a new official who would be unable to pay any attention whatever to the duties of the post. The Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Chief Secretary for Ireland would spend most of his time in that House—that was to say, most of that time which he did not spend on holidays on the Continent or in the Isle of Thanet. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman came to the House to answer Questions in his own jaunty and insulting fashion; and he (Mr. J. O'Connor) asked the Committee how they could reasonably believe that the man upon whose shoulders were placed so many onerous duties as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet would be able to give the necessary amount of attention to the duties imposed upon him in connection with the Irish Local Government Board? The reason the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary gave for this arrangement was one that, to his mind, ought to induce the Committee to vote by a large majority the acceptance of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage). He (Mr. J. O'Connor) thought the House was very much indebted to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby for having brought this matter forward, because the House was the guardian of the public purse, and his Amendment afforded the Committee of the House an opportunity of passing its opinion upon an attempt that was being made to fritter away the public resources. He (Mr. J. O'Connor) quite admitted that if there had been any necessity shown for the proposal contained in the Bill the Committee and the House would have been justified in rejecting the Amendment. But no necessity had been shown for the creation of this Office; on the contrary, during all the discussions which had taken place upon this matter it had been pointed out most energetically, and to his mind most conclusively, that there was no necessity whatever for the Office, and therefore it was that he thought the Committee of the House, and the House itself, ought to be grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for having afforded it an opportunity of passing a judgment upon the proposition. As he had said, there had been no reason shown for the adoption of the proposal of the Government; but there was every reason why hon. Members from Ireland ought to offer most strenuous opposition not only to the creation of the new Office, but also to the payment of it. It was hoped that at no distant day, no matter what had been said to the contrary, there would be extended to the Irish people a system, if not of National, at least of local self-government; and one of the first duties that would be imposed upon the Local Bodies which would be set up in Ireland would be to establish an economic system of government, in which spirit it would be necessary to decrease every establishment in Ireland. It would be necessary to decrease the establishment of the Lord Lieutenant, and the various other establishments which were paid out of the public funds. Well, it was in the Irish Party. Why was he sent there at all; not because of his legal knowledge, because he had none; not because of his impartiality, because he had none; but he was sent there by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary because he was thought the best instrument to do the dirty work of the Government.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 189; Noes 250: Majority 61.—(Div. List, No. 106.)

QUESTIONS.

ARMY (INDIA) — THE CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS—CAMP FOLLOWERS.

MR. STANSFELD (Halifax): I wish, Sir, to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he is now prepared to make the statement he promised as to the recent correspondence with the Government of India on the subject of the Contagious Diseases Acts?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): (1.) In consequence of the action taken by the Secretary of State upon the Questions put to him in "another place" last year by the Lord Bishop of Lichfield, what is known as the regimental system has been absolutely stopped. The Commander in Chief has prohibited women from accompanying regiments on march or to camp, and also from residing in regimental bazaars. (2.) The administration of the Contagious Diseases Act in Bombay, Madras and Bassein, the only places in which it is in force, has been suspended by the Government of India under a power contained in the Act. (3.) The Government of India is now engaged in a revision of the Regulations made for preventing the spread of venereal disease in cantonments, under Section 27 of Act III. of 1880; and a despatch is going out to India from the Secretary of State in Council which will prohibit the compulsory examination of women, and the making of any regulations which can be justly construed into a legalization of prostitution.

SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.

In reply to Dr. CLARK (Caithness),

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand,

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

Westminster) said, that whether he should move the adjournment of the House on Thursday or Friday depended entirely on the pleasure of the House. If it were to be on Thursday, it must be understood that the Government Business would be disposed of, and that the Motion would be made at a late hour, and agreed to without discussion. If not, and the Motion was to be made on Friday, it would be necessary to have a Morning Sitting on that day. It would be necessary to take a Vote on Account before the adjournment on Thursday.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY TO THE LORD LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND BILL.

(Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Arthur Balfour, Mr. Jackson.)

[BILL 201.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Office not to disqualify for seat in Parliament).

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, he rose to move an Amendment to this clause, which empowered the Treasury and the Lord Lieutenant to provide a salary for the additional Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. He objected altogether to the proposal to establish and endow what he believed to be an useless and unnecessary Office, and he proposed to strike out what he regarded as the essential words of the clause, the words "to be" in order to raise the whole question again, as he considered the vote taken on the second reading was not taken on the merits, or perhaps, he should say, on the demerits of the Bill, but was taken rather for personal reasons on account of the personal and political controversial points which were introduced into the discussion. This was not the first time that a Bill had been dealt with in this way. A Bill of a very similar character was brought in in 1884, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers). In that Bill there were proposed annuities to Lord Wolseley and Lord Alcester. The House then allowed the second reading of the Bill to take place, because they thought it would be a disparagement to those officers if the Bill were opposed on the second reading, but immediately the Bill was set down for Committee the hon. Member for Staffordshire put down an Amendment to strike out the word "annuity" and thus raised the whole principle of the Bill. The Government opposed the Amendment for some time, but afterwards finding that the feeling in the House was strongly against the measure, they withdrew it. He did not believe there was ever a stronger feeling on all sides of the House against a Bill than there was against this Bill. He believed that nearly every Member sitting on the Opposition side of the House looked upon it as a most objectionable measure from every possible point of view, and he did not believe there was the slightest support of it on the other side, but that hon. Members opposite would gladly have got rid of it long ago if they could have done so. What was the case for this new Office? Did the Lord Lieutenant require any further assistance in Dublin? What were the duties which the Lord Lieutenant and the Attorney General for Ireland had to do which they could not now perform? These gentlemen were always resident in Dublin, neither of them had any Parliamentary work, they had not to take journeys to and from London, they had no Cabinet meetings to attend, they had the whole of their time at their own disposal to do the work of their respective offices. The present Lord Lieutenant was in a much better position than his Predecessor, because the Lord Chancellor of Ireland was a Cabinet Minister, and he could, with all the responsibility of a Cabinet Minister, not only assist in the Government of Ireland, but he could go over to London and move Bills, or take part in the debates in the House of Lords. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) told them that he required assistance in that House. Now, he (Mr. Heneage) believed that no Irish Secretary was ever in a better position than his right hon. Friend. The right hon. Gentleman had very little to trouble him in Dublin; indeed, he hardly ever went there.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman's Amendment upon the Paper does not appear to prevent the creation of the Office, but provides that the salary shall be paid out of moneys already provided by Parliament for the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary. If that is the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment, he must direct his argument to it.

MR. HENEAGE said, that, of course, he would bow to the Chairman's ruling; but he imagined that the question before them was whether the Under Secretary was worth the salary which was proposed to be given to him. He maintained that the country would derive no benefit whatever from the payment of this salary. He proposed to show that there would be no work for the Under Secretary to do; because those Ministers who were already doing the work, or ought to be doing the work were perfectly competent to perform that work. If that line of argument were out of Order, of course he must depart from it; but he did not see how it was possible for him to prove that the salary was not required unless he proved that the Office itself, to a certain extent, was not required also. He asserted that the Chief Secretary for Ireland was not only in as good a position to perform his duties, but in a better position to do that than any of his Predecessors; because he had very few journeys to Ireland to undertake in comparison, for instance, with the late Mr. Forster; because he had no heavy legislation on hand, and because the hours during which the House sat had been considerably curtailed.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I must point out to the right hon. Gentleman that he must speak to his own Amendment. He proposes that the salary of the Parliamentary Under Secretary shall be taken out of the salaries of the Lord Lieutenant, and the Chief Secretary. It is not pertinent to that to argue the question of the creation of the Office.

MR. HENEAGE said, that he was in great difficulty as to how to argue the question; because, if he could not argue that there was no work for the Under Secretary to do, he must admit that every man was worthy of his hire, and so he was bound to admit that the salary ought to be paid. Perhaps the best course he could take under the circumstances was not to move the present Amendment, but to wait until the end of the clause, and move to omit the clause entirely.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) said, that he agreed with the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Heneage), and he felt justified in making a proposal to him, which was that he should stick to his Amendment. As he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) understood the ruling of the Chairman, they were not entitled to discuss the creation of the Office of Under Secretary, but they were entitled to discuss whether the Under Secretary should be paid by means of a new demand upon the Exchequer, or paid out of funds already at the disposal of the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary. He would take up the argument which the right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to enforce upon the House—namely, that the present Chief Secretary for Ireland was so sparsely employed as compared with his Predecessors that it would only be decorous in him, not to say, generous, if he gave up so much of his salary as would pay for the employment of the new Under Secretary. He had said that the present Chief Secretary was less employed than previous Chief Secretaries, but he did not intend to make any allusion to the tenure of Office of his right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) who probably would take part in the debate, and would be better able to speak concerning his own period of Office. But he would point to the example of the late Mr. Forster; he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) was a very fierce opponent of the late Mr. Forster, but at the same time he did not think there was ever a public servant more devoted to the discharge of his duties. What did the late Mr. Forster do compared with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour)? He was here at Question time almost invariably, and the Questions then were very different to the Questions now; in those days there were 10 Questions put to every one asked now. The right hon. Gentleman had a much more disturbed Ireland to deal with than the present Chief Secretary, and he was interrogated constantly as to the administration of the Coercion Act then in force; whereas the present Chief Secretary was shocked if even a couple of hours were occupied, as there were to-night, in discussing the merits or demerits of the imprisonment of a Member of Parliament. The late Mr. Forster attended to business in Ireland;

but one of the most remarkable things about the present Chief Secretary was the absolute want of attention on his part to the duties of his Office in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman never took an opportunity of going to Ireland in order to remove a certain small proportion of that gigantic ignorance under which he laboured. He did not say that the right hon. Gentleman should go to Ireland while the House was sitting, though he might remark that the late Mr. Forster went no less than 13 times in the course of half a single Session, and in spite of the enormous work he had to do in the House of Commons. But the right hon. Gentleman opposite did not go to Ireland during the Session, neither did he go to Ireland during the vacation. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) saw it announced in the public Press that the right hon. Gentleman was going to spend the forthcoming vacation by the sounding sea. That might be a very pleasant way of spending the vacation to the right hon. Gentleman, but he thought that the right hon. Gentleman would be better discharging his duties if he would go to the country over which he was at the present moment almost as supreme as if he were appointed by the Russian Autocrat as Governor General. The right hon. Gentleman received a very large salary indeed; £5,000 a-year was an extremely good salary, and it was a salary which very few other Ministers of the Government got. Everybody knew that £5,000 a-year was confined to one or two Secretaries, like the Colonial Secretary, the Foreign Secretary, and the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Under these circumstances, he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) thought the right hon. Gentleman might very well afford to cut out of his salary £1,000 or £1,200 a-year for the benefit of the Gentleman who discharged his duties; duties which were discharged by all his Predecessors, but which he was either too lazy or too unwilling to discharge himself. If the right hon. Gentleman were a poor man, he could quite understand his opposing this Amendment, but the right hon. Gentleman was well known to be a man of wealth.—[Mr. A. J. BALFOUR dissented.]—Well, he would regard the right hon. Gentleman's income as establishing the title of wealthy; but, perhaps, his (Mr. T. P. O'Connor's) tastes were humbler and more modest than the right hon. Gentleman's, certainly he would very willingly exchange incomes with the right hon. Gentleman. But his point was that the right hon. Gentleman was what modest people regarded as a man of considerable substance and wealth; he was also, so at least his friends were always saying, a patriot; being a patriot he could afford to do all his work for nothing. But he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) did not make so heroic a proposal as that, but he thought that under all the circumstances, they might confidently look forward to the right hon. Gentleman following into the Lobby the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage).

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, after the word "moneys," to leave out the word "to be," and insert the word "now."—(Mr. Heneage.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'to be' stand part of the Clause."

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) said, he did not propose to follow the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) in his strictures upon the excessive salary paid to the Chief Secretary. To do so would perhaps be unbecoming in one who had been Chief Secretary, but he intended to vote for the Amendment of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Heneage). The salary of the Chief Secretary did not appear to be at all in excess when they considered the harassing duties the Chief Secretary had to perform, and when they considered the conditions under which he lived in London or in Dublin. But there was an officer of the Irish Establishment whose salary and allowances were well capable of diminution if the creation of another Office required remuneration. The salary and allowances of the Lord Lieutenant were, no doubt, on a scale entirely out of proportion either to the duties of the Office or to the condition in the matter of wealth of the country over which he governed. It had always seemed to him (Mr. John Morley) to be one of the most extraordinary things connected with the Government of Ireland that the Lord Lieutenant should be remunerated as if he were ruling one of the richest, instead of one of the poorest, parts of the dominions of the Crown. Therefore, he was fully of opinion that if it were necessary to create this Office, and into that question the Chairman would not allow them to enter—if it were necessary to create this Office, the emoluments which the Parliamentary Under Secretary might claim ought to be provided from the resources already at the disposal of the Lord Lieutenant. The expensiveness of the Irish Establishment was one of the scandals of our Administration. In the judicial Establishment, and in nearly every branch of the Irish Establishment the expenditure was enormously in advance of the requirements of the Public Service; and it was, it appeared to him, an aggravation of the existing scandal, which had for many years been recognized on both sides of the House—it was an aggravation of that scandal to create a new Office, and to apportion to it a salary. He would be out of Order in referring to another Bill which they were to discuss, probably at a later period of the evening, but they could not forget that by that other Bill a still further aggravation was to be made of the charges of the Irish Establishment. There were two Bills before them to-night, each of which very largely, very considerably, added to an expenditure which was already admitted to be, as he had said, of the nature of an administrative scandal. As they could not secure the rejection of the proposal for creating this Office, the next best thing they could do was to vote for the proposal which would at least protect the public Treasury from an increased demand upon it for the remuneration of a public officer, whom they regarded as entirely superfluous and unnecessary. That being his view, he should certainly support the Amendment of his right hon. Friend.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.) said, that as he understood the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, he approved of one-half of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) and not of the other half. The Amendment consisted of two parts, one of which proposed to mulct the salary of the Chief Secretary, and the other to mulct the salary of the Lord Lieutenant for the purpose of providing the salary for the new official.

MR. HENEAGE said, that what he proposed was, that the salary should be paid out of monies now provided by Parliament for the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary. Therefore, the salary of the new Office might be taken out of either one or the other, or both.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Heneage) proposed to cut down the salary of both the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary, but he understood the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. J. Morley) to restrict this mulcting process to the salary of the Lord Lieutenant. The Amendment, however, would not carry that out, because the salary of the Lord Lieutenant was not voted by Parliament, but came out of the Consolidated Fund. The Amendment, therefore, would require to be entirely recast, in order to carry out the object which the right hon. Gentleman who moved it had in view. He would, however, leave that point to go to the substance of the Amendment. Now, the salary proposed to be given to the Under Secretary was not an addition, as some Members supposed, of £1,500 a-year to the cost of the Irish Establishment. The new burden thrown on the Irish Establishment would be £300 a-year, because they took power, in a latter clause of the Bill, to abolish an Office which now cost £1,200 a-year. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne went on to say that the cost of the Irish Administration had long been a scandal. Let him (Mr. A. J. Balfour) remind the House that if the cost of the Irish Establishment was at one time excessive, or was even now excessive, it was far less excessive than it used to be. In other words, the amount of work thrown on the Irish Administration was enormously greater now than it was at the time when these salaries were fixed. He apprehended that no one would doubt that. There was a well known story told of Mr. Horsman, who was Chief Secretary about 30 years ago, but never found it necessary to go to the office at all. He declared he had nothing to do in his office, and lounged down to the House, and had, practically, an extremely easy time of it. He (Mr. A. J. Balfour) was not sure that at that time the salary was not even greater than at present; at any rate, it was higher in the earlier part of the century. No one would say that the Chief Secretary was not, at that moment, a tolerably hard worked official. Of course, he could not please the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor). The hon. Gentleman was unhappy when he (Mr. A. J. Balfour) was in London, and he was unhappy when he was in Ireland; when he was here the hon. Gentleman regretted that he was not in Ireland; and when he was in Ireland the hon. Gentleman regretted he was not in England. He was sorry he could not oblige the hon. Gentleman by being in the two places at one time; but he did not think that the hon. Gentleman, even in his higher flights of eloquence, would go the length of saying that the Office of Chief Secretary was not a tolerably hard worked Office. Leaving the question of the salary of the Chief Secretary, and leaving the general question of the cost thrown on the Irish Establishment, which he had shown was extremely small—namely, £300 a-year, he came to the main point urged by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne, which was that the new salary should be taken out of the salary of the Lord Lieutenant. The right hon. Gentleman said, was that not an enormous salary, considering the Lord Lieutenant was Governor of a poor country. He (Mr. A. J. Balfour) frankly admitted—he had never concealed it from the House before, and he did not conceal it now—that the whole question of the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland was one which might at the proper time require revision. He was far from considering that that was a closed question; but let not the House make a mistake—it was rather a big question, and they could not at one stroke of the pen abolish the Lord Lieutenant's Office. It was an immemorial Office, around which there had collected an incrustation of duties, social and otherwise, which they could not destroy at a blow without making a great social revolution—well, he would not say a great social revolution, but a social revolution on a scale which made anyone hesitate before he engaged in it.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

The right hon. Gentleman described the salary of the Lord Lieutenant as an excessive and an enormous salary, but it entirely depended upon what they expected the Lord Lieutenant to do. If they expected the Lord Lieutenant to do that which all Lord Lieutenants had always done up to this time, as Lord Aberdeen and Lord Spencer had done—he would not go through the long list of distinguished men who had filled the Office—then he contended that the salary evidently was not an excessive one, but was an extremely meagre salary. Everyone who knew the facts knew that the Lord Lieutenant was not only out of pocket, but enormously out of pocket always. [An hon. MEMBER: What about Lord Abercorn?] He did not believe there had ever been a Lord Lieutenant, certainly there had not been one within his experience, who did not lose money by being Lord Lieutenant. Much as the salary of £20,000 might appear to the Committee, and much as the salary, no doubt, was, he was sure there had been many years in which the Lord Lieutenant had spent out of pocket another £20,000. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Yes, he did not exaggerate in the least when he said that. Therefore, when the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. John Morley) said that the Lord Lieutenant had too big a salary, he was pointing to a revolution which would abolish the Lord Lieutenant as they had always known him. This Bill was a much humbler measure, and he asked the House to reject the Amendment, not because they thought that the Lord Lieutenant's Office must necessarily for ever be kept up at its present scale, but because the Bill did not deal with that Office, and the idea of getting £300 a-year out of the salary of the Lord Lieutenant in order to supply the deficiency caused by the salary of the Under Secretary seemed to be tinkering with a question which ought to be dealt with in a very different spirit by the House. He hoped the House would reject the Amendment. He thought he had given reasons, not reasons wholly undeserving of consideration, why they should reject the Amendment and refuse in this Bill to touch the question of the Lord Lieutenant's salary, which was not voted by Parliament and which was a charge on the Consolidated Fund.

MR. JOHN MORLEY said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had said that this Bill would make an addition of £300 a-year. That would be true but for the latter part of the 2nd clause. The assumption of the right hon. Gentleman was that one of the members of the Local Government Board would disappear, and that the Parliamentary Under Secretary would do his work.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he ought to have stated that the Bill would make no permanent addition.

MR. JOHN MORLEY said, that the Government took power to employ an Inspector, from time to time, if it should be necessary, and they said that such an Inspector should be paid an allowance or salary such as the Lord Lieutenant might think fit. Unless he was very uncharitable to Dublin Castle, that Inspector would be very soon found to be wanted, and that allowance or additional salary would be very soon proposed by the Lord Lieutenant, and assented to by the Treasury. He could not assent to the statement that there would only be the difference between £1,500 and £1,200 a-year.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) thought the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) had made a very sensible and practical proposal to the Government. He was very glad the right hon. Gentleman had stuck to his guns, though he had been disappointed in the delivery of his speech, with which he intended to support the proposal. The object of the Amendment was to provide that the salary of the Under Secretary should be paid out of the moneys provided by Parliament, or out of the salary fixed for the Lord Lieutenant, which was at the present time a charge on the Consolidated Fund. He should hope to show that, in his and his hon. Friend's opinion, at least, there was ample ground for the Amendment proposed, and ample room enough, both in the salaries and allowances of the Lord Lieutenant and of the Chief Secretary, to take out the little slice wanted for the patronizing job of the Government in creating an Office for their pet, the forthcoming

Under Secretary for Ireland. The Lord Lieutenant received a salary of £20,000 a-year. He supposed it would not be very generous to say the Lord Lieutenant did not earn such a salary; but, certainly, to their mind, he did not, even having regard to the ornamental dignity supposed to be attached to the Office of the Lord Lieutenant. They believed that a salary far less than £20,000 a-year would meet the exigencies of the case. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. A. J. Balfour) had remarked that Lord Lieutenants spent in entertainments £20,000 a-year in addition to their salary. Granting the truth of that statement, whom did the Lord Lieutenant entertain and feast? Let anyone look at the list of those who partook of the Lord Lieutenant's entertainment and hospitality, and they would find that they were such men as Mr. Hamilton, who had sent the Speaker a letter that evening, and men of that class who were known for their antipathy to the Irish people. Something had been said by the Chief Secretary in regard to the duties of the Lord Lieutenant. In mercy's name they ought to talk common sense when talking of these things. What duty had the Lord Lieutenant to perform? He had merely to register whatever was the policy which the Chief Secretary for Ireland wished to put forward as the mouthpiece of the Cabinet. They never heard of the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland having an opinion of his own in regard to the government of Ireland. His most onerous duties seemed to be to engage in the game of golf, or to indulge in that manly English game of cricket, or to have his photograph taken in one of the principal streets of the City of Dublin. If the Government thought such duties worth £20,000 a-year, he (Mr. Harrington) and his hon. Friends did not; they believed that out of that £20,000 a slice might be taken for the salary of the Office which it was now wished to create. He could not now enter into the question of the propriety of creating that Office, that had been justly ruled out of Order; but he might say that they were totally against the creation of the Office, and that was the justification of the demand that the salary of the new official should not be made a burden upon the taxpayer. It was said that the Lord Lieutenant lost by the very lavish hospitality he indulged in. He (Mr. Harrington) did not think that the history of the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland would bear that statement out. But even if the present Lord Lieutenant had dispensed something over his £20,000, he received dignity and status and office in return for it, and could save in his rents. It was a well-known fact in the North of Ireland that the proclamation of the Plan of Campaign in Ireland was issued the very day after the present Lord Lieutenant's tenants had announced their intention of combining for the protection of themselves, and that was a scandalous fact that might claim the serious attention of the Executive Officers of the Irish Government. Now, turning to the Chief Secretary, they found that he had a salary of £4,225 a-year. They considered that the duties of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Balfour) were not very serious duties, but that such as they were, they were to be considerably lightened by the Bill. What did the Bill propose to do? It was proposed by the Bill to give power to transfer from the Chief Secretary to the Under Secretary the privilege of signing certain documents, and performing certain functions which would altogether lighten the burdens of the duties of the Chief Secretary. It was very hard to dissociate the two lines of argument, one of which was not in Order, and which applied to the necessity or non-necessity for the introduction of this measure, and the other which applied to the payment of the salary of the Office being made out of the moneys provided for the Chief Secretary and the Lord Lieutenant, and for the reason, as he had said, that provision was made in the clauses of the Bill for the transference of duties to the Under Secretary which were now discharged by the Chief Secretary himself. He could not discuss the propriety of having those duties discharged by one whom he must describe as an underling, though he said that with all respect. As the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was to retain his salary intact, he ought to continue to perform his duties. Certainly, it was only fair to propose that if any of his duties were transferred or delegated to a new officer, that officer should fairly, in return for the functions he performed, receive a portion of the salary of the Chief Secretary, instead of the payment made to him being made a charge upon the public funds. What was the argument the right hon. Gentleman advanced that night? It was the argument always advanced in respect of Irish appointments. The Chief Secretary had said the Office would only entail a trifling additional expense. That argument had been time out of mind advanced in favour of offices created for those place hunters, who clung on a parasitical way to every Party in power. In the case of the appointment of Resident Magistrates, even of Judges, and of every other kind of official, the same argument had been used. New office after new office had been created. Day after day they had added to the expenditure of the Government of Ireland until the cost of that Government had become a scandal. Many items might be carved out of the Chief Secretary's office, which, put together, would make a very decent salary for the Parliamentary Under Secretary. Besides the Chief Secretary there was an Under Secretary, who was paid £2,500 a-year. There was the Assistant Under Secretary, Clerk of the Council, and Deputy Keeper of the Privy Seal, and he received £1,350 a-year. There were several principal clerks, and they got £1,825 a-year. There were first clerks and second clerks; and there was a washerwoman who was paid £15 a-year. He did not object to attention being paid to the sanitary arrangements of the office, because the office really required a lot of washing and renovating. There were allowances for cost of lighting, &c., and there were special allowances for the cost of the Chief Secretary's alternate residence in England and Ireland. He ventured to say that any man who had in his mind the intention of advancing economic reform in this House would support this Amendment, and he very much regretted that, on an occasion of this kind, when economy was in question, those hon. and right hon. Members, who from time to time asked such stinging Questions here, either about the pay of a sergeant in the Army, or some small matter of that kind, had not thought it worth while to attend to support the arguments of the Irish Members. He regretted very much that those pioneers of reform to whom he had referred were not in their places to support the proposal of that reform which was now under discussion. It was a scandal to the people of Ireland to ask Parliament for this peddling sum, when they paid the Lord Lieutenant £20,000 for indulging in the recreation of cricket, or walking down to the establishment of some particular photographer in Dublin, and getting his picture taken for the purpose of sending it round as that of a landlord who had "protected himself" from the Plan of Campaign, by getting it proclaimed throughout Ireland at the very time that his tenantry had adopted it. It was no wonder to him (Mr. E. Harrington) that the Government from time to time thought it their duty to bring forward such measures as this. Poor as they were in Ireland they might somehow scrape together this £1,200 as a salary for the Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, if only for the purpose of showing the English people how well the English Parliament diverted itself from its legitimate purpose for supporting a man who had a rent roll of £40,000 a-year, at a time when there was no need for the creation of the new Office. It could be easily pointed out to the Government how they could make up the salary of this new official out of the present swollen allowances made for the purpose of carrying on the Irish Government. It could be easily pointed out to them how this salary could be made up out of scraps and odds and ends. The Government would not go in that direction, however, although they would find no difficulty in obtaining what they wanted without saddling the taxpayers with any further burden. He felt that there was a great deal to be said upon this question, but he did not like to occupy the time of the Committee unduly. He believed it would tax the legal ingenuity of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Madden), and when he used the word "ingenuity," he intended it in no disrespectful sense, for he was glad to recognize that the hon. and learned Gentleman always met them very fairly in these matters—to find out a defence for this burden of £300 even, which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary told them was the whole sum to be taken out of the public purse in regard to this new Office. But even this £300 need not be taken out of the National pocket. The whole £1,200 could be saved without derogation to Public Business, simply by not rigging up as a national cock-shy in Ireland this broken down landlord for all Irishmen to be constantly throwing at him as a living example of all that is abominable in the Irish governmental system.

Mr. Edward Harrington

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Dublin, College Green) said, before a Division was taken, he should like to say a few words in support of the Amendment before the House. The new Office had been created, and now a new salary was about to be created for the Office. The Government of Ireland in proportion to the population of the country was one of the most costly in the whole world, and in spite of that fact it was now proposed—as he contended—to put a new and totally unnecessary burden upon it. If this new salary was to be attached to the new Office, in his opinion it ought to be paid out of the sums already allocated by Parliament for the Government of Ireland. He thought the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary might very fairly be expected to take out of their own large salaries the amount required to pay the Under Secretary if they considered it absolutely essential that this appointment should be made, and that a salary should be attached to it. He thought the people of Ireland would be somewhat surprised, and perhaps edified, at all this stickling on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite for salaries. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were wealthy men, and affected to be great patriots, and yet they were to be found on the Floor of this House of Commons night after night fighting this stiff, tough, protracted battle in the matter of salaries. He should not have been so much surprised at that if they had not from time to time treated with scorn and contempt the idea of getting any money whatever for the performance of public duties. It was not so long since these self-same Gentlemen who were so anxious about this salary question, and more particularly the Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, spoke with contempt of the secretaries of the National League branches who, he alleged, received salaries for their services. So far as he (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) was aware, no salaries were attached to those positions. It might be the case that in some particular districts the branches of the National League had determined for a while to allocate some remuneration to their secretary, but he was not aware of any specific instance in which that had been done. Even if such were the case, it was not for the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Colonel King-Harman) to speak in a tone of contempt and scorn of the men who received those small salaries. He certainly thought it was a public scandal that such a Gentleman as this should be endeavouring to extort this salary from the House of Commons and the British people. He said the British people, but, of course, the Irish people had to pay their share of the expense, and it was a wonder to him that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet was not ashamed of that fact. He (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) knew perfectly well that no secretary of the National League would take any petty remuneration if it was only to be obtained after such a continuous struggle as had been made on behalf of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. As a matter of fact, the whole system of government in Ireland was over-paid and over-manned. It was a system of corruption. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had lately told the public that his chief worry was in trying to deal with the numerous applicants for place and pay under the Government of Ireland. But now they saw him creating a new Office, and endeavouring to attach a new salary thereto without any necessity for the appointment. But even if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant did require assistance in getting through the work of his Office, it was only reasonable and fair, taking all the circumstances of the case into consideration, that he and the Lord Lieutenant should pay this drudge. The Lord Lieutenant had a magnificent salary appropriated to him by the Parliament of England, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was also in the enjoyment of a splendid salary for the duties he performed, and it was no excessive burden upon these Gentlemen to require them to subscribe between them the salary of their new assistant. The whole discussion did not redound to the credit either title of wealthy; but, perhaps, his (Mr. T. P. O'Connor's) tastes were humbler and more modest than the right hon. Gentleman's, certainly he would very willingly exchange incomes with the right hon. Gentleman. But his point was that the right hon. Gentleman was what modest people regarded as a man of considerable substance and wealth; he was also, so at least his friends were always saying, a patriot; being a patriot he could afford to do all his work for nothing. But he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) did not make so heroic a proposal as that, but he thought that under all the circumstances, they might confidently look forward to the right hon. Gentleman following into the Lobby the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage).

Mr. Edward Harrington

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, after the word "moneys," to leave out the word "to be," and insert the word "now."—(Mr. Heneage.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'to be' stand part of the Clause."

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) said, he did not propose to follow the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) in his strictures upon the excessive salary paid to the Chief Secretary. To do so would perhaps be unbecoming in one who had been Chief Secretary, but he intended to vote for the Amendment of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Heneage). The salary of the Chief Secretary did not appear to be at all in excess when they considered the harassing duties the Chief Secretary had to perform, and when they considered the conditions under which he lived in London or in Dublin. But there was an officer of the Irish Establishment whose salary and allowances were well capable of diminution if the creation of another Office required remuneration. The salary and allowances of the Lord Lieutenant were, no doubt, on a scale entirely out of proportion either to the duties of the Office or to the condition in the matter of wealth of the country over which he governed. It had always seemed to him (Mr. John Morley) to be one of the most extraordinary things connected with the Government of Ireland that the Lord Lieutenant should be remunerated as if he were ruling one of the richest, instead of one of the poorest, parts of the dominions of the Crown. Therefore, he was fully of opinion that if it were necessary to create this Office, and into that question the Chairman would not allow them to enter—if it were necessary to create this Office, the emoluments which the Parliamentary Under Secretary might claim ought to be provided from the resources already at the disposal of the Lord Lieutenant. The expensiveness of the Irish Establishment was one of the scandals of our Administration. In the judicial Establishment, and in nearly every branch of the Irish Establishment the expenditure was enormously in advance of the requirements of the Public Service; and it was, it appeared to him, an aggravation of the existing scandal, which had for many years been recognized on both sides of the House—it was an aggravation of that scandal to create a new Office, and to apportion to it a salary. He would be out of Order in referring to another Bill which they were to discuss, probably at a later period of the evening, but they could not forget that by that other Bill a still further aggravation was to be made of the charges of the Irish Establishment. There were two Bills before them to-night, each of which very largely, very considerably, added to an expenditure which was already admitted to be, as he had said, of the nature of an administrative scandal. As they could not secure the rejection of the proposal for creating this Office, the next best thing they could do was to vote for the proposal which would at least protect the public Treasury from an increased demand upon it for the remuneration of a public officer, whom they regarded as entirely superfluous and unnecessary. That being his view, he should certainly support the Amendment of his right hon. Friend.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.) said, that as he understood the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, he approved of one-half of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) and not of the other half. The Amendment consisted of two parts, one of which proposed to mulct the salary of the Chief Secretary, and the other to mulct the salary of the spirit of the times to compensate vested interests, and here, in view of this ultimate state of things which he pointed out, the Government were about to create a vested interest valued at £1,200 a-year. It came to this—that at some future day the Irish people might be called upon to pay compensation for the abolition of vested interests of which the emoluments of this Office would form no inconsiderable item. That was the reason why he maintained that the Irish Members should offer the most strenuous opposition to this proposal. If the Government took the salary of the new Under Secretary from the salary of the Lord Lieutenant or the Chief Secretary they would take away from the Irish Members this argument. On the other hand, whilst they persisted in the proposal to pay this out of the public funds they gave the Irish Members the best reason for opposing the Bill. A short time ago the House seemed to have entered on a season of economy. From the number of Committees sitting upstairs day after day investigating public Departments, it would seem as though they had entered upon a season of great economy. They were investigating the administration of the Army; they were investigating the affairs of the Navy; and they were investigating Civil Service affairs; but he would ask the Committee, and he would also ask the people of this country, where were the economists from the Benches opposite—what were they doing? These Gentlemen, by speeches in that House, and by their action in Committee, were endeavouring to cut down the expenses of the administration of the country; but where were they to-night when an important matter affecting the economic administration of Ireland was under discussion? Why were they not in their places? For the reasons he had given he felt it his duty to give the most determined opposition to the manner in which it was sought to pay this new Office of Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and to render his support, by speech and vote, to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said, he certainly regretted that on an occasion like the present, after the great opposition the Bill had met with at that stage, that hon. Gentlemen who were always preaching about economy, did not endeavour to practise what they preached. The hon. Gentleman the Member for South Tipperary (Mr. John O'Connor) had mentioned a point known to all of them—namely, that a number of Committees dealing with all manner of economical conundrums were sitting upstairs. While these efforts at economy were apparently being made, what were the Government trying to do at the present moment? Were they anxious to see the expenditure on the Army and the Navy curtailed, and various extravagances put an end to, in order that they might be able to establish sinecures such as that involved in the present Bill? It was not often that he had to praise a Liberal Secessionist; but he recognized that it was with that House as it had been with the Cities of the Plain—if only one good man had been found in them the cities might have been saved. At any rate, he hailed as an omen that there were a few such good men above the Gangway on that (the Opposition) side of the House, who seemed anxious to follow in the right way. Hon. Gentlemen who had hitherto opposed the Representatives of the Irish nation in trying to obtain for their country, as it was their duty to do, justice and fair play, were beginning to see that, after all, there was something to be said for the efforts of those Members. There was some hope for the situation at the present time, when some of those hon. Members above the Gangway were beginning to show that they were not so impervious to argument and reason as would seem from what happened in the past. The Amendment moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) was, practically speaking, an attack upon a job. As the House was entrusted with the care of the public money, and it certainly was its business to try in every case and on every possible occasion to discourage a job, and especially to discourage a job when that job was perpetrated by the Representatives of a class against the wishes of a majority of the people. That was practically the case in the present instance. Ordinarily the House had to vote away immense sums of money at a late hour of the night. He had seen from those Benches enormous sums of money voted away without a single protest being made, and notably without a single protest being made by any hon. or right hon. Gentleman opposite. Of course, he knew very well that in the past, when money had been voted, it was mostly by a Liberal Government; and that at those times hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, who paid very little attention to the voting away of public money to-day, sat on the Opposition side of the House, and had a great deal to say against such payments. In the days of which he spoke, the right hon. Gentleman the present Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) was, he might say, a champion obstructionist. At any rate, if hon. Members opposite had forgotten the interest they took in economy, it was not for the Irish Members to do so, especially in the present case, when there were many other reasons for resisting the Government proposal. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary declared that it was necessary that he should have assistance in carrying on the government of Ireland under the Lord Lieutenant. Well, but it was very little they saw of the right hon. Gentleman in Ireland. When he did go to that country he disappeared amongst the ranks of the policemen. He was very brave, very plucky, no doubt; but he was lost amongst the police, and disappeared into Dublin Castle directly he got amongst the Irish people. They wished him joy of his associations. The right hon. Gentleman was anxious to increase the number of his associations; and by all means let him do it, if he did it at his own expense. If he wished for a satellite to revolve around him, by all means let him have it, but do not let him perpetrate a job in order to effect his object. Let him pay the Gentleman who was to act as his shield and buckler himself. The Gentleman was for his own protection and convenience and glorification; therefore, let him pay him himself. When a servant was necessary, he (Dr. Tanner) did not begrudge that servant a salary. Every public servant, even the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary himself, had money coming to him in a legitimate manner. The right hon. Gentleman, of course, had to be paid just like a housemaid or a cook. He did not grudge the money to the right hon. Gentleman, but he did grudge the money which it was proposed to pay under this Bill. He did protest against the right hon. Gentleman being generous before he was just. He objected to the right hon. Gentleman putting his hand into the public purse in order to subsidize his private satellite. The proposal in the Bill was absolutely unfair, and would not commend itself, he felt sure, even to a number of hon. Gentlemen opposite. Many hon. Gentlemen would say that, even as a matter of common sense, it was desirable that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary should pay the occupant of the new Office out of his own pocket, or, at any rate, that he should be paid by the Lord Lieutenant. If the right hon. Gentleman did not feel himself called upon to pay this £1,200 a-year, then let the amount be given out of the salary of the Lord Lieutenant. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had stated to-night that the Lord Lieutenant always spent double the salary he received—which was £20,000 a-year—during his term of Office. Well, as far as he (Dr. Tanner) was aware of the facts in connection with the expenditure of most of the Tory Lord Lieutenants of Ireland, he could assure the Committee that they always tried to do things in the cheapest possible way. In the case of the present Lord Lieutenant, every penny he could spend out of Ireland he spent in that way, and that had been the case with all Lord Lieutenants in recent times, with the exception, perhaps, of Lord Spencer. Instead of spending their money, and £20,000 a-year in addition, they tried to save all they could. Why did the Lord Lieutenant spend £20,000 a-year in addition to his income?

Mr. J. O'Connor

An hon. MEMBER: What does he spend it on?

DR. TANNER: Yes; what did he spend it on? If the present Lord Lieutenant spent that amount, it was on bookmakers and on promoting the game of cricket. It was all very well to try to cram those innuendoes, those chimerical ideas of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, down the throats of the English public and of Gentlemen who sat in that House; but anyone who was at all acquainted with the facts as they existed in the City of Dublin was perfectly aware that those ideas existed only and totally in the brain of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. Again, he must regret that hon.

Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, who went in for preaching economy, were not in the House at that moment. He very much regretted that the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill), who had tried to keep down expenditure in connection with the great spending Departments of the State, was not in his place. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had said that the amount in dispute was only a small amount—was only a little affair; and that reminded him (Dr. Tanner) of the story in Midshipman Easy, where the baby was stated to be only a little one, and being a little one it had to be accepted as it was given. As was the case with the baby in Midshipman Easy, this Vote was illegitimate, and the fact of its being a little one did not render it any the more acceptable. The moneys which were at present provided by Parliament ought to be amply sufficient for the government of Ireland. If the charge proposed in the present Bill were admitted, they would simply be creating a precedent for the establishment of further posts, and a precedent for converting unpaid posts, into which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary placed his personal friends, into paid offices. He regarded this proposal not only as the creation of a sinecure for the enjoyment of a Member on the opposite side of the House, but an attempt, by patronage and bribery, to corrupt a nation which had always defied the insidious attempts made upon them by Gentlemen in the position of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. [Laughter.] The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary laughed that dulcet laugh which was peculiar to him. It was always refreshing to hear that laugh; but he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that this was no laughing matter. It would be no laughing matter to the right hon. Gentleman if he had to put his hand into his own pocket in order to pay his subordinate out of it. The right hon. Gentleman himself was paid practically for laughing at the country which he had, to a very large extent, to administer. But the subject under discussion was no laughing matter. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman) was to be paid by private individuals, or was to be paid in any shape except out of the public purse, there would be no objection raised either to the creation of the post or to the payment of the individual; but what was objected to was the method by which it was proposed that the Under Secretary should be paid. With brute force, the Government could do anything, no doubt. The right hon. Gentleman might laugh, and might be able to gain his point, no doubt; but still, if the Government insisted upon doing this insensate thing, it was the duty of the Irish Members to point out that they were doing what was wrong and unjust, though the act would be thoroughly characteristic of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary.

Dr. Tanner

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.) said, that having listened to the debate so far as it had gone, he could not help thinking that this was a most gross job that was being attempted by the Government, and he was extremely glad to think that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) had found a limit beyond which he would not go in sanctioning the perpetration of a job. It looked to him (Mr. Illingworth) like a case where a post had been made for a man—not a man found for a post. Although they were precluded, by the stage they had arrived at on the Bill, from saying whether the payment was necessary or not, if it were necessary they might ask who was to be relieved of the duties that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet was going to discharge? It could not be contended that the Lord Lieutenant would be relieved from any of the onerous duties which pressed upon him, and he hardly thought that when the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet returned they would find him doing much work as a Local Government Commissioner in Ireland; and he looked upon the suggestion made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary as hardly credible—that was, that after the passing of this Bill there would, in the course of time, be a Commissioner the less in Ireland, and that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet, the Assistant Under Secretary, would be expected to do some work in that direction. They had been reminded by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) that provision was made that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet should not be over-burdened with duties in that direction. Provision was made in the Bill that when one of the Commissioners of the Local Government Board retired a successor would not be appointed, and there were words in italics in the Bill which showed that it would be open to fill the place rather than make some extraordinary proposal for the discharge of the duties by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet in the future. He (Mr. Illingworth) should like to ask this question—whether the duties of the Office of Chief Secretary were at this moment heavier than they had been under such Chief Secretaries as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne and his late lamented Friend and Colleague, Mr. Forster? The right hon. Gentleman the present Chief Secretary would hardly say that the duties of his Office were more onerous than they were at the time those Gentlemen held the Office. The right hon. Gentleman did not deny that Ireland saw very little of his presence in discharge of the peculiar duties that belonged to the Chief Secretaryship. It might be that for personal reasons the right hon. Gentleman was entitled to some consideration. It might be that being a Scotchman, and knowing very little of Ireland, and not liking Ireland or the Irish, it was desirable to relieve himself as much as possible from the disagreeable duties inseparable from his Office; but, if that were so, a case was clearly made out by that admission for the right hon. Gentleman sharing his salary with the person who was going to share his duties and to relieve him from a great deal of that which was so disagreeable. Certainly, no case had been made out for casting such a charge as this on the whole country. There was a cry for economy in fashion in the country at this moment, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary himself had been obliged to admit that the present method of governing Ireland could not go on for very long—that there must be a change before long, even involving the reconstitution of the Lord Lieutenantcy of that country, and the right hon. Gentleman had hinted that that change would bring about with it a social revolution, if the right hon. Gentleman's words could be so qualified. Well, if that were the case, he (Mr. Illingworth) thought they had a right to expect that during the short time the present state of things existed—the present doomed order of things—the right hon. Gentleman might himself have been content to continue in discharge of the whole of the duties of his Office. It was one of those things which they were ordinarily called upon in the House of Commons to resent—that there should be a new prominent appointment made at the time when it was admitted that the whole system of which that appointment was a part was about to undergo a thorough reconstruction. On this principle it was clearly their duty to resist the present proposal, when it was admitted that the system of government in Ireland was in a state of transition. It seemed to him (Mr. Illingworth), as he had already said, that the Office had been made for the man, and that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet had received this appointment as a sop, because, in the course of certain relationships, certain misfortunes had happened to him in connection with Ireland. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had been banished from Ireland as a Representative, and forced to take refuge in another country; and, forsooth, for that reason, they had the right hon. Gentleman who held the principal Office under the Lord Lieutenant as a Scotchman proposing that he should be assisted by another Gentleman who had been banished by his countrymen, and was about the most unpopular man in the whole of Ireland. All this, no doubt, would be as a cap thrown against the wind; but there was certainly evidence in the House on that (the Opposition) side to a spirit of fair play in dealing with Irish questions. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby upon the manly stand he had taken against the proposal made by the Government, and he trusted that the country would recognize that this proposal of the Government was a job from first to last, looked at in any aspect—either regarded as a personal matter so far as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet was concerned, or as an attempt to give relief to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. There was no justification whatever for this attempt to burden the country with increased expenditure, and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby would not be singular amongst his political Friends in voting against the Bill.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) said, there was one thing he had expected in the course of this debate, and that was that they should be told by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. A. J. Balfour) how he would define the difference between his own Office and that of the new Parliamentary Under Secretary. He (Mr. T. M. Healy) thought the Committee had a right to be told, in view of the fact that the right hon. Gentleman's own salary was £4,500 a-year, with residence, and that it was proposed to give the new Under Secretary £1,200 a-year, what the work of each Department would be respectively. As to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman) being a member of the Local Government Board in Ireland, he (Mr. T. M. Healy) submitted that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would be unable to attend to the duties, owing to the necessities of his Parliamentary functions. As a matter of fact, it would appear as if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet was simply intended to stand at the whipping post for his right hon. Colleague. At any rate, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary should give them some statement as to his opinion of the work the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet would have to do in connection with the Irish Local Government Board. Supposing that in the future a question should arise, and the Irish Members might wish to lay their finger upon a certain blot in the Irish Administration, how would they be able to make the Irish Parliamentary Under Secretary responsible for certain alleged evils in connection with the Local Government Board of Ireland, and then how would they be able to discriminate between the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant and the Parliamentary Under Secretary, and to say the Chief Secretary was responsible for this and the Under Secretary was responsible for that?

THE CHAIRMAN said, he desired to point out that the subject under discussion was not the necessity for the Office, but whether the money should be paid out of funds already provided by Parliament, or whether a fresh sum should be voted.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he bowed to the Chairman's ruling; but he submitted that on the question of the description of work for which the salary had to be paid would, to some extent, depend the view they took as to the manner in which the payment should be made. If they did not consider how the work was to be done in settling the payment, the salary might just as well be paid to the occupant of the new position out of consideration for his personal beauty, or for some other reason apart from his ability to do the work.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Question was whether Parliament should vote this money for the salary, or take it out of sums already voted.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, that was so, and what he was trying to point out was this—that supposing it was endeavoured to subtract the salary from that of the Chief Secretary, was that endeavour to be resisted on the ground of the amount of work the Chief Secretary had to do, and in the performance of which it was necessary for him to have an assistant? Would the right hon. Gentleman give the House a guarantee that his own personal attention would be directed to Irish affairs, and that the simple duty of reading answers would be entrusted to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet? The right hon. Gentleman would, of course, be anxious that a scandal should not be perpetrated in Ireland. If the right hon. Gentleman was to decide everything, then they might be disposed to agree to the extra salary; but he was bound to submit that if they were to be left solely at the mercy of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet—if to him was to be entrusted the real work of the government of Ireland—then the Government were not entitled to ask for payment of the additional salary out of the public purse, and was only fair to assert that one salary for the Office was adequate. He would ask the Government to tell the House exactly in what manner the work of the Office would be allotted, and then they would be in possession of the means of judging the reasonableness of the proposal.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. T. M. Healy) had asked how it was proposed to apportion the duties. The only possible answer was the one that was given in all similar cases. It was impossible to lay down beforehand exactly what duties should be done by the Chief and what should fall to the share of the subordinates of the Department. But the responsibility rested solely on the Chief, and no responsibility would fall on the shoulders of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet, any more than it fell on the shoulders of any other Under Secretary. The Chief Secretary for Ireland, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Home Secretary, and the Secretary of State for War, were alike responsible for the administration of their respective Departments; but it was impossible to convey to the House exactly what work was to be done by the Head of a Department, and what was to be done by his subordinates. The matter would be arranged between the right hon. and gallant Gentleman and himself; but he could assure his hon. and learned Friend that the responsibility would rest solely with him as the Head of the Department.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman a personal question. Let them take, for instance, the question of the appointment of Land Commissioners and of Resident Magistrates. Was the House to understand that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet was to have the power to make these appointments? That was a matter on which the Irish Representatives were very sensitive. For his (Mr. T. M. Healy's) own part, he did not care very much about the right hon. and gallant Gentleman giving the answers to certain Questions. Of course, there were Questions of a purely administrative character, such, for instance, as that of National Education, which did not concern Irish policy. He could very well understand such minor questions of detail being dealt with by an Under Secretary; but it was with regard to higher questions affecting the administrative policy—the appointments of Resident Magistrates and of Sub-Commissioners—that anxiety was felt. Was the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to continue to sit on the Privy Council, as he had done within the last six months with regard to a Bill rejected by that House which he supported, but which the Chief Justice of Ireland very properly scouted out of Court? Was he to be able to attend and act in that manner, and to speak with the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government? Surely the House was entitled to some fuller explanation?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked, what case was the hon. and learned Gentleman alluding to?

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Claremorris Tramway case?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was the spokesman of the Government on that occasion. His right hon. and gallant Friend would not occupy a position different from that held by any other Under Secretary. It was a position perfectly well understood in that House. The responsibility would rest with him (Mr. A. J. Balfour) entirely.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) said, he thought the House was pretty much in the same position now as prior to the right hon. Gentleman having volunteered his explanation, for they were still in the dark as to what duties would be performed by the Under Secretary. The principle of the Amendment before the House, as he understood it, was that the right hon. Gentleman, who had the privilege of calling the tune, should have the obligation of paying the piper; and the object of the Amendment was to provide that, instead of the salary of the Under Secretary coming out of the pockets of the ratepayers, it should be paid by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary himself, or, at any rate, by the officials who were to be relieved by the new appointment. The question had been raised whether the salary should be paid by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary or by the Lord Lieutenant. He (Mr. Maurice Healy) confessed that to him it was a matter of absolute indifference, and the decision was one which he was prepared, with the utmost confidence, to leave in the hands of Her Majesty's Government. No doubt, the salary of the Lord Lieutenant was of such a nature as, perhaps, to allow of such a paring down; but, perhaps, on the other hand, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would experience such relief that it would only be fair that he should pay for the assistance he was to receive. But, as he (Mr. Maurice Healy) had said before, that was a matter as to which they were absolutely indifferent. All they asked was that the salary should not come out of the pocket of the general taxpayer. Up to the present, no answer had been given to the arguments on which the Amendment was founded; nothing had been advanced to show that the business falling to the lot of the right hon. Gentleman opposite had so increased in amount as to render necessary the appointment of an assistant, and he could only urge that, when proposals of that kind were made, they should be made with full information as to the effect. It would, he thought, be very interesting if they could have a Return showing the amount of work now falling to the lot of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary as compared with what was done by his Predecessors. It would be interesting to have a Return, showing how many times the right hon. Gentleman had crossed the Irish Channel as compared with his Predecessors; but there did not seem to be any disposition on the part of the Government to supply hon. Members with information on which they might safely make up their minds on this question. It had pleased the Government on this, as on many other occasions, to throw the Bill on the Table of the House, and endeavour to pass it by the brute force of their majority. They did not condescend to give to the House anything which could reasonably be considered a justification for the course they had taken. The only sort of defence which had been made for this job—for such it might very properly be called—was that it would add very slightly to the burdens of the taxpayer. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had tried to make out that it would only add £300 a-year to the burdens of the taxpayer. But the device resorted to in order to bring about such a result made the Bill ten times more offensive than it otherwise would be. It was ridiculous to suggest that the new official who was to be appointed specially to do Parliamentary work in the House of Commons, who was, in the words of the Bill, "Parliamentary Under Secretary," would be in a position to do anything in the nature of serious work at the Irish Local Government Board. The right hon. Gentleman told them the other day, in a moment of frankness, that the Irish Local Government Board never met. If that was so, it would be very easy for the Parliamentary Under Secretary to do the work of supervising the Local Government Board. If all the work of the Board was done by the Secretary and under officials the Parliamentary Under Secretary would, no doubt, be able to discharge the duties of a member of the Board in an admirable manner. But if there were any serious duties to perform, it was idle to suggest that they could be efficiently performed by any person appointed for the purpose of doing Parliamentary work. For all these reasons, he contended that the Amendment before the Committee was a most proper Amendment. It was most cheering to find there was a point beyond which Liberal Unionism would not stretch. He trusted the Committee would find that the Member of the Liberal Unionist Party who had ventured to differ, to some extent, from the policy of Her Majesty's Government would not be left in the Division Lobby severely alone by his Colleagues.

MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford) said, that the Bill was one for the regulation of the Office of Parliamentary Under Secretary. The Under Secretary was to be paid a salary, and the question which was raised by the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) was whether the salary should be an additional burden upon the resources of the country. The first question which always arose when they were creating an additional office was whether the additional office was required. Therefore, they ought to have it made out most clearly by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) that there was a necessity for this Office. Had any such necessity been proved? It had not been proved by anything that had arisen in the House. It had not been proved by anything that had arisen out-of-doors. He had been very glad, indeed, to find the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman) standing up with that courage and pluck that so distinguished him to answer Questions which it might have been troublesome for the Chief Secretary to answer. He had been glad to find the somewhat irrelevant Questions put by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite for the purpose of troubling the Chief Secretary answered in a blunt, able way by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet; and to that extent he had recognized the advantage of having a butt, so to speak, between the Chief Secretary and hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite. To that extent the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had been useful, and to that extent he was deserving of the thanks of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. To that extent hon. Members sitting upon the Government side of the House ought to be thankful to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. Most sorry they were that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was absent now, and that, in consequence of illness, he was unable to defend himself against any aspersions which might be made upon him. But that was no reason why they, the Members of the House of Commons, should vote him the salary proposed. He wanted to hear from his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland a much better reason than had as yet been given why they should vote the salary proposed. He certainly should not vote that this salary should be paid to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, unless they heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary some better reason than had been given up to now for the creation of the Office—some better reason than had been given why some of the work which the country paid him for doing should be thrown upon the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, for which he should be paid a salary of £1,500 a-year.

Mr. Maurice Healy

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg) said, it seemed to him a somewhat invidious thing to appoint a servant, and then to refuse to pay him. If that were really the state of things, he should have no difficulty whatever in voting against the Amendment of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Heneage). But he thought they did not pay quite sufficient attention to the fact that this thing had been put upon them by slow—he was almost going to say crafty—degrees. In the first instance the appointment of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman) to the post which he now held was one that was very seriously questioned on the Opposition side of the House in April of last year. The Government were asked whether the appointment was not one which in the natural order of things would cause the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to seek re-election at the hands of his constituents, and it was said—“Oh, no: certainly not.” Why not? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would remember that he explained that the fact that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would not need to seek re-election arose from the circumstance that he was not to receive any salary. What did they find? They found that as the result of this nice little arrangement the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was to continue Under Secretary with a salary, and escape the test of merit—re-election by his constituents. He did not think that was an ordinary case of the House appointing a man to a post, and then being called upon to pay him; and it was because it did not appear to him that that matter had been conducted quite in accordance with precedent, and—if he might say good-humouredly—quite upon candid lines, that he thought they were justified in voting for the Amendment.

MR. T. P. GILL (Louth, S.) said, he would like to hear from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. A. J. Balfour) whether any limitation was to be put upon the tenure of Office by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, because there was nothing in the Bill, so far as he could make out, to prevent the appointment being a permanent one. The present Government might go out of Office the day after the right hon. and gallant Gentleman commenced to receive his salary: was there to be anything inserted in the Bill to provide that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman should quit Office at the same time? Furthermore, he would like to know whether it was necessary that the holder of the Office of Parliamentary Under Secretary should be a Member of the House of Commons? Suppose Parties changed sides, was it to be possible for the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to sit upon the Opposition side of the House and hold his Office? He (Mr. T. P. Gill) did not think there could be two opinions in the House, especially after the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Kingswinford Division of Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill), upon the question whether the salary of the Under Secretary could or ought to be provided out of moneys already granted for the Chief Secretary and the Lord Lieutenant. The whole House seemed to be agreed that, whatever might be said as to the necessity for this Office, the question of increasing the burdens of the taxpayer in order to pay a salary to the incumbent of the Office was one which could not willingly be entertained. Nothing could be said in defence of such a proposition. £24,500 was now paid in the shape of salaries to two Members of the Irish Government, and many of the duties discharged by those officials were to be discharged by the holder of the new Office. The very least which might be expected was that the salary of £1,500 for the Under Secretary should be paid out of the £24,500 now paid to the Chief Secretary and the Lord Lieutenant. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary could not deny that the impression—speaking broadly—which was originally left on the minds of hon. Members was that no burden would be placed on the taxpayer by the creation of this Office. He could very well understand the right hon. Gentleman setting up as a defence an explanation of his original statement that, although the new Office was to be a salaried one, it was not to be a salaried one in the sense that the taxpayer was to pay the burden. But the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary did nothing of the kind. Before they proceeded further, they ought, at least, to be satisfied as to the permanency or otherwise of the Office which the Bill created.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, he hoped that the Committee would now think it right to come to a decision. The Amendment had been discussed for two hours and a half, and he was sure the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) would agree with him that sufficient time had been occupied upon a question which was, at all events, limited in its scope. He, therefore, claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put accordingly, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 190; Noes 145: Majority 45.—(Div. List, No. 107.)

Question put, "That the words 'to be' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 191; Noes 183: Majority 8.—(Div. List, No. 108.)

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) said, he wished to move an Amendment which was not on the Paper, and of which he would give a few words of explanation. The Amendment in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) had reference to the salaries of the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary; but those salaries were provided from two sources. The salary of the Lord Lieutenant was taken from the Consolidated Fund, and that of the Chief Secretary only was voted in the Estimates. What he proposed to do was to insert before the word "provided" the word "annually," in order to secure that the question of this payment to the Parliamentary Under Secretary should annually come under the review of the House of Commons. This would secure that the money to be paid to the Under Secretary should come in the Estimates for the Chief Secretary's Office every year. Obviously this was a reasonable and necessary proposal in view of the fact that though the Bill was one regulating the Office of Parliamentary Under Secretary they had, as had been pointed out by the hon. Member for South Louth (Mr. T. P. Gill), had no guarantee that the holder of the salary would even for the most part of his time be a Member of the House at all. The Bill as drafted contemplated the Parliamentary Under Secretary as being a person who was not a Member of the

Mr. T. P. Gill

House, for in the 1st section the words were—

"The Office of Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant shall not render the person holding the same incapable of being elected."

So that holding the Office was considered as antecedent to his election. The official might, therefore, be a person not a Member of the House. What guarantee had they that not being a Member of the House he would not continue to hold this nominally Parliamentary appointment? As the hon. Member for South Louth had gone on to point out, there was no guarantee furnished in this Bill that although appointed nominally as Parliamentary Under Secretary the official appointed might not continue to hold the post, whether in that House or out of it, for the remainder of his natural life. Under those circumstances, it was reasonable that they should ask that the Vote for the Office should be annually submitted for revision at the hands of the House. He was afraid that if this provision were made according to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby, and the money provided by Parliament or to be provided hereafter from the Estimates was to be taken as sufficient for the purpose, they had no guarantee at all that the sum needed would be drawn from the salary of the Chief Secretary or anyone higher in Office. Everyone acquainted with the Civil Service was aware of this fact—that if it was desired to give any extra allowance or extra salary it was always possible to obtain the needful funds for the purpose, not by reducing the salary of any high-placed official, but by squeezing the lower ranks in the Office. They might very easily in this way get out of the Vote for the Chief Secretary's Office £1,000 or £2,000 a-year without in any way trenching on the salaries of the higher officials. Unfortunately they had no guarantee that if they provided £1,500 a-year out of the Vote for the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman) they would in any way diminish the inflated salaries of any of the higher officials of the Department, because he was sure that those who had the management of the Office would be able to scrape out of the salaries of writers and Lower Division clerks as much as would pay this demand. There was always ample margin amongst those small officials for the payment of such a salary as this. Therefore, it was absolutely necessary that this Bill should not only create the Office and provide for the payment of the occupant, but that the holder of the post and the conditions under which he held his Office should be brought from time to time under the consideration of the House, and the only way of doing that was by including the Vote in the annual Estimate. He proposed, therefore, to meet the need he had indicated by inserting before the word "provided," at the beginning of line 8, the word "annually."

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 8, after the word "provided," insert the word "annually." — (Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'annually' be there inserted."

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said, he entirely agreed in the view of the hon. Gentleman that this salary should be subject to annual revision by Parliament, and there was nothing in the Bill, as at present framed, which precluded such a course being taken. At present the salary of every Minister, every Secretary, and every Under Secretary was in the Votes, and he agreed that the salary of the Under Secretary in this case should be no exception to the rule; but the Amendment of the hon. Member opposite was entirely unnecessary. The hon. Member's object was already amply carried out.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said, he might, perhaps, point out that by refusing to accept the Amendment the Government were letting the cat out of the bag, because if they would turn to the next page of the Bill, they would find that, although the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman) might not be in the House, he might still be a member of the Irish Local Government Board, and that the Bill practically gave him a life appointment whether he was in the House or not. The Parliamentary Under Secretary for the time would, by virtue of his Office, be a member of the Local Government Board of Ireland, and then they had it that when a vacancy occurred in the Local Government Board no other person was to be put in it. In other words, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet would become the holder of a life appointment on the Irish Local Government Board. [Cries of "No, no!"] Well, if that was not so, why did not the Government make it clear? Supposing the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet did not care to become President of the Irish Local Government Board, the House conferred the position upon him whether he liked it or not, and what was there to compel the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to resign the Office when he had obtained it? Nothing whatever. He might say—"I hold my Office during good behaviour as other Members of the Board hold theirs." A new Lord Lieutenant might discharge—as he might do—Mr. George Morris or Sir Henry Robinson, both of whom held office during pleasure. It would be a monstrous thing if Mr. George Morris were to be turned out by an incoming Lord Lieutenant, and no doubt the case of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet would be looked upon in the same light. What was to prevent the Government, when the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet was put into this post, saying—"We have given him a life appointment in this Bill." What was the proof of that? Why, that Parliament with its eyes open, and knowing that there were three distinct members of the Local Government Board for Ireland appointed for life—or during pleasure—had replaced one of them by the Irish Under Secretary; and, as nothing at present compelled Sir William Kaye to go out of office with the Government, what would compel the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member of the Isle of Thanet to do so? Supposing the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet, on a change of Government taking place, were to put his foot down and say—"I will not go out." If, then, an incoming Government were to turn him out, the Tory Party would come down to the House and make a great noise, declaring that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had been turned out at the instance of the Nationalist Party because he was a landlord and had resisted their claims to Home Rule, and notwithstanding the fact that he had been appointed for life. He (Mr. T. M. Healy) submitted that, at any rate so long as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman remained a Member of the House of Commons, he could continue to hold this office under the Local Government Board of Ireland; and, that being so, the inclusion of this word "annual," as proposed by his hon. Friend, became a very important matter. The salary might be put upon the Consolidated Fund, and the House might have no opportunity of debating the arrangements of the office. The proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for East Donegal (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) had a backing of reasons to it; and, that being so, why did not the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary agree to the proposal? What harm could it do? The right hon. Gentleman could have no objection to it, unless there was something lurking under his refusal. It was admitted that the word could do no harm; then why not accept it? Looking at the fact that the Government had only carried the salary of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet by eight votes, and even then only under pressure of the clôtüre, it was not unreasonable that the Government should give at least this guarantee. The Government should bear in mind that they had only just, by the skin of their Liberal Unionist teeth, been able to carry the proposal for this salary.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he had thoroughly explained to the House that a Vote must be taken by Parliament for this salary, and that, therefore, this Amendment was unnecessary. If, under these circumstances, the Irish Members persisted in their demand, Heaven forbid that he should oppose their wishes. If they desired to put in a word wholly superfluous, and which was not put in other Acts of this kind creating offices of this description, he should offer no further objection. Of course, it had always been his desire to treat Ireland in the same way as England had been treated.

Question put, and agreed to; word inserted.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) said, in rising to move the next Amendment which stood in his name—that was to say, in line 13 of Clause 1, to leave out all after “voting” to the end of the clause, he was raising what he conceived to be an important Constitutional question, and he should consider it his duty to take the opinion of the Committee upon the proposal. The object of the words the omission of which he proposed was, of course, to relieve the person appointed to this Office from the necessity of presenting himself before his constituents for their verdict on his conduct since his election to the House. This question was first raised, he believed, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) on the 15th of April last year. On that occasion the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) asked a Question, with regard to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who was appointed to this Office (Colonel King-Harman), and he received a reply from the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) to which he (Mr. J. E. Ellis) would not further allude. After the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury had sat down, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton also asked the hon. and learned Attorney General for England (Sir Richard Webster) whether his attention had been called to the Act of 41 Geo. III., which dealt with this point. He (Mr. J. E. Ellis) mentioned this because he was well aware that on this question of vacating seats on the acceptance of Office there was in some quarters a disposition to think that it was unnecessary, and he believed that the second reading of a Bill rendering it no longer necessary was moved in that House quite recently. Well, he (Mr. J. E. Ellis) was one of those, he confessed, whom it would take stronger arguments than he had yet heard in that House or elsewhere to induce to support a Bill taking away from any constituency the right of passing a verdict on a Member of the House on accepting Office. But the hon. and learned Attorney General, on the occasion to which he had referred, used some language to which he ventured to recall the attention of the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman pointed out to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton, alluding to this particular Act of Parliament, that it expressly recognized the possibility of appointments being made by the Lord Lieutenant, but only vacated seats or rendered gentlemen ineligible to sit in the House if they held Office of profit under the Lord Lieutenant. Now, that was precisely the point which arose under the present Bill. Here was a Bill creating an Office of profit under the Lord Lieutenant, and he ventured to ask why they should pass an Act of Parliament taking away from the constituency represented by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet the right which they possessed under the Act of George III. of passing their verdict upon his conduct in accepting Office? The Government were always talking to the House about the Act of Union. Well, he would remind those who so freely mentioned the Act of Union that this very Act of 41 Geo. III. was passed, as the Preamble stated, in order to carry out the Act of Union. Now, with regard to the reply of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, his right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne had used a very strong expression the other day. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury had told them on the 15th of April what was equal to saying that no salary was attached to the Office of Parliamentary Under Secretary; but they had been told by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant that, at the very moment the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury was using these words, the Government were intending to bring in a Bill to give a salary to the recipient of the Office. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne had used the expression that the conduct of the Government on that occasion and on the introduction of this Bill, and the whole circumstances attending it, were neither more nor less than an equivocal manoeuvre. In that term he (Mr. J. E. Ellis) ventured to include the assertion which was made at that time as to the non-vacation of the seat. Unless it was not in the mind of the Government at that time to introduce an exception in the case of the Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland from the operation of the Statute of 41 Geo. III., he could not look upon their conduct at that time as other than an unworthy manœuvre, and wanting in strict frankness. He would leave the precise interpretation of the Act of Parliament in the hands of those who were sometimes called learned Gentlemen. His ground of objection to the Bill divided itself into three heads. He ventured to assert, without fear of contradiction, that the authority of that House of Commons depended upon the fidelity of its Members to the pledges they gave to those whom they asked to vote for them. He remembered perfectly well that an hon. Member—when the Liberal Party was sitting on the other side of the House in 1886 — (Mr. Edward Leatham), who then represented the borough of Huddersfield, got up and said he did not represent his constituents, and did not say what they wished him to say, but that he was speaking exactly contrary to their desires, and that, therefore, he was speaking in a most disinterested manner, because he knew he was going to lose his seat — [Cries of "Order!"] Some hon. Members called him to Order, but he maintained that the subject of an hon. Member going against the wishes of his constituents was clearly germane to the point at issue, as he desired that the Parliamentary Under Secretary should be compelled to go before his constituents in order to receive their approval of his conduct on his accepting Office. Possibly his words were rather an unpleasant reminder to some hon. Members opposite who probably contemplated the loss of their seats through the loss of confidence of their constituents. The clever and versatile politician who sat on the Front Opposition Bench—he referred to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain)—had used a very curious expression the other night, which he (Mr. J. E. Ellis) had taken down at the time, and which he thought would be remembered. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of those who “had to submit to the annoyance of public election.” He (Mr. J. E. Ellis) could quite understand that in the General Election coming there might be some annoyance to those who—like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, the noble Lord the Member for the Rossen-

Mr. J. E. Ellis

dale Division of Lancashire (the Marquess of Hartington) and others—sat on that (the Opposition) side of the House. He could quite understand the term as applied to those hon. Gentlemen; but, speaking generally, he did not believe there would be much difference from him in his view of the subject. The occupants of the Benches opposite would not differ from him when he said that hon. Members came to that House to represent the views of their constituents, and that their fidelity to their election pledges was the best way in which they could carry into effect the representative principle of government. Apart from the general question, surely the moment chosen for attempting to deprive the electors of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet of the right they would otherwise have to pass judgment upon their Representative was a most unfortunate one. In spite of every effort of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite to make things appear the contrary, they knew that the great controversy before the country just now was the Irish Question. They knew the pledges which had been given by the supporters of the Government—and he trusted he might not be interrupted by cries of Order when he mentioned one striking illustration. They knew how one noble Lord, a Member of that House, had placarded his constituency with “Vote for Weymouth and no Coercion.” He was justified in asking if that pledge had been kept. [Cries of "Question!"] He understood that interruption. Hon. Members opposite did not like the allusion, and he would, therefore, pass to the third point. If they searched the House of Commons through, they would not be able to find a person who had departed more from his election pledges—he would defy them to find a better illustration of that political virtue than the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet. What had the right hon. and gallant Gentleman said to his constituents on the 30th of June, 1886? He used this language. He said—

“If I am returned to Parliament I shall use my best endeavours to insure that equal law and equal justice shall be administered in Ireland and England.”

That was what the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had told the electors, and he

(Mr. J. E. Ellis) asked the House not to deprive the electors of the Isle of Thanet of their power of passing judgment as to whether his pledges had been kept or not. Equal law and equal justice in Ireland and England! Why, the debate which took place earlier in the evening gave the lie to that assertion—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I beg pardon if I have used an un-Parliamentary expression—I would say a contradiction.

THE CHAIRMAN: That cannot be relevant to the subject under discussion.

MR. J. E. ELLIS said, he stood corrected, and begged to apologize for having strayed. He said again that the promise contained in these words that equal justice should be done to Ireland and England had not been fulfilled by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. He (Mr. J. E. Ellis) would, as he had said, be no party to depriving the electors of the Isle of Thanet of this opportunity of passing judgment upon their Member. He did not suppose for a single moment that the constituents of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would endorse the view that the Opposition took as against the Government on these matters; but the responsibility, if they had to re-elect the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, would be with them. He contended that they should not be deprived of the opportunity they would have under the Act of Parliament which he had mentioned—not under the Act of Queen Anne, but under that to which he had referred—of expressing their opinion of their Representative; and he, therefore, begged to move the Amendment that stood in his name.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 13, to leave out all the words after the word “voting” to the end of the Clause. —(Mr. J. E. Ellis.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause.”

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he did not catch the full relevance of the whole of the observations of the hon. Member; but he thought he could give him an answer which he would see deserved the consideration of the Committee. He (Mr. A. J. Balfour) did not propose to discuss the merits of the existing rule, which required that Ministers should be re-elected on being selected to Office, which some hon. Members considered a very wise provision, but which he himself thought rather belonged to the by-gone traditions of Parliament. The whole of the Bill was in absolute conformity with all recent legislation in the House with all regard to subordinate positions. Every Under Secretary, he believed, took Office without his being required to seek re-election, and there was no reason that he could see why the Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland should be placed in a different category from every other Under Secretary. The hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division of Nottingham (Mr. J. E. Ellis) had argued against the Bill as if it had reference solely to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet. [“Hear, hear.”] Well, he had never heard a Bill avowedly argued on the ground of the character of the person who it was proposed should be the first occupant of the position it was designed to create. He was the more surprised to hear hon. Gentlemen opposite taking up the position they did with regard to the Bill when they were so fond of telling the Government that their tenure of Office was to be so short. Surely, if they were right, the matter was hardly worth much consideration. Parliament not long ago constituted the Office of Secretary to the Board of Trade—it was in 1867. That Act provided, exactly as the present Bill provided, that the Member appointed to the Office should not vacate his seat on the acceptance of that Office, and should be eligible, if not a Member, for election. The First Commissioner of Works did vacate his seat upon his being appointed; but when the Act was passed it especially exempted the first holder of the Office, so that they had an unbroken precedent in regard to recent appointments.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn), interrupting, said, he wished to ask whether in any other cases Under Secretaries had been appointed first without salaries?

THE CHAIRMAN: These interruptions are extremely irregular.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the Government were acting in this matter in strict accordance with Parliamentary precedent in excepting the first Parliamentary Under Secretary from the necessity of re-election, putting him into the same position as the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, the Financial Secretary to the War Office, the Secretary to the Board of Trade, the Secretary to the Admiralty, and the four Under Secretaries. Under these circumstances, he hoped the House would see the absurdity of making a special exemption in the case of his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Isle of Thanet.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) said, he quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland in his statement of what he (Mr. John Morley) had gathered to be the right hon. Gentleman's own view of the prevailing policy in recent times, and, no doubt, the tendency in the House during recent years had been to limit and not to increase the number of Offices the acceptance of which necessitated an appeal to the constituency; but they must remember that the whole circumstances connected with the Bill were exceptional and peculiar. The right hon. Gentleman had complained that so much criticism on the clauses of the Bill, and on the second reading, had turned upon the qualification and position of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet. But what was the reason for that? There was a perfectly good reason for it, and it was this—that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was put into some sort of position—he did not know whether to call it an office or what to call it—which was only now being regularized; and it was on that account, if he might say so, that such strong objection was taken to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet being appointed to the position without being required to seek re-election at the hands of his constituents. The Parliamentary Under Secretary was created first, and the Office was now being created, and that was the reason why there was so much criticism bearing upon the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet, and why his hon. Friend the Member for the Rushcliffe Division of Nottingham (Mr. J. E. Ellis) was perfectly justified, in bringing forward his Amendment, in referring to the Election pledges of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. He (Mr. John Morley), however, did not wish to dwell upon that aspect of the question. All he had to say was that, though he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary in his general view as to re-election not being necessary on the acceptance of these subordinate offices, yet the conditions under which the particular subordinate office in question was first introduced last year—and he did not wish to repeat any of the harsh words he used—were such, and there was so much that was peculiar in the creation of the Office, that while he agreed in the view of the Government as to the general policy in the matter on this occasion, he felt bound to support the Amendment of his hon. Friend.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had been very sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary just now; but he had desired to ask—as the right hon. Gentleman had stated certain cases or precedents in the creation of these Offices which this Bill was said to follow—the right hon. Gentleman to point out to the Committee one case which could be fairly taken as a precedent. Could the right hon. Gentleman find a precedent in the whole legislation of this country where an Under Secretary had been appointed with a salary, and where it had been stated that he was not to have a salary, but where, subsequently, when it was found convenient to avoid an election, came forward and legalized their appointment with a Bill of this kind? There was no such precedent, and therefore it was that he ventured to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman whilst he was speaking. He had asked him if he could point out anything of the kind? It had been positively asserted on both sides of the House that hon. Members opposite, as well as hon. Members on the Opposition Benches, had come to the conclusion that this appointment from beginning to end was not to be defended, and that the more they looked into it, and attempted to justify it, the worse it became. As the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had said, they were bound to bring forward precedents in a case of this kind; but when the right hon. Gentleman referred to the precedents they entirely failed him. What he (Mr. Anderson) said was this, and he said it advisedly, that the House had been entirely taken in as to this appointment from the beginning. They were asked to sanction the appointment, in the first place, on the ground that it did not come within the Act of Parliament, and was not an Office of profit. The matter was then passed over; but now it seems that it was an Office of profit, and that there were provisions in the Bill the object of which was to avoid the necessity for a re-election. He hoped the Amendment would be pressed to a Division, as it would emphasize the strong feeling which he believed to exist on both sides of the House, and which he was sure existed in the country, against this appointment.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian) said, he wished to state the grounds upon which he should support the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for the Rushcliffe Division of Nottingham (Mr. T. E. Ellis), and he also wished to refer to the arguments made use of by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. The right hon. Gentleman said, and said truly, that there had been a good deal of legislation of late years in this direction. Various Offices had been constituted, in each of which the holders had not been made subject to the condition of re-election. That was perfectly true, and the right hon. Gentleman had taken the opportunity of expressing an opinion which he entertained, that it was a very doubtful policy which made the vacation of a seat a necessary condition of the acceptance of Office. He (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) knew that that opinion had obtained great currency in the House; but he must say that he did not share it, as he thought it was an important item of popular control that persons taking Office under the Crown should in general be subject to re-election. There had undoubtedly been, in his time, a great relaxation of the rule which was originally too rigid. When he first entered Parliament the rule was not only that a person should be subject to re-election on taking Office, but that he should be also subject to re-election on any change of Office. He remembered perfectly well himself being the Vice President of the Board of Trade half-a-century ago, and that on his becoming President of the Board of Trade, a question was submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown to ascertain whether the fact of a Member becoming a President of the Board of Trade instead of a Vice President of the Board of Trade did not constitute the taking of a new Office in such a sense as to render re-election necessary. But what he wished to call the attention of the House to was this, that when the right hon. Gentleman said that precedents were in favour of releasing this new Office from the condition of re-election that might happen to be true; but there was another question to be considered—namely, whether it was wise to go on increasing indefinitely the number of those Offices not subject to re-election? There had been a considerable increase in those Offices. He could not be quite certain, but his belief was, that 40 years ago there had been no more than six or seven of these Offices in the House, and now they numbered about 10, and the right hon. Gentleman proposed to add another. He must say he was very much disinclined to add to the number of those Offices which could be taken without re-election. He had no desire to restrain or narrow the influence enjoyed by the Government in this House which was exerted through its official Members, but he thought it was quite a fit subject for careful consideration whether they should increase the number of Offices which could be accepted without re-election. He was much disinclined to agree with the proposition on this ground; but he was bound to say that he should vote with the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment, on a ground altogether apart from the mere question of the creation of this Office, and that was the ground that the appointment so completely and pre-eminently realized the highest idea of what might be called a Parliamentary job. This was an Office which was absolutely unnecessary. No Department less required its hands strengthening by the multiplication of Offices than the Irish Department; and the old and sound principle of every right-minded Government always was that when at any particular time there was particular pressure upon a certain Department, it should be provided for by calling in the aid of some less occupied Member of the Government. That was a sound and good principle, and ought always to be adhered to. The creation of the Office was most unnecessary; and, having regard to that and to the unfortunate and deplorable choice of the man who was to fill it, he must decline to be a party to asking the House to afford any facility either for the taking or the holding of the Office.

Mr. T. M. HEALY rose to Order. He asked whether the right hon. Gentleman who was about to move the Closure could make a speech in advance, or whether he should not confine himself to that Motion?

THE CHAIRMAN having called upon the First Lord of the Treasury,

Mr. W. H. SMITH: Mr. Courtney, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) has thought it right to express his opinion that the Office sought to be created by this Bill is totally unnecessary. I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman's knowledge of Irish Administration would have led him to take precisely the opposite view. With the greatest courtesy, I wish to remark that a want of knowledge of the actual details of Irish Administration, and the necessity which exists for intelligent supervision in that Department, is not such as might be expected from a right hon. Gentleman of such distinguished position in public life. But, Sir, apart from that altogether, I may say that the Government would not have proposed the Office if they had not felt it necessary for the good administration of Irish affairs. We felt it to be necessary for that purpose, and it is with that conviction that we press it upon the House. I entirely agree with what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman as to the creation of Offices held by Members of this House which are to have immunity from re-election, and the Government has shown how desirous they are of lessening, rather than increasing, the number of Members of the Government holding Offices subject to re-election by having this year suppressed two paid Offices—namely, that of Judge Advocate General and that of the Surveyor General of Ordnance, which have ceased to be Offices of profit under the Crown. I mention that fact, to show that the Government are as anxious as the right hon. Gentleman himself has been, not to provide salaries for Officers who are not really necessary to the service of the country, and not to provide immunity from re-election unless such immunity is also necessary. I trust the Committee will now come to a decision on a question which, I venture to think, has been sufficiently discussed.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury has started the whole question as to whether this Office is or is not necessary. He appears to forget, however, that the present Chief Secretary for Ireland has two assistants whom I never had, and whom no Gentleman who preceded the Chief Secretary ever had—namely, the Closure and the 12 o'clock Rule.

An hon. MEMBER rose to Order. He asked whether the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman were not more appropriate to the Motion for the second reading?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman were, no doubt, somewhat divergent at the moment; but he would probably apply them to the question before the Committee.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: I could not allow the right hon. Gentleman, having such enormous weight in the discussion as the First Lord of the Treasury, to close this very important debate with the expression that this Office is called for by the extra work on the shoulders of the Chief Secretary for Ireland; and I can only say, once for all, that the work of the Irish Chief Secretary in the old days would not have been too much for one man to do before 12 o'clock. I should have been ashamed to ask for assistance in that work, although, from my own experience, I know that the work which came on after 12 o'clock was the hardest, and might have fairly required the attention of two men. If ever there was a post to which we should apply the old rule of appealing to the country as to whether a Gentleman, not at present in the service of the Crown, should take that service, it is this post of the Assistant Irish Secretary. It is absolutely impossible to separate this appointment from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who is going to take it, and I maintain the appointment of that right hon. and gallant Gentleman is a most serious step, out of the many serious steps which the Government have taken with regard to Ireland. I certainly would not refrain from voting for the Amendment, which means that one of the constituencies of the country shall be able to say whether, at this crisis of affairs in Ireland, the Irish people should have any share in their own administration, or whether they should have none. [Cries of "Question!"] That is the question. It is whether a constituency is to be debarred from being able to say whether or not it wishes to have a right hon. and gallant Gentleman second in command in Ireland, who is not neutral or impartial, but in sympathy with the governing minority of the people.

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he had to congratulate the First Lord of the Treasury on having made a speech without moving the Closure.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 230; Noes 191: Majority 39.—(Div. List, No. 109.)

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, he had some confidence in rising to move the Amendment which stood in his name by reason of the remarkably diminished Government majority which they had witnessed that evening, and the fact that the first Division resulting in so small a majority had induced the Chief Secretary for Ireland to give way upon another Amendment. Those circumstances induced him to hope that the Government might see the reasonableness of the proposal which he was about to lay before them. It would be observed that the Amendment referred to two points. He proposed, first of all, that the salary to be given to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet Division of Kent (Colonel King-Harman) should, in no case, exceed £500 a-year; and, in the second place, he proposed that this salary should not commence until the end of the present Session. Those two proposals appeared to him to be justified by all that had gone before in the history of the Bill. He did not propose to detain the Committee with a detailed reference to the circumstances; but he thought that they showed the undesirability, in the first instance, of providing a salary for the right hon. and gallant Gentleman; and, in the second place, the importance of seeing that he was not paid for his services during the past year. The remarks which had just passed between the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow (Sir George Trevelyan) had shown very clearly what had been proved over and over again—namely, that there was no absolute necessity for the post which the Government were seeking to create. He thought, under the circumstances, that he would be justified in proposing that the salary of the person to be provided with this post should, at any rate, be proportioned to the work he was likely to have to do, which was nil. But it might be held to be somewhat severe, if it would not be trifling with the Committee, if one were to make a proposal of that sort. He believed, however, that it would be possible to say that, in proposing that the salary should be £500 a-year, they were dealing very liberally with the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. He considered that they were dealing with him far too liberally; but hon. Gentlemen on those Benches were inclined to take a somewhat generous view of the matter, because they knew that the Gentleman to be provided by the House with a salary was a broken-down rack-renter. [Cries of "Name!"] Had the Government not sent him to South Africa because he was broken down? [Cries of "Name!"] It might, perhaps, be that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was sent out there because he had tried to break down the Government. It appeared to him distinctly, if he might judge from what he knew, that in the County of Roscommon, at Boyle, there was a deliberate attempt on the part of the Government to set up Humpty Dumpty on the wall again, and if only for that reason he should be inclined to protest, as far as possible, against voting any salary to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. But what were the services for which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was to be paid? He was not aware that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was good as a shorthand clerk, and as a very skilful shorthand clerk could be obtained for the payment of 20s. or 40s. a-week, if he were skilful in that respect £100 would be ample for him as clerk to the Chief Secretary for Ireland. But if they could not discover that his qualifications lay in that direction, were they to pay him £1,500 a-year for answering Questions in that House which the Chief Secretary for Ireland was too indolent to reply to? [Cries of "Order!"] If it was not on that account, he wanted to know on what ground they were asked to pay this money? When he considered the possibilities pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, which made the appointment almost the most mischievous which could be conceived, he felt that they ought not to assume that the services of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman were worth £500 a-year, but rather that they should be willing to pay £5,000 to get rid of him altogether. There had been no reason stated for the appointment, except that he was in need of the salary proposed to be provided to help him out of his difficulties; and that he believed was the sole object with which this provision was being made.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to report Progress.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he would fix 2 o'clock to-morrow for the consideration of the Bill to be resumed.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he must submit that the proposal of the First Lord of the Treasury to continue the discussion at 2 o'clock to-morrow was Opposed Business which, under the Standing Order, could not now be taken. The Standing Order of the 24th February, 1888, provided that, unless the House should otherwise order, the House should meet on Mondays, Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays, at 3 o'clock. The Order of the House would be required to meet at 2 o'clock, and as that was in the nature of Opposed Business it was manifestly impossible that the House could meet at that hour.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he ventured to submit that the preponderance of voices would give the House this power to fix the hour.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby) said, that this was an extraordinary proposition on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. It seemed to him that all the laws and practice of the House of Commons were to be set aside by the right hon. Gentleman's ipse dixit. He had heard over and over again questions of Morning Sittings discussed, and Divisions had been taken upon them, and he asked by what right was that Rule to be abrogated? What was the history of this question, and how had it arisen? By the Government wasting the time of the House.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER said, that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith), in referring to the question of a preponderance of voices, alluded to the New Rule, which provided for the fixing of Business at the time of Business being suspended. That Rule provided—

"That the Business then under consideration and any Business subsequently appointed shall be appointed for the next day on which the House shall sit, unless the Speaker ascertains by a preponderance of voices that a majority of the House desires that such Business shall be deferred until a later day."

He must, therefore, point out, that the preponderance of voices could only prevail to defer business to a later day, not to take it at an earlier hour.

IMPERIAL DEFENCE [EXPENSES]

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, this Order would be taken at 2 o'clock to-morrow.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) said, that the objection to the last proposal applied to this also.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, I beg to give Notice that, at 3 o'clock, I shall move that this Business be taken before the other Orders of the Day.

An hon. MEMBER: We shall oppose it.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he had no desire whatever to object to the Imperial Defence Bill being taken. His only objection was to a Morning Sitting.

Committee deferred till To-morrow.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO WORKMEN BILL.—[BILL 145.]

(Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Forwood.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): It is possible that we may be obliged to postpone the Bill on Thursday, in order to take other Business.

Mr. Conybeare

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): Are we to understand that the Employers' Liability for Injuries to Workmen Bill, in which the English people are interested, is to be sacrificed to the Bill for the Under Secretary for Ireland?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I must point out that if it is delayed, it will be owing to the factious opposition of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked whether it was in Order for the right hon. Gentleman to charge Gentlemen on that side of the House with factious opposition?

[No reply.]

Second Reading deferred till Thursday.

NATIONAL DEBT (SUPPLEMENTAL) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Bill to make certain Amendments in the Law consequential on the passing of "The National Debt (Conversion) Act, 1888," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Henry Smith, and Mr. Jackson.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 264.]

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, 15th May, 1888.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Lloyd's Signal Stations (84); Factory and Workshops Act (1878) Amendment (Scotland) (76); Local Bankruptcy (Ireland) (93); Coroners (36).

Committee—Glebe Lands (100-119).

Committee—Report—Considered—Third Reading—Local Government (England and Wales) Electors (103), and passed.

Report—Church Discipline (108-118), now Clergy Discipline; Suffragans' Act Amendment* (83).

Third Reading—Tithe Rentcharge* (53); Tithe Rentcharge Recovery and Variation* (59); Copyright (Musical Compositions)* (92); Merchant Shipping (Life Saving Appliances) (96), and passed.

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS—First Reading—Local Government* (113); Local Government (No. 2)* (114); Local Government (Poor Law)* (115); Local Government (Poor Law) (No. 2)* (116); Local Government (Poor Law) (No. 3)* (117).

Second Reading—Local Government (Ireland) (Dublin Markets)* (85).

Third Reading—Local Government (Ireland) (Coleraine, &c.)* (63), and passed.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

Moved, "That the Earl of Selborne do take the Chair in all Committees upon Private Bills this day, in the absence of the Duke of Buckingham and Chandos from illness, unless where it shall have been otherwise directed by this House."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Motion agreed to.

Moved, "That the Lord Knutsford be appointed to take the Chair in the Committees of the Whole House, in the absence of the Duke of Buckingham and Chandos from illness."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE AND PROVISIONAL ORDER CONFIRMATION BILLS.

Ordered, That Standing Orders Nos. 92 and 93 be suspended; and that the time for depositing petitions praying to be heard against Private and Provisional Order Confirmation Bills, which would otherwise expire during the adjournment of the House at Whitsuntide, be extended to the first day on which the House shall sit after the recess.

INDIA—THE CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON asked the Secretary of State for India, with reference to a statement made in the House of Commons on the previous night on the subject of the Contagious Diseases Acts in India, Whether it was the intention of the Government to take steps to repeal the Acts as they had been repealed in this country, or whether it was only proposed to suspend their operation? He hoped that the Acts would be repealed.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Viscount Cross), in reply, said, that the whole question was brought under his serious notice last year by the Bishop of Lichfield, and, in consequence of what was stated to him, he at once placed himself in communication with the Viceroy upon the subject. The Answer, which was given in "another place" on the previous night, was as follows:—

"In consequence of the action taken by the Secretary of State upon the Questions put to him in "another place" last year by the Lord Bishop of Lichfield, what is known as the regimental system has been absolutely stopped. The Commander-in-Chief has prohibited women from accompanying regiments on march or to camp, and also from residing in regimental bazaars. The administration of the Contagious Diseases Act in Bombay, Madras, and Basseein, the only places in which it is in force, has been suspended by the Government of India under a power contained in the Act. The Government of India is now engaged in a revision of the regulations made for preventing the spread of venereal disease in cantonments, under Section 27 of Act III. of 1880: and a despatch is going out to India from the Secretary of State in Council, which will prohibit the compulsory examination of women and the making of any regulations which can be justly construed into a legalization of prostitution."

He thought the noble Marquess would see that important steps had been taken in order to do away with what was somewhat of a scandal. The action which the Government of India had taken was the suspension of the operation of the Acts. The Government of India had asked his assent to that suspension, and he had given it. The results would be carefully watched.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) ELECTORS BILL.—(No. 103.)
(The Lord Balfour.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1 (Short title and construction).

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, he rose to move an Amendment. The Bill had been described to them last night as one of a very complicated nature, and it was proposed that it should be passed through the House under circumstances which, through its connection with another Bill now in the other House, made it difficult to give it that amount of consideration and revision which its importance deserved. If they were to have another franchise, they must ask what it was to be, and were they to exclude those who were owners of property? It seemed to him that this Bill, as it was framed, excluded from the franchise all the owners of property as such; and if its principles were adopted without modification and protest, it appeared to him that they would lead necessarily to what was known as the one man one vote system, and ultimately by a logical sequence to universal suffrage, including all who were of full age. He did not know whether their Lordships were prepared for the adoption of principles leading in a direction so fraught with important consequences to the country. As the Bill stood, the owner of property as such would have no voice whatever in the election of the representatives returned to the proposed County Councils. In their desire to facilitate the passing of the Bill on the responsibility of the Government, their Lordships, he thought, ought not lightly to part with all control over a measure of such importance. In the case of the Ballot Act, their Lordships reserved their right of giving to the measure that revision which might be required at the expiration of a certain number of years; and although after a limited period experience induced Parliament to re-enact the Ballot Act without substantial alteration, yet no one could question that their Lordships had acted wisely in reserving the right of reconsideration in regard to a matter of such importance. But if that argument held good in respect to the Ballot Act, it applied with still greater force to the case of the present Bill, which could receive no examination at all at this moment. Moreover, when that Bill and the other Bill which was its corollary passed into law they would, at no distant period, experience the working of the measure. He therefore proposed to amend that clause by moving the insertion of words providing that the Bill should continue in force till December 31, 1889, and no longer, unless Parliament should otherwise determine.

Amendment moved,

In line 11, after ("1888") add ("and shall continue in force till the thirty-first day of December 1889, and no longer unless Parliament shall otherwise determine.")—(The Earl Beauchamp.)

LORD BASING said, he hoped that their Lordships would accept that Amendment. He intended to have moved it himself if the noble Lord had not done so. Apart from the special reasons given by his noble Friend in favour of the Amendment, the Bill was very faulty in its form, because it proposed to legislate on important matters by means of reference to various other Acts of Parliament; and even an expert would find very considerable difficulty in ascertaining what was the exact meaning of its provisions. They ought to have a Bill setting out in clear language what the intentions of Parliament were. He could not admit that because owners of property did not participate in municipal elections they ought to be equally excluded from participating in the elections for County Councils. He denied that there was a perfect analogy between Municipal Corporations and County Councils. It was, no doubt, intended to give to the counties as much of municipal functions as could properly be extended to them; but they would not be able to carry that so very far. As an illustration of his argument he showed that the money raised by the rates in boroughs was expended for the common benefit of the town, while in the country districts precisely the reverse was the case. The occupier of land might be rated for purposes as to which he had no interest whatever. He would only have one vote, whereas by status and wealth he might be equal to 10 or 20 occupiers of houses. He agreed with his noble Friend as to the desirableness of amending the Bill and limiting its operation. When more experience had been gained they would be able to discuss the question of franchise more freely than at present.

LORD BALFOUR said, he believed that the Bill, although complicated in appearance, would be simple in its operation. Both noble Lords had complained because the Bill enacted by reference to other Acts. The reason for this was a very good one. The basis of the Bill was the extension of the municipal franchise and municipal privileges to the county. The Acts which conferred those privileges were extended by means of the present measure, the word "county" being substituted for "borough" where necessary, in addition to other incidental and necessary changes. If all the Burgess Acts, amended and altered as they had been by the Rating Acts, were to be set out in the form of a Schedule, instead of the measure being less complicated than now, it would be rendered much more difficult and complex. The simple effect of the enactments in Clauses 2 and 4 was this, that the burgess qualification of the boroughs would be extended to the counties. Those charged with making up the lists of electors for the register would place in three divisions in the list those who were qualified. Leaving out of sight the lodger and the service qualifications, there would be one list containing the names of all those who were qualified in each district to vote for municipal and Parliamentary purposes. Next would come those who were qualified to vote only for Parliamentary purposes; and, thirdly, those who were entitled to vote for municipal purposes alone, this list including Peers and women. The noble Earl (Earl Beauchamp) took a most alarming view of the principles of the Bill, but he could not make out from what the noble Lord said how it was that this Bill committed them to the principle of universal suffrage. That was a new idea, and he did not see anything in the Bill which led to that conclusion. If noble Lords thought that in another year there was a likelihood that they would revert to the system of giving owners the right to vote in respect to their property situated within the boroughs, they were, he believed, much mistaken. However, he thought it would be more convenient to take the discussion on that question when the Committee reached the consideration of a subsequent Amendment which raised the point in a particular form. He hoped their Lordships would not accept the Amendment, because he could not see what good purpose would be gained by keeping open an agitation with respect to the franchise for another year. It was urged that if their Lordships passed the Bill as it stood they would part with it for ever. But surely if the Bill did not operate successfully the question could once more be raised by means of an amending Bill. To say that the Government were creating a new franchise unknown to the law was hardly an accurate statement of the case. The Bill simply extended the present municipal franchise to the counties. The Local Government measures at present before Parliament were sufficiently complex already, and he therefore hoped the Amendment would be rejected.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:
—Contents 28; Not-Contents 64: Majority 36.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

THE EARL OF JERSEY said, he rose to move the insertion of new clauses giving an ownership franchise qualification to owners of property not resident within the rural electoral districts in which their property was situated. As the Bill now stood, it would operate very hardly upon the owners of property in counties. The County Councils would have great powers entrusted to them, under which they might make, assess, and levy rates, and deal with roads, bridges, rivers, tramways, gas and water supplies, and, in fact, everything that had to do with the management of the district; and they would also have the very dangerous power entrusted to them of borrowing money, and thereby to make a practically permanent charge upon the land. As the Bill now stood, a landowner might possess several cottages for which he paid the rates, but unless he lived in the district his cottagers, who paid nothing to the rates, would have a voice in levying and spending them, whereas the owner would have no vote in the matter whatever. That was hardly a reasonable position in which to place the landowner. The question affected not only the large landowners, but also the small landowners, of whom there were a great number in the country, and upon whom the rates would fall very heavily. It would be said that they were only extending to counties the borough franchise. But they must recognize that county affairs were not exactly similar to borough affairs. He did not ask for any special privilege or favour for owners of property. He only asked that the right which Parliament had hitherto jealously preserved for those who paid the rates—the right of representation—should not be taken away from them by this Bill, but that there should be left them the power of dealing with those local affairs with which their own interests were so deeply affected.

Moved, after Clause 3, to insert the following Clause:—

(Ownership of land to qualify.)

“Every person who in respect of any property situated outside the limits of a municipal borough is entitled to be registered as an ownership voter within the meaning of the provisions of the Registration Act, 1885, shall be entitled to be registered as a county elector in respect of such qualification, in like manner in all respects as if the sections of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, relating to a burgess qualification included the said ownership qualification.”—(The Earl of Jersey.)

LORD BALFOUR said, that to enable the House to judge of the Amendment he would ask them to consider its effect if applied as proposed only to rural districts in counties. There was no suggestion that property in boroughs was to qualify. They would often have a case like this. Some of those districts to be created would be partly urban and partly rural, and very often the divisions were of a very arbitrary kind. They might have the houses on one side of a street within a borough, and the houses on the other side in the county. The effect of this proposal would be that upon the same day, for the same Council, and within the same district, they would have owners qualified on one side of the street and owners disqualified on the other. That was an anomaly which had not grown up or happened by accident, but which the noble Earl would deliberately create by a vote in Parliament. The grievance of owners not having a vote was a sentimental one only in rural districts, for proprietors who were non-resident existed to a much greater extent in town than in country districts. To make the change proposed would be to change the whole burgess qualification in such a manner as to create the greatest anomalies. Her Majesty's Government had to choose between the Parliamentary or the municipal franchise, and in preferring the latter to the former he contended that they had solid ground to go upon. The proposal of the noble Earl would change the whole burgess qualification, which would be an uncalled-for step. He ventured to say that this was rather a sentimental than a real grievance; and there could be little hardship in this matter, because as all the elections took place on one day a non-resident owner would not have an opportunity to give many votes even if he had them.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 34; Not-Contents 55: Majority 21.

CONTENTS.

Breadalbane, M.	Beauchamp, E.
Bathurst, E.	Carnarvon, E.
	Faversham, E.

Jersey, E. [Teller.]	Clanwilliam, L. (E. Clanwilliam.)
Kingston, E.	Clinton, L.
Lindsay, F.	Colchester, L.
Mar and Kellie, E.	Donington, L.
Milltown, E.	Fermanagh, L. (E. Erne.)
Morton, E.	FitzGerald, L.
Powis, E.	Herries, L.
Stanhope, E.	Lamington, L.
Strafford, E.	Magheramorne, L.
St. Asaph, L. Bp.	Norton, L.
Addington, L.	Sinclair, L.
Aveland, L. [Teller.]	Stanley of Alderley, L.
Basing, L.	Sudeley, L.
Brougham and Vaux, L.	Wenlock, L.
	Wimborne, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Halsbury, L. (L. Chancellor.)	Ashbourne, L.
Cranbrook, V. (L. President.)	Balfour of Burley, L.
Bedford, D.	Brassey, L.
Grafton, D.	Brodrick, L. (V. Middleton.)
Rutland, D.	Burton, L.
Ripon, M.	Elphinstone, L.
Salisbury, M.	Hamilton of Dalzell, L.
Mount-Edgcumbe, E. (L. Steward.)	Harris, L.
Brownlow, E.	Hartismere, L. (L. Henniker.)
Camperdown, E.	Herschell, L.
Derby, E.	Hopetoun, L. (E. Hopetoun.)
Fife, E.	Kensington, L.
Granville, E.	Ker, L. (M. Lothian.)
Kimberley, E.	Kintore, L. (E. Kintore.) [Teller.]
Macclesfield, E.	Knutsford, L.
Morley, E.	Lawrence, L.
Onslow, E.	Leigh, L.
Selborne, E.	Lingen, L.
Spencer, E.	Monk-Bretton, L.
Waldegrave, E. [Teller.]	Montagu of Beaulieu, L.
Cross, V.	Monteagle of Brandon, L.
Gordon, V. (E. Aberdeen.)	Northington, L. (L. Henley.)
Oxenbridge, V.	Poltimore, L.
Sidmouth, V.	Rosebery, L. (E. Rosebery.)
Torrington, V.	Truro, L.
Carlisle, L. Bp.	Watson, L.
Chichester, L. Bp.	Wigan, L. (E. Crawford and Balcarres.)
	Winmarleigh, L.

Moved, to insert the following New Clause:—

(Tenure of house by office or service not to invalidate vote.)

"Where a man himself inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any office, service, or employment, and the dwelling-house is not inhabited by any person under whom such man serves in such office, service, or employment, he shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act to be an inhabitant occupier of such dwelling-house as a tenant."—(The Earl of Jersey.)

LORD BALFOUR said, that the same general considerations ruled the answer to this Amendment as in the last. The burgess qualification had been taken as the basis of the new franchise, and it had been resolved neither to level up nor to level down. He hoped the Amendment would not be accepted.

Amendment negatived.

Clauses 4 to 11 agreed to.

Clause 12 (Separate list of persons residing within fifteen miles of county).

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN asked whether it did not relate to the qualification of persons to be elected members of the new Councils, and import into this Bill the qualification now existing in the Municipal Corporations Act? If, as he was of opinion, that it was not desirable, and might be mischievous, a gentleman who might reside a little beyond the stipulated distance from his property would be ineligible, although he might be the very person whom the electors should desire to represent them. We had long since done away with the qualification for Members of Parliament, and he thought there was no reason for retaining it in the case of members of County Boards.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY) replied in the affirmative. No doubt, the question of qualification was a most important one, and their Lordships would have an opportunity of fully discussing it when the larger measure was before them.

THE EARL OF JERSEY asked, whether the Government could give the House any information with regard to a matter which was mentioned in "another place," and in respect to which they then gave a kind of promise—namely, as to whether owners not having votes as ratepayers would under the Local Government Bill be qualified to sit upon the County Council?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, it would be irregular to discuss this point, which did not arise out of the present Bill, and he hoped his noble Friend would be satisfied with the assurance, to use a common expression, that the Government had a very open mind on the subject.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

Bill reported without Amendment.

LORD BALFOUR said, he begged to move the suspension of the Standing Order in order to allow of the Bill being read a third time and passed. It was essential that the Bill should become law before Parliament again met after the Holidays, and, therefore, that it should receive the Royal Assent before the adjournment, which had been fixed for to-morrow or Thursday.

Moved, "That Standing Order No. XXXV. be considered (according to order) and dispensed with."—(The Lord Balfour.)

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM said, he extremely regretted the proposal to hurry this important Bill through the House. At the close of last Session, as late as the month of September, an important measure dealing with allotments was introduced into this House when the attendance of Members was very attenuated, and when no adequate opportunity of discussing it was afforded. He thought the practice of thus hurrying Bills through this House was calculated to undermine the authority of the House, as tending to give the country the impression that measures did not here receive due deliberation. He objected to the practice generally, and he objected specially to it on this occasion in regard to this Bill, which was really legislation in the dark. They were creating a constituency before they knew what the representative body would be. Would it cause any very great inconvenience supposing the Local Government Bill were retarded? Was that Bill likely to establish a system so very superior to the present system that there was any hurry about it? On the contrary, it was generally admitted that the present system of administering county business had been most admirable, being efficient and economical. A little delay would, if anything, be an advantage as giving time for preparation and consideration, and he desired to enter his protest against the proposal of the Government to suspend the Standing Orders and hurry the Bill through.

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, that if it were hereafter found that this Bill did not work well, there would be great regret in this House that it had not received due consideration, and he hoped that the responsibility would then rest where it ought to rest—namely, on Her Majesty's Government, who had denied their Lordships the opportunity of giving it full consideration.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he agreed that the alteration in the present system of county government was not a matter of great urgency; but this Bill was connected with financial changes which could not come into operation until the Local Government Bill was passed, and which would be very satisfactory to the rural population. He did not think that that population would be grateful to the noble Earl if he were to succeed in postponing those financial changes for another year. As to the actual proposal to suspend the Standing Order, he should not make it if he thought any considerable number of their Lordships objected, though the consequences of its not being made would be that this House would have to sit on Thursday, and possibly Friday. If there was any considerable body of their Lordships who wished to consider the Bill on third reading, the Government did not desire to stand in the way of their doing so.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he ventured to say that their Lordships would be perfectly willing to put on one side their private and personal convenience in order to secure the consideration of this Bill, which seemed to him to be a Bill of a very important character. It was admitted on all hands that the measure was defective in its construction. The practice of enumerating clauses had been constantly condemned on both sides of the House in the strongest language, and by the highest possible authority. In many cases, no doubt, this was inevitable, and the imperfections of Parliamentary and Party Government, he supposed, were like the imperfections of human nature. But this measure, by the confession of everybody, involved very serious principles, and principles which he believed were very dangerous. It was a part of a larger measure which would sweep away an ancient, a well-tried, and a successful institution of the country. For 300 years and more that institution had stood the test of all trials; for 300 years and more it had exercised a vast influence—an influence which both sides admitted to be wholesome and wise. But that was now to be swept away by a measure which any of their Lordships would be pleased to discuss when it came before them. The Bill now under discussion, however, was intertwined with that measure—it was a part of the larger measure; and he was, therefore, very sorry to see it hurried through by the suspension of the Standing Order. The Bill, in his opinion, contained very questionable, if not dangerous, principles.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, it was only because he believed that the Bill in its present shape was acceptable to the vast majority of their Lordships that they ventured to move the suspension of the Standing Order.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3^d, and passed.

LLOYD'S SIGNAL STATIONS BILL.

(The Earl of Onslow.)

(NO. 84.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (The Earl of Onslow), in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said it would go a long way to bring about the introduction of electricity to lighthouses round the coasts.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Onslow.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly.

FACTORY AND WORKSHOPS ACT (1878) AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(The Earl of Aberdeen.)

(NO. 76.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it only applied to burghs in Scotland, and was rendered necessary by a change that had taken place respecting the observance of Fast Days, which was a distinctly Scottish institution. For some time past the observance of Fast Days in Scotland had greatly fallen into disuse, not from any want of fidelity towards religious ordinances, but rather because if the old system were to be maintained it would have to be maintained more frequently than formerly. The Fast Days in Scotland had long filled the place of the observance of Good Friday and Bank Holidays in England, and the object of the Bill was to secure that the persons employed in factories should have a holiday on such days as there was a general holiday in the district where these factories were placed. Under previous Acts dealing with this subject it was provided that the two holidays should be the Fast Days. Now that the Fast Days had been largely discontinued, they were left the holidays, but no certain day was fixed. The Bill provided that the magistrates in burghs where no Fast Days were kept should appoint two holidays in the year at an interval of not less than two months. He had been asked why it was not applied to the whole of Scotland. There were two reasons why it had not been made to apply to the whole of Scotland. The first was that it was mainly in burghs that the institution of Fast Days had been discontinued, and therefore in counties opinion was not so ripe for the change; and, secondly, that the Bill would not have received such general approval as it did if it had applied to the whole country. He therefore thought it desirable that the Bill should be confined to the burghs. He hoped the House would give the Bill a second reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Aberdeen.)

LORD BALFOUR said, he thought the reasons given for confining the Bill to burghs were hardly sufficient. He knew that many country districts as well as burghs had discontinued the Fast Days, and in some of these, as in his own parish, there were more than one factory. Yet no provision was made for a holiday. It might thus happen that while in an adjoining burgh there would be a holiday, those employed in a neighbouring factory situated in the county would have none. He therefore thought it a most extraordinary proposal that a Bill of this kind should be made to apply only to burghs. In his opinion it would have been a less evil to have waited until next year, when there would probably be a County Bill for Scotland, and then the necessary steps could have been taken to give the power of appointing these holidays to the Local Authority.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly.

LOCAL BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND) BILL.

(The Lord Ashbourne.)

(NO. 93.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
(The Lord Ashbourne.)

LORD FITZGERALD, in moving that the second reading of the Bill be postponed till after the Whitsuntide Recess, said, his object in doing so was to get time for the consideration of its provisions by the great bodies in that country who were interested in the matter. His noble and learned Friend had not given any reason whatever for pressure being put upon their Lordships to force this Bill through the House at this particular time. There was in Ireland a society known as the Incorporated Society of Solicitors. It was a body similar in all respects to the well-known body of the same name in England. He had received a letter from the secretary of that Society to-day, stating that he had only received a copy of the Bill yesterday, and that he had not had time to consider it, and he had not time to call the council of the Society together, as they were scattered throughout the country, and the few members of the Society that he had communicated with had expressed their disapproval of the Bill. It was curious that, with respect to a Bill of this character, they should be asked to pass the second reading without any explanation. Amongst the letters which he had received on the subject of this Bill was one which he had received that morning, in which the writer stated that the Recorder of Cork, who was to be one of the Judges under this Bill, entirely disapproved of it, and that the mercantile community of Cork did not accept it. This, as their Lordships would see, was a Bill to constitute certain Local Bankruptcy Courts in Ireland. When a similar Bill was last before the House of Commons it was opposed by the Public Bodies. The circumstances of the country had since altered; but the alteration of the circumstances made the case much stronger against the Bill. The proposal made by this Bill involved considerable expense, and it rested upon a wrong principle. Another Bill—the Judicature (Ireland) Bill—had been brought into the House of Commons, which was an adoption, to some extent, of the provisions of a Bill of Lord Spencer's in 1855. It related to the judicial system in Ireland, and proposed to abolish the two bankruptcy Courts in Dublin, and to transfer their business ultimately to the Superior Court. While it was thus proposed to abolish the two Bankruptcy Courts in Dublin, which were at present efficiently administering the Irish Bankruptcy Law, the noble and learned Lord proposed to continue the administration of this condemned bankruptcy system by instituting a number of local Courts with official staffs, necessitating great expense. This Bill proposed to provide a Local Bankruptcy Court for Belfast, including portions of the Counties of Antrim and Down, with a population of 950,000; and it proposed a similar Court for the City and County of Cork, with a population of 750,000; and the Lord Lieutenant would have power, by Order in Council, to establish Local Bankruptcy Courts also in Londonderry, Galway, Waterford, and Limerick, or any of those places. The Bill provided that the Recorders of Londonderry and Galway, as well as Belfast and Cork, should be the Bankruptcy Judges for those towns. The County Court Judges of Waterford and Limerick should also be constituted Bankruptcy Judges for the purpose of carrying out the Bankruptcy Law. These proposals must necessarily involve very considerable expense, because anyone who knew anything about Bankruptcy Law knew that it could only be carried out by a trained Judge and a trained staff. Then there was to be a registrar for each Court; there was to be an official assignee, who was a very important officer, and there was to be such other clerks and officers as the Lord Lieutenant might consider it necessary to appoint. He did not particularly understand those provisions of the Bill by which the Counties of Antrim and Down were to be distributed in such a way that Antrim might become part of Down, and Down part of Antrim, for the purposes of bankruptcy jurisdiction, and in Cork in the same way the East Riding was to become part of the West Riding, and the West Riding part of the East Riding, for the same purposes. The Bankruptcy Judges must reside in the places in which they officiated all the year round. It was also provided by the Bill that compensation should be given to the official assignee in Dublin, and it contained a sweeping clause for the appointment by the Lord Chancellor of all the other necessary officials whose appointment was not otherwise provided for, so that their Lordships would see that this was a very sweeping measure of expenditure. In 1883 it was proposed in the House of Lords that Mr. Chamberlain's Act should be extended to Ireland, and the same proposition had been made, he believed, in the House of Commons, but it was thought then that it was better that it should not extend to Ireland immediately, but that they should wait, and if its operation was successful that it might then be extended to it with such Amendments as suited the institutions of the country. But there was no such object aimed at by this Bill. If Belfast and Cork wished to have local Courts he did not object to it, but let the bankruptcy system be put upon a proper basis. He had in his hand a document sent to him by a Dublin solicitor in which he gave an estimate of the bankruptcy business of the whole country. From this it appeared that the total liabilities amounted to £364,457 for one year, of which sum £6,840 represented the bankruptcies that arose in Belfast. That would show that the establishment of a Local Bankruptcy Court there was not so very pressing a necessity. The solicitor further stated that when the Bankruptcy Bill was formerly introduced, he was asked by the Home Trade Association of Manchester to explain its provisions, and the result was that the Home Trade Association arrived at three resolutions to the effect—(1) that the business of the Bankruptcy Courts in Ireland was not sufficient to occupy the time of a single Judge of ordinary business capacity; (2) that if the small business was distributed over the country it would weaken the central Court; and (3) that it would be inconvenient for the merchants to be professionally represented in the various local districts. This Bill was only intended for the convenience of debtors, and not for the convenience of creditors, while it did not provide a small bankruptcy jurisdiction which would enable small traders and small farmers to have their affairs settled expeditiously and inexpensively. The Bill, as he had said, was expensive, unnecessary at present, and not based upon a right principle, and he hoped time would be allowed to examine its provisions before the second reading was taken.

Moved, "That the further Debate be adjourned."—(The Lord Fitzgerald.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (Lord ASHBOURNE) hoped that their Lordships would not assent to the proposal of the noble and learned Lord. The provisions of the Bill were explained when it was introduced, 10 days ago, and had been circulated for eight days. He came over from Ireland last week with the intention of moving its second reading. The noble and learned Lord opposite asked him a few days ago to postpone his Motion for the second reading of the Bill until after the Whitsuntide recess. He told the noble and learned Lord that he could not do that, but that he would, in order to suit his convenience, postpone his Motion until to-day. In these circumstances he thought that their Lordships would agree that he had done all that courtesy required of him in the matter. His time was not his own, and it was not easy for him to be away from his duties in Dublin, and he had done everything he could to meet his noble and learned Friend. With regard to the provisions of the Bill he would remind their Lordships that now-a-days the desire was that there should be a local administration in the case of bankruptcy, and in his opinion it was most desirable that the great places in Ireland, such as Cork and Belfast, and possibly also other places, should have Bankruptcy Courts of their own. He had previously explained that. As far back as 1879, Lord Cairns gave the great authority of his name to a measure practically almost identical with that now before their Lordships. That Bill passed through their Lordships' House with the approval of both sides in all its stages; it passed two readings in the House of Commons, and was only lost in consequence of the close of the Session rendering it impossible that it should be carried. In 1883, a similar Bill was prepared by the Government of the day, and was supported by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Spencer). The present measure was drawn upon almost identical lines with that Bill. In the last Session of Parliament there were three Bills brought in on this subject. They were not confined to one side of the House, and commanded support from politicians of every shade of opinion, and one of those Bills was actually sent to a Select Committee, and it was in its essential details largely identical with the present Bill. How had the noble and learned Lord met the Motion for the second reading? The noble and learned Lord asked that the Motion should be postponed, on the ground that the law societies in Ireland had not had sufficient time to consider its provisions. It would, however, have been very easy for those societies to have obtained copies of the Bill in ample time for them to consider it before the second reading. The principle of the present measure had been known for years. The noble and learned Lord said that he objected to this measure on the ground that it proposed to perpetuate the condemned Irish bankruptcy system. He denied that the present system of Irish bankruptcy had been condemned; on the contrary, it had worked very well, and the noble and learned Lord was the last person who ought to condemn it, seeing that he was the author of it himself. Ireland had been excluded from the scope of Mr. Chamberlain's Bankruptcy Act, because Ireland had an existing Bankruptcy Law, which on the whole worked well, according to the requirements of the country. There was no condemned bankruptcy system in Ireland. The Irish bankruptcy system had worked well, though he did not say that there might not be Amendments made in it. There might be Amendments made it, but at present he did not know that there was any demand from any considerable section of opinion in the country for anything like a change in the Irish Bankruptcy Law. The noble and learned Lord had referred to the Irish Judicature Bill before the other House, but it proposed to make no change in the bankruptcy laws. It only proposed to abolish the existing Bankruptcy Court in Dublin as a separate Court, handing over the jurisdiction as a going concern to the High Court. He would reserve his answers to the detailed criticism till the Committee stage, and he would be glad if his noble and learned Friend would furnish him with any figures or statements he might have, in order that he might consider and examine them. But he asked their Lordships to say, was it reasonable that great commercial communities with growing populations like Belfast and Cork should not have a local bankruptcy jurisdiction? In order to afford their Lordships time to examine all the details of the Bill, he proposed to postpone the Committee stage till the 8th of June, if that would meet the convenience of their Lordships.

LORD HERSCHELL said, that neither he nor any noble Lord, he believed, on the Opposition side of the House objected to the localization of bankruptcy jurisdiction. The Bill of 1883 was not extended to Ireland—though they had been pressed in the Grand Committee by Irish Members, and especially by Representatives from Ulster to extend it—because there was a sufficiently strong minority in the House of Commons to hamper the further passage of the Bill, and it was naturally not considered desirable to import an Irish discussion into the debates upon that Bill. The reason Ireland was excluded was not because the Irish people were satisfied with the existing system, but for the reason he had stated. There had now been several years' experience of the working of the Act in England, which had been sufficient to disclose its advantages and disadvantages. He believed that it would be a great benefit to Ireland if the advantages found to proceed from the English system were extended to her.

LORD FITZGERALD said, that what he meant by the condemned system was that the passing of Mr. Chamberlain's Act, which condemned the English bankruptcy system, had also condemned the Irish bankruptcy system, because the two systems were identical previous to the passing of that Act. The former English system was the present Irish system. He spoke of the principle of the system, not of the machinery. It is true that 31 years ago he carried through the House of Commons a Bankruptcy Bill, which continued to be the law; that was much altered by the Bill of 1872, but its principles were condemned by the Bill of 1883, with which he had nothing to do.

On Question? Resolved in the Negative; Then the original Motion was agreed to; and Bill read 2^d accordingly; and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday the 8th of June next.

GLEBE LANDS BILL.—(No. 100.)

(Viscount Cross.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1 (Short title and extent of Act) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Application by incumbent to Land Commissioners for sale of Glebe).

LORD ADDINGTON said, he rose to propose an Amendment, the effect of which was to make it necessary for an incumbent to obtain the consent of the patron of his living before applying to the Land Commissioners for a sale of the glebe land of the parish. He urged that to give the incumbent the power of absolutely disposing of the glebe of the parish without the consent of the patron was a very dangerous proceeding.

Amendment moved, in line 7, after ("benefice"), insert ("with the consent of the patron.")—(The Lord Addington.)

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross) said, he must oppose the Amendment, which would result in very few sales being carried out. Ample provision was made by the Bill for the just rights of the patron by making it necessary that notice should be given him so that he could object, if he saw fit, before the Land Commissioners who had to decide the matter.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he thought that there was a great deal to be said in favour of the Amendment of the noble Lord, and that it could not be quite so easily disposed of as the noble Viscount appeared to think. The law now gave the patron considerable rights in restraint of alienation on the part of the incumbent. He could conceive many cases in which it would not be for the permanent good of the living that the glebe should be sold. Frequently a clergyman had private means, and wished to make alterations in the parsonage-house which would be entirely unsuitable for a poorer successor. He thought it salutary that the patron, as a representative of the lay element, should have something to say in these matters.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of Salisbury) said, he would urge their Lordships to adopt the clause in its present shape, not as a privilege to the clergy, but as a distinct measure of public policy, the object being, wherever it could be done, that clergymen should no longer trust to so uncertain, so embarrassing, and so cruel a source of income as glebe land. The sufferings of many of the clergy had been extreme in consequence of this having been their one source of income. The teachings of the time had pressed upon the mind of Parliament the necessity for taking measures to discourage the continued existence of this source of income. If it were intended to produce any results, the machinery of the Act must be made to work as smoothly as possible. If, after the machinery were set going by the clergyman, the necessity of the patron's consent was interposed, it would be found that friction would result, and the machinery would never be got to move. What would happen would be that the clergyman would go to the patron; the patron might be a minor, or he might be abroad, or he might be a very old man who did not like to be disturbed, or, perhaps, a man who quarrelled with the Church and never spoke to the clergyman, or perhaps a man who did not like the land to be let on building leases, because it would interfere with his privacy, and so it would be impossible to sell the glebe at all. When all these difficulties had been overcome, the family solicitor might consider whether it was not a breach of trust, and whether the patron was doing the best thing possible for some possible future presentee. He thought their Lordships would be very hard-hearted indeed to introduce these additional difficulties.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3, 4, and 5 agreed to.

Clause 6 (Provision where land is subject to mortgage or other debt).

Amendment moved,

In Sub-section 2, page 4, line 37, leave out ("so") and insert ("provided that no mortgage created for a limited term, and which is by statute only repayable by annual instalments out of the income of the benefice within such term, shall be discharged out of the purchase money of land sold under this Act, and"): line 38, leave out ("is") and insert ("shall be.")—(The Earl of Powis.)

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he thought the Amendment was of great importance, as he had known not a few cases in which great difficulties had been caused by very imprudent borrowing on the part of the clergymen.

VISCOUNT CROSS was now unwilling to accept the actual words of the Amendment, but he hoped to be able, before the next stage of the Bill, to meet the view of the right rev. Prelate and of his noble Friend.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 (Provision as to annual charges on benefice) agreed to.

Clause 8 (As to sale).

On the Motion of Viscount Cross, Amendment made—In page 5, line 24, at end insert as a separate paragraph:—

"Before approving of a sale under this Act of glebe land of any benefice, the Land Commissioners shall require such notice of the proposed sale to be given as they think sufficient to give information thereof to the parishioners."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 9 (Power to make rules).

On the Motion of Viscount Cross, Amendment made—In page 6, line 1, leave out ("sales of land by and other"); page 6, line 4, leave out from ("Act") to ("and") in line 5.

The Report of Amendments to be received on Monday the 4th of June next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 119.)

CORONERS BILL.—(No. 36.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY), in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the first part dealt with the powers of the Coroner to hold certain inquests, and the second part with the mode of his election. There appeared to be a general consensus of opinion on the 1st section of the Bill, which gave the Coroner power to hold inquests in respect of fires. He was not sure that such power did not already exist. Such inquests used to be held, but owing to a legal decision that had been given by the Courts, they had been discontinued. However, it was felt that a power to hold such inquests ought to exist, and it was consequently conferred by this Bill. The subject of the mode of election of the Coroner was a more debatable matter, and though he had read a great number of communications, which all concurred in condemning the present practice as an intolerable nuisance, there was no such unanimity as to the system to be substituted for it. At present every freeholder in the district was entitled to vote at an election of a Coroner, no matter how limited his freehold or how recently he might have become possessed of it. There was, therefore, no register and great confusion, with consequent enormous expense, and many a candidate had been ruined by his success or failure. It had been suggested that the Parliamentary constituency should be substituted. There was a particular objection to that part of the Bill which vested the appointment of Coroners in the Lord Chancellor. His mind was quite open upon this matter, and he certainly should not jealously claim the patronage which the Bill gave him. It might be suggested that the new County Councils should have the power of appointing Coroners; but the objection would at once arise that this could not be provided in the Bill, because no such Bodies existed at the present time. Even if they did, it would require consideration whether the election of Coroners by those who were themselves an elected body was altogether a desirable mode of meeting the difficulty. All he would say at present, therefore, was that the present system ought to be altered, and that when the Bill reached Committee he should gladly welcome any suggestion which would get rid of the difficulty. The responsibility of appointing Coroners was not one which he had desired to attach to the Office of Lord Chancellor. He asked their Lordships to read the Bill a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

land. Certainly, if ever the land was parted with, it should go to the labouring classes. It was now held by the Crown, and he was of opinion that they had no right to part with it for the private advantage of a few individuals. He, therefore, respectfully submitted that it was only right and fair to appoint a Select Committee to ascertain what the value of the Canal was which that House, out of its bounty, proposed to confer upon the Lagan Navigation Company as a free gift; who the parties were who had the right to claim it as a free gift; and what they intended to do with it when it was handed over to them. Under these circumstances, he ventured to suggest that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, partly nominated by the House and partly by the Committee of Selection. He was only anxious to protect the public interest, and at the present moment he would confine himself to moving that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER said, the Bill was referred in the ordinary way to a Committee yesterday. The question, therefore, would be that the Order to refer the Bill to a Committee be discharged, and that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order [14th May] for Committee, be read and discharged, and that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee."—(Mr. T. M. Healy).

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.) said, he hoped the House would not consent to shelve this Bill, as would practically be the case if the Motion of the hon. and learned Member were agreed to. The hon. and learned Member had clearly shown by his own statement that all he wished to do could easily be accomplished when the Report of the Committee came back before the whole House. He had already called attention to the fact that the Bill went before a Select Committee in 1886.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Not this Bill, but a Public Bill.

COLONEL WARING said, it was a Bill that was practically the same as the present measure, having identically the same objects in view, the only difference being that it was introduced as a Public instead of a Private Bill. That Committee presented a Report, and the recommendations contained in that Report were available to any hon. Member if he chose to enlighten himself on the subject, before assenting to the unusual course proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman. He thought the Financial Secretary to the Treasury made it very clear the other day how the matter stood. The hon. Gentleman was quite aware of the dangers which had been pointed out by the hon. and learned Member opposite, and intimated that the Government intended to take precautions against the acquisition of this property by the Great Northern Railway Company, or against the Lagan Navigation Company being able to use it as their own private property. It appeared to him that the course taken by the Financial Secretary practically settled the whole question, and that it was not necessary to send the Bill to a Committee upstairs, from which it would never emerge.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, he hoped the House would not consent to the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy). The measure would save the taxpayers of the country £1,200 a-year, which they were now paying, and it proposed to confer a great boon upon the mercantile community of the North of Ireland. The Company who were to take over the Undertaking were quite willing to meet fairly all the objections which had been raised. They were quite prepared to meet the case of the leases in East Tyrone, and to prevent the ultimate sale of the Canal to the Great Northern Railway Company. They were willing to insert clauses in the Bill upon those two points. That would be satisfactory to the House. As to the question of the Government lending money to the Company on their security, he thought that was a matter for the Government, and not for hon. Members below the Gangway. The House need not fear that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury would not be able to take care of the Government in that matter. Therefore, he hoped that the House would not consent to take an unusual course with regard to the Bill, but that it should be allowed to go through the usual course appointed for Private Bills. It was an Unopposed Bill, and ought to take the ordinary course.

SIR WILLIAM EWART (Belfast, N.) said, he had also to express a hope that the House would not consent to the Motion. On behalf of the mercantile community of the North of Ireland, he strongly deprecated any further delay in regard to the passing of the Bill, which had now been before the House consecutively for several years. The opposition to which the measure had been subjected had deprived the North of Ireland of the great advantages which were expected to accrue from the passing of the Bill. The hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) had mentioned several points, which he thought should be inquired into by a Select Committee; but it might be pointed out that if the Bill went before the Chairman of Ways and Means in the ordinary way, ample care would be taken to insert provisions in the Bill to guard the interests of the State and of the general public. He trusted that those who agreed with him in the propriety of pressing the Bill forward would lend every assistance in their power in resisting the Motion, and so far as the Treasury was concerned, he maintained that it was quite fit to take care of itself. The Motion would involve delay, and he could not shut his eyes to the fact that there was very great danger in delay. He, therefore, trusted that the House would not consent to refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's) supported the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford, to send the Bill to a Select Committee. It was quite clear that at that period of the Session, if it were referred to a Select Committee and came down to the House again after Whitsuntide, they would be in a position to pass it without further delay. The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) had given insufficient grounds for opposing the Motion, and it was obvious that the measure contained many points which a Select Committee could alone deal with fitly. For instance, it had already been pointed out that there was no guarantee contained in the measure that the Company to whom the property was to be handed over would be prevented from selling it afterwards to the Great Northern Railway Company. He saw no force in the objections of the hon. Members for South Tyrone, North Down (Colonel Waring), North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson), and other Members from the North of Ireland, for, if the Bill went before a Select Committee, they would really have the question in their own hands, as a majority of the Select Committee proposed by the hon. Member for North Longford was composed of the Friends of those hon. Gentlemen.

SIR JOHN MOWBRAY (Oxford University) said, he gathered from the conversation which had taken place that it was considered desirable to discuss certain details of the Bill with a view of introducing changes, and it was suggested that the only way of doing that was to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. The real question was whether the Bill, being an Unopposed Bill, it was to go before the ordinary tribunal, or to be sent to a Select Committee. He thought the House would do wisely to accede to the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healey), and he would suggest that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee of seven Members, four to be appointed by the House, and three by the Committee of Selection.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he was quite ready to accept the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet, and he was also prepared to allow the Committee to be nominated by the Committee of Selection.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) said, he sincerely trusted that the Government would not consent to the proposal of the hon. and learned Member opposite. It was most unaccountable why the hon. and learned Gentleman should so bitterly oppose this Bill. He represented a constituency through which the Canal passed, and he must be aware that all sections of the community were unanimously in favour of the measure. The only objection which had been urged against it came from the hon. Member for West Cavan (Mr. Biggar), who, for some reason or other, had got at the cog wheels of the Bill and interfered with its progress. The objections of the hon. Member for West Cavan were that no further money should be advanced for the purposes of the Canal, and precautions should be taken to prevent the possibility of the property being sold to a Railway Company. The Government had already expressed their intention of so altering the provisions of the Bill that that would be rendered impossible. The Bill was one of very happy augury. It was the only Bill upon which Irishmen of all Parties agreed. It was absolutely non-contentious, and it was much desired by all persons in the part in which he lived and in the districts through which the Canal passed. He, therefore, trusted that the House would pass the Bill without further delay. The right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken said that there had been no discussion upon the details of the Bill, but the Bill itself had been gone into over and over again on the Floor of that House. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: Never.] If not this Bill, at any rate a similar measure, and never was a Bill brought in which had received more general acceptance than this proposal. He, therefore, hoped that hon. Members opposite would withdraw their opposition, as he had said the only reason why the Bill had not been passed long ago was from some cause or other with which he was not acquainted. The hon. Member for East Cavan had interfered with the cog wheels of the Bill, and they had stuck ever since.

MR. O'HANLAN (Cavan, E.) rose to Order. Was the hon. and gallant Gentleman entitled to say that the Member for East Cavan had opposed the Bill? He (Mr. O'Hanlon) was Member for East Cavan, and never did anything of the kind.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER said, the Question did not involve a point of Order.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said, that it would appear in the Division which was taken yesterday, several Members of the Party below the Gangway on the other side of the House were in favour of the Bill.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) said, that in consequence of what took place yesterday, he had made some inquiry, and he found that there was no objection on the part of the promoters to insert that clause in the Bill to meet the objections which had been taken by the hon. and learned Member for North Longford, and to make it certain that the Great Northern Railway Company, to whom the hon. and learned Gentleman referred, should be prevented from ever acquiring the Canal, it would be necessary to insert in the Bill a clause to that effect, and it could be added in Committee.

As he had said yesterday, he believed that could be done in one of two ways—either in the agreement, which would have to be drawn up between the Lagan Navigation Company and the Commissioners of Works, or by the insertion of a clause in the Bill. His own impression was that it would be better to insert a clause in the Bill, and if that course were taken, it would be necessary either to insert it in the Committee to which the Bill was referred, or when the Bill itself came back to the House. He did not think there was much difference as to which course was adopted, and, therefore, he had come to the conclusion, after the advice which had been given by the Chairman of the Committee of Selection, that the best course would be to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, and allow the names of the Committee to be nominated by the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Committee of Selection. He advised his hon. Friend who was in charge of the Bill to accept the Motion. He wished to take that opportunity of pointing out that several Members had spoken of the possibility of handing over property to the extent of £250,000 to the Lagan Navigation Company, and of that Company being in a position to dispose of it to somebody else. The hon. and learned Member for North Longford could not have read the provisions of the Bill, or he would not have made that statement. Any such proposal must receive the sanction of the Board of Works in writing before it could be carried out.

MR. T. M. HEALY remarked that it might receive the sanction of that Board.

MR. JACKSON said, it must also receive the sanction of the Treasury, and, therefore, there was every safeguard that the property would not be disposed of without due consideration. He had said that the precautions which were necessary could be provided for in the agreement between the Government and the Lagan Navigation Company; but it could also be done by the insertion of a clause in Committee. He, therefore, supported the Motion to refer the Bill to a Select Committee with the view of having a new clause inserted.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) said, that the Bill was a most important one for the community of Belfast, and the whole of the North of Ireland. He, therefore, hoped, if the House consented to refer it to a Select Committee, that the Committee would be nominated and sit at the earliest moment possible, so that the consideration of the Bill might be proceeded with at once.

SIR CHARLES LEWIS (Antrim, N.) said, that as the ordinary course was not to be taken in regard to the Bill, he thought it would be much better to dispose of the question to-day, and accept the Committee as proposed to be nominated by the hon. and learned Member opposite, instead of referring it to the Committee of Selection to nominate the Members. If it were in Order, he was certainly of opinion that it would be far better to settle the matter at once.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.) said, that as a Committee was to be granted, he hoped there would be no delay in making progress with the Bill; but that every step would be taken to expedite its progress. He trusted that the Secretary to the Treasury, in framing Amendments, would have an eye to the best means of securing the running of the Canal. It would be most disastrous if, when the property had passed from the Government to the Lagan Company, it were found that, in the course of a few months or years, the traffic on the Canal was altogether abandoned. The House had been told that the land on the banks of the Canal might sell for £5,000, and unless proper precautions were taken, the Company to whom the Canal might be handed over might sell that.

MR. JACKSON: Not without the consent of the Government.

MR. JORDAN said, it was very easy sometimes to get the consent even of high officials. He understood the Financial Secretary to state distinctly that the Lagan Company would not be allowed to sell or lease the Canal to the Great Northern Railway Company or to any other Railway Company. It was most desirable that a provision to that effect should be inserted in the Bill, and, above all, that a further provision should be inserted to provide that if the Company at any time chose to give up the property, it should revert again to the Crown in the position in which it stood at present. If these conditions were observed, he should have great pleasure in supporting the Motion for the reference of the Bill to a Select Committee, and he hoped the proceedings of the Committee would be expedited and not delayed, so that the Bill might pass during the present Session.

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.) said, he must express the hope that the House would now adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University (Sir John Mowbray), and refer the Bill to a Select Committee. It was quite clear from what had already passed that this would cause no unnecessary delay—on the contrary, the provisions of the Bill would be carefully considered, and it was highly probable that the settlement of the question would be expedited by reference to a Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Committee do consist of Seven Members.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Does the hon. and learned Member for North Longford propose to move the names now?

MR. T. M. HEALY: No; to-morrow. He trusted that as the Government had adopted his suggestion, and as the general sense of the House was favourable to it, they would themselves nominate the Committee. He would, therefore, simply move the remainder of the Resolution.

Ordered, That Four Members of the Committee be nominated by the House.

Ordered, That Three Members of the Committee be nominated by the Committee of Selection.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL asked, when the names of the Committee would be moved?

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he should be ready to do so to-morrow; but he thought it would be better after what had passed, for the Government Whips to undertake the duty. He had very little knowledge of these matters himself, as might be seen from the fact that he had put down the Chairman of Ways and Means, who would naturally be an ex officio Member of the Committee. He thought it would be better either for the Government or the Chairman of the Committee of Selection to have the nomination of the Committee.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL asked, whether the Government would accept the proposal of the hon. and learned Member to nominate the Committee to-morrow?

SIR JOHN MOWBRAY said, he thought it was desirable that the Committee should be nominated, in order that the Committee of Selection, when it met on Thursday, might be in a position to add three more Members.

MR. JACKSON said, he imagined there would be no difficulty in agreeing upon four names, and he would put them on the Paper to-morrow.

QUESTIONS.

IMPERIAL DEFENCES AT HOME AND ABROAD.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland) asked the Secretary of State for War, If he can state the designs upon which fortifications are now being constructed for the defence of our coaling stations abroad; the designs of fortifications, and weight of guns, intended to be adopted for the protection of military and commercial harbours at home; whether any of the new defensive works will be so constructed as to resist dynamite shells; and, how far, and in what manner, local Naval Reserves, Militia, and Volunteers are to be organized and utilized in connection with the proposed works?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): In answer to the first two Questions of the hon. Member, I am not prepared to publish to the world the details for which he asks. The details already published were very carefully considered by my Military Advisers and myself; and those only were given which could be given in the interest of the Public Service. In answer to the third Question, I would remind the hon. Member that many of the guns will be mounted on disappearing carriages. In answer to the fourth Question, we propose to utilize to the full all the Auxiliary Forces of every description.

MR. GOURLEY asked, whether any works had actually been commenced in connection with our military and commercial harbours?

MR. E. STANHOPE said, this was a very comprehensive Question to ask. It was rather one for the debate to-night.

IMPERIAL DEFENCES—THE COALING STATIONS.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he will inform the House the names of all the coaling stations which are now being wholly or partially fortified, and what stock of coal the Government intend maintaining, as a minimum quantity, at each depôt at home and abroad for the use of the Fleets; whether any system has been adopted for the purpose of replenishing stations in the event of hostilities; if so, what; and, whether it is intended that stocks of coal shall be maintained during war for the use of steamers of the Mercantile Marine as well as of the Navy?

THE FIRST LORD (LORD GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The hon. Member will find the information he asks for, with reference to the defence of the coaling stations, at page 11 of the Secretary of State for War's Memorandum accompanying the Army Estimates of this year. It is undesirable, in the public interest, to state either the stocks of coal which it is intended to maintain at these stations, or the system that has been adopted for replenishing them. The stocks of coal that the Admiralty keep are for their own use.

WAR OFFICE—ROYAL COMMISSION ON WARLIKE STORES.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the fact that the Royal Commission on Warlike Stores held their final meeting and ceased to exist on or before December, 1887; whether they received the Report on the Collingwood gun, and reported on it, before they were dissolved; where those documents are now; whether he will state the names of those officials who have withheld the Report since December, 1887; and, how he proposes to deal with them?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I do not think that even an hon. Member of this House is justified, without ample evidence, in making the charge against public servants that they have wilfully suppressed public documents of importance. In this case there is no such evidence. No such Report has been received. But after a charge of this sort has been made, I think it just to the Department to publish at once Colonel Hope's Report, and the observations of the Ordnance Committee upon it.

LAND COURT (IRELAND)—FAIR RENTS

—MR. J. J. HICKEY, OF CULLIN, MILLSTREET, CO. CORK.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Mr. John J. Hickey, of Lisnaboy, Cullin, Millstreet, County Cork, who served an originating notice on his landlord, Mr. French, to have a fair rent fixed by the Land Court, in the month of December, 1886, and whose name was not placed on the list for hearing by the Commissioners at Millstreet in 1887; whether this was owing to pressure of business; what were the number of cases listed and heard at that sitting of the Commission; whether it is a fact that Mr. Hickey's case is not even yet listed for hearing; whether he is aware that there are 12 similar cases in the parish of Cullin; and, whether the judicial rent, which may be fixed in pursuance of the notice of December, 1886, will date from the gale day following?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN) (Dublin University): My attention has been called to the case referred to. The Land Commissioners inform me that the case of John J. Hickey was listed for hearing at Millstreet last October, and was No. 151 on the list. The Sub-Commission was not able to reach the case owing to pressure of business. The number of cases listed for that sitting from the Union of Millstreet was 14, none of which were reached at the last sitting of the Sub-Commission in that district. Hickey's case will appear in the list for the next sitting, which will probably take place in July. The answer to the last paragraph of the Question is in the affirmative.

In reply to a further Question by DR. TANNER,

MR. MADDEN said, he had no reason to doubt the statement that the originating notice in this case had been served in 1886.

Mr. E. Stanhope

DR. TANNER asked the right hon. Gentleman, whether he was aware that his Predecessor had stated that the case was not listed in 1886; and, whether it was a fact that at the last sitting of the Court only two cases were heard?

MR. MADDEN said, the facts were substantially as stated in the Question. The case was not listed till last year. It would be taken up at the next sitting.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL RESOLUTIONS—BOTTLED WINES.

MR. KING (Hull, Central) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is aware that the Resolution with regard to duties on bottled wines having been passed on the 26th of March, the Board of Customs nevertheless afterwards issued a General Order which was forwarded to Hull, dated the 19th of April, 1888, that all still wines in bond on 27th of March, or placed in bond before the 10th of April, which had been described in Customs Warehouse Entries as of a value not exceeding 20s. per dozen quarts, should be admitted at the old rate of duty; by whose authority such Order was issued; whether it was legal for any Department to issue an Order making exceptions in the case of particular goods coming under the Resolution adopted by the House; whether he is aware that the effect of the Order has been that a large quantity of low priced German and French wines has been cleared; and, on what ground the Order was given, and how much wine has been cleared under the Order?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): In reply to the hon. Member's first Question, I have to say that an Order, such as he describes, was issued by the Board of Customs, not limited to Hull, but extending to all other warehousing ports, authorizing the admission, free of the additional Wine Duties levied under the Resolution of the 26th of March last, of still bottled wine which had been imported and bonded between the 27th of March and the 10th of April, and had been described in the Customs warehousing entries as of a value not exceeding 20s. per dozen quarts. The Order was issued on my authority, and according to precedent. It is true that no executive authority has, strictly speaking, a defined right to remit duties which the Legislature says are to be collected; but there must always be, of necessity, an administrative discretion to some extent, on equitable grounds, and such a discretion was exercised in 1845 and in 1870 in relation to the Sugar Duties. Goods imported, and in bond in particular "packages" rendered suddenly liable to a tax because of that package, but capable of being, and which under the tax would be, packed otherwise, have, in extreme cases, some claim in equity to the exercise of such administrative discretion. If the hon. Member will look at Parliamentary Paper No. 281 of 1870 he will find a Treasury Minute issued in a parallel case of administrative discretion applied to the Sugar Duties, with the reasons and precedents for exceptional remission. In reply to his fourth Question, I have to say that there has been no abnormal increase in the quantities of low priced German and French wines cleared. It is estimated that 5,000 dozen bottles have been cleared under this provision.

POST OFFICE (EDINBURGH) — SURVEYOR OF THE MIDLAND DISTRICT.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether the office of the surveyor of the Midland District of Scotland is part of the establishment of the Post Office in Edinburgh; whether two of the clerks in the surveyor's office in Edinburgh also hold appointments on the staff of the Dundee Post Office; whether they are each paid the proper salary for the Edinburgh appointment and another salary for the Dundee appointment; and, whether they perform any duties in Dundee; and, if not, whether the duties connected with their appointments are performed by clerks at a considerably lower salary than that paid to the clerks who nominally hold the appointments but perform no duty?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RANKES) (Cambridge University): The office of the Surveyor of the Midland District of Scotland is not part of the establishment of the Post Office in Edinburgh. In accordance with a Rule applicable to the whole of the United Kingdom, the Surveyor's stationary clerks are borne on the establishment of Provincial post offices. The Post Office on the establishment of which the stationary clerks to the Surveyor of the Midland District of Scotland are borne is Dundee; and it is only the salary which they would receive were they employed at Dundee that they receive as stationary clerks. Over and above this salary they receive a special allowance; but it is not the case that, in consequence of the withdrawal of two members of the Dundee establishment to act as stationary clerks, anyone at Dundee performs higher duties, or receives a lower salary than he otherwise would, the establishment having been specially adjusted to provide against such a contingency.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS OF ENGLAND—THE CHARTERS.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the Petition of 10,000 members of the Royal College of Surgeons of England, for a modification of the Charters of the College now under consideration by the Council, has received the favourable consideration of the Lord President, or whether it will be referred to the Royal Commission on University Education in London, recently appointed to consider, among other things, the means of facilitating University degrees for resident students in London; and, whether the Royal College of Surgeons of England has yet presented to the Lord President any comments on, or reply to, the representations made on behalf of the members of the College by the deputation which recently waited on him; or whether, in the absence of any reply, such representation in support of the Petition by 6,000 members will be held to be conclusive?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): The Petition of the members of the Royal College of Surgeons has received the consideration of the Lords of the Council, and will not be referred to the Royal Commission recently appointed to consider the means of facilitating University degrees for resident students in London. There has been a correspondence between the Council Office and the Royal College of Surgeons on the subject of their Petition for a supplementary Charter; and the College have accepted a proposal from the Privy Council to omit from the supplementary Charter points upon which there has been a controversy with the Fellows and the members of the College.

ASIATIC TURKEY—BRITISH HOSPITAL AT SMYRNA—RETURNS.

MR. H. F. PEASE (York, N.R., Cleveland) asked the President of the Board of Trade. Whether he will grant the Return relating to the British Hospital at Smyrna, standing on the Paper for this day?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.) (who replied) said: Returns are being prepared, on the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for South Bristol (Colonel Hill), which will cover the hon. Member's proposed Motion, except that they will only embrace seven instead of 10 years, and the length of the stay in hospital of each seaman, which could not be furnished here. Perhaps he will be so good as to confer with me, and I will see how far the Returns, which are in preparation, can be extended without loss of time.

THE CONSULAR SERVICE—THE HOSPITAL AT CONSTANTINOPLE AND SMYRNA—FEES.

COLONEL HILL (Bristol, S.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has yet received further information from Her Majesty's Treasury in respect to compulsory hospital dues at Constantinople and Smyrna; and, if so, will he communicate it to the House?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Further information has been received. The Returns, which are being carefully prepared, are nearly ready, and will shortly be laid on the Table.

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—BATTERSEA PARK—DISCHARGED WORKMEN.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he is prepared to take into consideration the case of the men who have been many years employed at Battersea Park, but who, since the Park has been taken over by the Metropolitan Board of Works, have been dismissed from their employment; and, whether the Statute, by which the Park was transferred, provides for superannuation to these men?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): The hon. Member is, no doubt, aware that I am in no way responsible for the dismissal of the men lately employed in Battersea Park. One of them, who was foreman at Battersea while it was under my Office, and who has since been dismissed by the Metropolitan Board, I have appointed foreman at the Hampton Court Pleasure Gardens. As to others, I am about to submit their names to the Treasury for such gratuities or superannuation as they may be entitled to under the Act of last year.

POSTMASTER GENERAL—CONVEYANCE OF LETTERS "PER RAIL."

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil) asked the Postmaster General, Whether the monopoly, in virtue of which he has directed Railway Companies to discontinue the conveyance of letters "per rail," was conferred upon the holder of his office prior to the introduction of the penny postal service; whether any further powers have been conferred in this respect upon the Postmaster General during the past half century; whether any of his Predecessors in Office have ever interfered with the practice of sending letters needing expedition by rail; and, whether, pending the inquiry by a Departmental Committee, he would allow the practice to be continued?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The monopoly referred to by the hon. Member was conferred upon the Postmaster General long prior to the introduction of penny postage, and has been continued by various Statutes up to the present time. There has been no extension of the Postmaster General's powers in this respect since the Post Office Acts of the first year of Her Majesty's Reign. Representations have been made from time to time by successive Postmasters General to various carrying agencies as to the illegal carriage of letters. For my own part, I will say that, while every effort shall be made to effect an arrangement which shall be convenient to the public, and at the same time legal, I have not the power to sanction the revival of a practice which the law forbids.

Sir William Hart Dyke

ture says are to be collected; but there must always be, of necessity, an administrative discretion to some extent, on equitable grounds, and such a discretion was exercised in 1845 and in 1870 in relation to the Sugar Duties. Goods imported, and in bond in particular "packages" rendered suddenly liable to a tax because of that package, but capable of being, and which under the tax would be, packed otherwise, have, in extreme cases, some claim in equity to the exercise of such administrative discretion. If the hon. Member will look at Parliamentary Paper No. 281 of 1870 he will find a Treasury Minute issued in a parallel case of administrative discretion applied to the Sugar Duties, with the reasons and precedents for exceptional remission. In reply to his fourth Question, I have to say that there has been no abnormal increase in the quantities of low priced German and French wines cleared. It is estimated that 5,000 dozen bottles have been cleared under this provision.

POST OFFICE (EDINBURGH)—SURVEYOR OF THE MIDLAND DISTRICT.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether the office of the surveyor of the Midland District of Scotland is part of the establishment of the Post Office in Edinburgh; whether two of the clerks in the surveyor's office in Edinburgh also hold appointments on the staff of the Dundee Post Office; whether they are each paid the proper salary for the Edinburgh appointment and another salary for the Dundee appointment; and, whether they perform any duties in Dundee; and, if not, whether the duties connected with their appointments are performed by clerks at a considerably lower salary than that paid to the clerks who nominally hold the appointments but perform no duty?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The office of the Surveyor of the Midland District of Scotland is not part of the establishment of the Post Office in Edinburgh. In accordance with a Rule applicable to the whole of the United Kingdom, the Surveyor's stationary clerks are borne on the establishment of Provincial post offices. The Post Office on the establishment of which the stationary clerks to the Surveyor of the Midland District of Scotland are borne is Dundee; and it is only the salary which they would receive were they employed at Dundee that they receive as stationary clerks. Over and above this salary they receive a special allowance; but it is not the case that, in consequence of the withdrawal of two members of the Dundee establishment to act as stationary clerks, anyone at Dundee performs higher duties, or receives a lower salary than he otherwise would, the establishment having been specially adjusted to provide against such a contingency.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS OF ENGLAND—THE CHARTERS.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the Petition of 10,000 members of the Royal College of Surgeons of England, for a modification of the Charters of the College now under consideration by the Council, has received the favourable consideration of the Lord President, or whether it will be referred to the Royal Commission on University Education in London, recently appointed to consider, among other things, the means of facilitating University degrees for resident students in London; and, whether the Royal College of Surgeons of England has yet presented to the Lord President any comments on, or reply to, the representations made on behalf of the members of the College by the deputation which recently waited on him; or whether, in the absence of any reply, such representation in support of the Petition by 6,000 members will be held to be conclusive?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): The Petition of the members of the Royal College of Surgeons has received the consideration of the Lords of the Council, and will not be referred to the Royal Commission recently appointed to consider the means of facilitating University degrees for resident students in London. There has been a correspondence between the Council Office and the Royal College of Surgeons on the subject of their Petition for a supplementary Charter; and the College have accepted a proposal from the Privy Council to omit from the supplementary Charter points upon which there has not to sit in Licensing Sessions outside their own districts, as shown by this Return, so that local opinion may not be out-voted by the action of strangers from distant places; and, will a correct Return be presented, showing the actual districts in which the gentlemen in question operate?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The hon. and learned Member on the 13th of March asked a somewhat similar Question, and was answered by my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland to the effect that the case of Mr. Byrne was not at all analogous to that of a Resident Magistrate, who was paid to devote his whole time to the Public Service, and who was not appointed with reference to a Petty Sessions district; but was bound to attend all Sessions in his jurisdiction, as far as time permits. Resident Magistrates are qualified to adjudicate at any Petty Sessions within their counties. As a matter of practice, however, they only adjudicate in the Petty Sessions assigned to their charge, except where they act also as locum tenens for another Resident Magistrate on leave of absence, or on the constitution of a special Court under the Crimes Act, or other exceptional circumstance. Resident Magistrates selected under Section 11 of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act are necessarily appointed to act in more than one county. The Return referred to, which is in part a continuation of the Return ordered by the House on the Motion of the late Member for the St. Stephen's Green Division of Dublin (Mr. Dwyer Gray), states the Resident Magistrates' head-quarters, and not the extent of their jurisdiction. I do not see that any public advantage would be gained in giving the directions suggested, or presenting a further Return.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, in consequence of the right hon. Gentleman's declining to supply a Return showing exactly where the Resident Magistrates were to act, he begged to give Notice that when the Public Houses (Ireland) (Saturday Closing) Bill came before the House he should move that the licensing powers of the Resident Magistrates be strictly confined to the districts for which they were appointed. He asked was it not possible to show exactly the Petty Sessions districts for which Resident Magistrates were appointed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he had already explained that the Resident Magistrates did not go out of their own districts unless when they got special orders. He did not think there was any objection to giving the Return asked for; but he could not see that it would be any great gain.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked whether, in consequence of the systematic absence of the Stipendiary Magistrates supposed to be sitting in Cork, considerable inconvenience had not been caused at the Petty Sessions Court?

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) asked, whether the Chief Secretary was aware that one of the Resident Magistrates for Cork adjudicated in every one of the six counties of Munster?

[No reply.]

POST OFFICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)
—DETENTION OF PRINTED MATTER
BY WARRANT OF THE HOME SECRETARY.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether sheets of printed matter posted at Chancery Lane on the 26th and 28th of April were delayed by his express warrant; was any such sheet detained two days after the Secretary to the Post Office had written to say that the said sheet had been delivered; and will he give a Return of all letters (see definition of letter) which have been delayed for inspection during 1887 and 1888?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the General Post Office that they presume that the hon. Member is referring to certain sheets printed on a kind of material which had never been previously seen in transmission through the post. No warrant was issued by me for their detention. Any delay which may have arisen in their delivery was owing to doubts as to whether they came within the Book Post Regulations, and whether they could be safely sent by post at all. I am informed that the sheets were sent to the despatching office at the same time as the instructions for their delivery. I cannot give the hon. Member the Return he asks for.

Mr. T. M. Healy

CONDITION OF THE WORKING CLASSES (METROPOLIS)—DEATHS FROM STAR-VATION—PROSTITUTES.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he would give a Return of the number of deaths from starvation according to Coroner's Inquest during the past year; and, if he can give any approximate Return of the number of men out of work in London during the past winter, and a Return of the prostitutes under 16 years of age who frequent the streets of London?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): A Return is now with the printers, and will shortly be issued, giving the number of deaths in the Metropolitan District in the year 1887 upon which a Coroner's Jury have returned a verdict of death from starvation, or death accelerated by privation. I hope this will be sufficient for the purpose of the hon. Member. I have no information in my Department to furnish the Returns asked for in the last paragraph.

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS) — HYDE PARK—ACCIDENTS IN ROTTEN ROW.

BARON DE ROTHSCHILD (Bucks, Aylesbury) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he is aware that about 20 accidents, the last of them terminating fatally, have occurred during the past five years at the entrance to Rotten Row; and, whether he will consider the advisability of levelling and altering the stone crossing where all these accidents have happened, and by which they are believed to have been caused?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): I am aware that accidents have happened—one very sad one ending, I am sorry to say, fatally—at the crossing at the east end of Rotten Row, and I shall certainly do all I can to diminish the risk of such deplorable occurrences; but, of course, there must be a crossing for pedestrians, and people on horseback will, I hope, on their part exercise caution in pulling up their horses before getting off the Ride.

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.) asked, whether it was not precisely when riders had no control over their horses that these accidents occurred; and, whether the paved crossing was not placed just at the spot where a runaway horse would be most dangerous?

MR. PLUNKET said, that was very likely to be so, and he should be glad to consider suggestions that might be made to minimize the danger.

BARON DE ROTHSCHILD said, the danger arose, not from the horses cantering, but, as had been stated, from runaway horses.

MR. PLUNKET said, danger must always arise from runaway horses; but the attention of the Board should be particularly directed to the matter.

COAL MINES, &c., REGULATION ACT,
1887—EXAMINATIONS FOR COMPE-TENCY.

MR. PICKARD (York, W.R., Northampton) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to an advertisement which appeared in The Leeds Mercury, 4th May, headed—"Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887. (Advertisement B.) Examination for first and second class certificates of competency as manager and under manager respectively;"

and concludes with the following note:—

"N.B.—Persons who do not reside within the district are equally eligible for examination with those who do;"

whether he will state to the House under what clause of the Act the Board derive their authority to examine persons outside their district; and, whether, if they have no such authority under the Act, and knowing the diverse character of the danger in mines in the various districts, he will give instructions that no Board in future shall examine any person for certificates of competency except such person has worked in a mine at least two years in the district for which the Board was formed?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir, I am aware of such an advertisement. Under Sections 23 to 25 of the Act the Board appear to have power to examine persons who reside out of their districts. It rests with the Board, and not with the Secretary of State, to make Rules as to the qualification of the candidates; but the Act requires the Board to have regard to such knowledge as is necessary for the practical working of mines in the district for which the Board was formed.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked, whether a certificate given in one district was available for a man who was out of employment in a different district?

MR. MATTHEWS: It is. I do not know of anything in the Act which prevents an owner in Durham from employing a man who was examined in Wales.

THE SWEATING SYSTEM—THE FACTORY ACTS.

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If, in order to prevent a continuance of the sweating system, and to insure some modification in the hours and conditions of the poorer class of labour, the Government will consent to enlarge the scope of the Factory Acts by such compulsory registration of all workshops not at present included in those Acts, and by other stringent Regulations and Rules as will give adequate powers to Inspectors appointed for such purposes?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Pending the completion of the inquiry before the Select Committee which is now sitting, it would be premature for the Government to determine whether, by any amendment of the Factory Laws, the evils of the sweating system could be abated. When the Report of the Committee is received the Government will consider what steps can be taken.

SAVINGS BANKS—THE SEVENOAKS TRUSTEE SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is true that one of the auditors of the Sevenoaks Trustee Savings Bank is also auditor of 11 other Trustee Banks, and the actuary of a London Trustee Savings Bank; and, whether, having regard to the fact that the defalcations at the Sevenoaks Bank were carried on over a series of years, the Government will institute an inquiry into the circumstances connected with the defalcations at such bank, under the provisions of the Trustee Banks Act of last Session?

Mr. Matthews

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): I understand that the firm of accountants who are auditors to the Sevenoaks Bank act in the same capacity for 14 other Trustee Savings Banks, and that a member of the firm is also actuary of a London Trustee Savings Bank. I am informed that the Trustees of the Sevenoaks Bank are still investigating their accounts, and will shortly submit a full Report on the subject. They are also, I am told, taking steps to enforce the bond for £600 given by the late actuary's sureties, to realize his estate, and to institute criminal proceedings. As soon as the Treasury receive the Report of the National Debt Commissioners on the case they will be able to determine whether there is good ground for an inquiry under the Act of last Session.

NAVY ESTIMATES—THE NAVAL RESERVE.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD (Marylebone, E.) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, To give the names of the ships whose tonnage make up the 70,000 tons mentioned in his Memorandum on the Navy Estimates as having been passed into the Reserve last year?

THE FIRST LORD (LORD GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): At page 12 of my Memorandum on the Navy Estimates I stated that it was estimated that 75,000 tons—not 70,000 tons—would be completed ready for commission in 1887-8. The names of the vessels themselves and their tonnage are given at page 188 of the Navy Estimates. My Memorandum was written a month before the close of the financial year. The actual tonnage passed into the First Reserve for 1887-8 was 64,500; the difference between that figure and my estimate being mainly caused by the unexpected delay in the delivery of guns. The estimate of the amount of tonnage to be passed this year—namely, 1888-9—into the Reserve will be raised by that difference; and should, therefore, come to 88,000 tons, in place of the 77,000 tons of my estimate.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD: Has every one of the ships got all her guns on board?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Yes, of course. My noble and gallant Friend is aware that no ship is passed into the First Reserve unless she is complete, and can be made ready for commission within 48 hours.

WAR OFFICE—FERMOY BARRACKS— SANITARY CONDITION.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) asked the Secretary of State for War, If he is aware that three fresh cases of pneumonia occurred last Thursday at Fermoy Barracks (County Cork), in addition to the large number of cases which were treated in the hospital within the past few weeks; and, if he will order an inquiry by a competent authority into the sanitary condition of the barracks and the general accommodation available for troops?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The Returns show that there were four admissions into hospital at Fermoy for pneumonia during the week ended the 11th instant. One death is also reported from that disease during the same period. Careful inquiry has been made into the circumstances of the case, as promised by me in my answer to the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner) on the 30th ultimo, but the sanitary state of the barracks is reported to be good.

POST OFFICE (ENGLAND AND WALES) —CLOSED POSTAL CARDS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) asked the Postmaster General, Whether he has taken into consideration the suggestion that postal cards, which can be closed, shall be sold by the Post Office; and, if so, whether he has taken action in the matter?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAILES) (Cambridge University): I have considered the suggestion mentioned by the hon. Member, and shall be very glad to show him some specimens of cards which have been prepared, with a view to arriving at a decision upon the question.

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—BUSHEY, HAMPTON COURT, AND RICHMOND PARKS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether any action has been taken with a view to afford the public greater facilities to enjoy Bushey and Hampton Court Parks; whether he has observed the statement in the Press that there is an outbreak of rabies in Richmond Park; and, whether, in view of the fact that this is the second outbreak within a year, and that the cost of keeping these animals is great, whilst the profit derived from them is nil, he will consider the expediency of ceasing to keep them in Richmond Park?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): I have not lost sight of the question of opening Hampton Court Park, and it is now being discussed by the Departments concerned, but no decision has yet been come to. As to the rabies reported to have broken out among the deer in Richmond Park, I have not yet got full information on the subject; but I do not think that in any case such an event would be a good reason for entirely banishing the deer from the Park.

LICENSING LAWS—LOCAL GOVERN- MENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL —LICENSING CLAUSES.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, in the event of the Licensing Clauses of the Local Government Bill becoming law, persons interested in the liquor trade will be prohibited from taking part in the administration of the Licensing Laws?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Bill does not make any alteration in the existing law on the subject.

POST OFFICE (CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE)—PAY OF CLERKS.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck) asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is true that the Treasury recently discovered that clerks employed at the Central Telegraph Office have for the past 18 years been paid a day's pay too much; whether two days' pay was deducted from the salaries of the staff after one week's notice; whether, as a consequence of this discovery, fortnightly payments have been abolished; and, whether the clerks have complained of such change having been made in the mode of payment; and, if so, whether he will consider the advisability of paying these clerks weekly, as is done in several other branches of the Post Office service?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that the over-payment to which he alludes in his Question was brought under my notice by the Comptroller and Auditor General. Most of the officers employed at the Central Telegraph Office are paid on a scale of annual salaries, and in consequence of payment being made fortnightly an extra day's payment was made in ordinary years and two days' extra payment in leap years; the question having been referred to the Treasury, it was decided that from and after the 31st of March, 1887, the actual annual salary only should be paid, and, consequently, in making the last payment for the year to the 31st of March last, being leap year, the extra payment for two days was not made. As I was unwilling to alter the period of payment, I gave instructions that an advance of salary calculated to the nearest pound should be made in the middle of every month, the balance being paid at the end of the month. And I do not think it would be the wish of the officers that their wages should be paid weekly.

LAND COMMISSION COURT — FAIR RENTS — JUDGMENT OF COUNTY COURT JUDGE CURRAN.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the following judgment of the Land Commission in The Freeman's Journal of the 12th instant:—

"There were two cases on the property of Colonel King Harman, Michael Killeen, £14 0s. 2d. old rent and £9 judicial rent, and Thomas Hoey, £15 10s. old rent and £9, which were heard before Judge Curran. Judge Curran appended to his order a statement that he thought £12 would be a fair rent in both cases, only for the unreasonable conduct of the landlord as to the cutting of turf by the tenants; and, in consequence of that unreasonable conduct, he made the rent £9 they would make the rent in both cases £10 10s.;"

and, were the Government in possession of the text of the Judgment of County Court Judge Curran, or would it be possible to lay a Copy of it upon the Table?

Mr. Fenwick

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Secretary of the Land Commission telegraphs that the Commissioners are sitting in Court at Roscommon hearing appeals; and that he cannot communicate with them in time to furnish the necessary Report in reply to this Question, which appears on this morning's Paper without previous Notice.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then, perhaps, when the right hon. and gallant Gentleman comes back, I will ask himself directly.

WAR OFFICE—STORAGE OF POWDER IN BARGES AT WOOLWICH.

COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether a new barge contractor has recently by his neglect placed the Arsenal and town of Woolwich in great danger, by leaving powder and ammunition barges unattended in the River Thames; whether about 750 tons of explosives were in the deserted barges, and that, with the adjacent powder ship and Government barges, a total of 2,000 tons of ammunition and powder was involved in risk; to whom would the people of the Metropolis look for indemnity for loss of life and property in case an accident had happened; whether his attention has been called to the statement of the contractor—

"That he employed vagrants, whose names and addresses he did not know, and who deserted the barges;"

and, if so, will the Government offer a reward for the said vagrants to come forward and explain whether they swam ashore, or how they all made their escape unobserved, and particularly why they left work for which they were to be paid; and, whether the said contractor will be continued in the service of the Government?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I cannot at present answer the Question fully, inasmuch as I have not obtained sufficient Notice from the hon. Member; but I may say that the contractor is bound to provide suitable watchmen for the barges; and that, having in this case failed to do so, he was summoned by the Thames Conservancy Board and punished with a heavy fine.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—PORTUMNA
BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

Mr. HARRIS (Galway, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it be true that Mr. Patrick Larkin was appointed rate collector by the Portumna Board of Guardians on March 31 last, and that the Local Government Board refused to sanction his appointment; and, whether the reasons assigned for such refusal were that he had taken part in an assembly at his father's door, and that he had spoken harshly to Constable Clemens, who followed Mr. D. Crilly, M.P., into his (Mr. Larkin's) father's house; and, if so, whether, having regard to the light character of the offence for which Mr. Larkin was held to bail, the Local Government Board will withdraw their opposition to his appointment?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): My reply to the first paragraph of the Question is in the affirmative. Upon the matter coming before the Local Government Board, it was found that this man had, in 1886, been convicted of being one of a party charged with assaulting persons, and he was bound over for six months; again, on the 12th of March last, he was put under a rule of bail for 12 months for using violent and abusive language towards a police sergeant in the discharge of his duty. In these circumstances, the Local Government Board are of opinion that he is a person who should not be entrusted with the office, and they decline, therefore, to sanction the appointment.

RIOTS, &c. (IRELAND)—CAPTAIN L. S.
PAYNE AT FERMOY—REMOVAL OF BANNERS, &c.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the report in The Cork Examiner of the 8th of May, of the trial of Captain Ludlow Strange Payne, at Fermoy, on a summons charging him with tearing down after midnight certain banners and decorations erected across the streets of Fermoy in honour of the visit of the hon. Member for North East Cork (Mr. O'Brien); whether the evidence showed that Captain Payne was caught in the act by the night watchman; whether, although the summons was dismissed on the ground that the complainant should have been the Town Commissioners, the presiding magistrate stated that—

"So far as the emblem was concerned there was nothing to object to in it. We cannot understand why Captain Payne interfered with them;"

and added, in giving judgment—

"That both Mr. Furlong and himself considered that Mr. Payne had acted not only with very bad taste but with the most extreme imprudence and danger. By the insult he committed he not only placed himself in danger, but also other people who might be supposed to regard Mr. Payne's action with favour; but on the legal point they did not see their way to a conviction;"

and, will Captain Payne be allowed to retain his Militia command?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): With regard to the first three Questions asked by the hon. and learned Gentleman, I can only refer him to the answer given for me last night by my hon. Friend the Member for Wigton (Sir Herbert Maxwell). In answer to the fourth Question, I have to say it would depend upon the result of further inquiries, which are being made.

Mr. T. M. HEALY asked, when it would be convenient for the right hon. Gentleman to answer the Question?

Mr. E. STANHOPE said, he was afraid he should not be in a position to answer it on Thursday. He had communicated with the authorities in Ireland; but he had not yet received a reply.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said, he would repeat the Question on Thursday.

LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)—
PROPOSED MEETING IN TRAFALGAR
SQUARE.

Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, if a bond fide political meeting be called by responsible persons to discuss the Local Government Bill in its bearing upon the Metropolis, in Trafalgar Square, the police will be directed or authorized in any way to interfere with the same?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): The Regulation of the Chief Commissioner of Police of November 18, 1887, is still in force. It has been very useful in preserving the peace and good order of the Metropolis, and in protecting the trade and quiet of the neighbourhood. Until it is countermanded the duty of the police will be to prevent any public meeting being held in the Square, or in the adjacent thoroughfares.

MR. CONYBEARE: When will the Home Secretary direct his subordinate, the Chief Commissioner of Police, to countermand the Order respecting Trafalgar Square?

MR. MATTHEWS: That is a question for future consideration.

MR. CONYBEARE: Will that future consideration depend upon the conduct of the people, and the peaceable and orderly character of London, or is coercion in London to be permanent, as in Ireland?

[No reply.]

LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)—INTERFERENCE IN BERMONDSEY.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been directed to the conduct of the police in Bermondsey on Saturday last, at the corner of Grange Road, in refusing to allow Mr. Twelch, one of the candidates for the Bermondsey Vestry, to address the ratepayers, after the other two candidates had spoken; and, if he will inquire into the circumstances of the case?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I have made inquiry into this matter. The Inspector of Police gave evidence as stated. I am informed that the magistrates went fully into the evidence on both sides in the first two cases. Upon that evidence, which tended to explain the circumstances deposed to by the Inspector, these cases were dismissed. The Bench at the same time stated that the police had acted very properly in bringing them forward for inquiry. The other informations, which related to the same transactions, were not proceeded with.

NATIONAL DEFENCE BILL—THE FIRST SCHEDULE—ALLOWANCE TO VOLUNTEERS.

COLONEL LAURIE (Bath) asked the Secretary of State for War, If Her Majesty's Government will assent to the withdrawal of that part of the 1st Schedule to the National Defence Bill repealing the provision in the Volunteer Act of 1863 of an allowance to Volunteers, on embodiment, of two guineas for the provision of necessaries, and one guinea on disbandment?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The words in the Schedule were due to a mistake, to which my hon. and gallant Friend has recently called my attention, and I have myself given notice to omit them.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIVER BANN—LEGISLATION.

SIR CHARLES LEWIS (Antrim, N.) (for Mr. LEA) (Londonderry, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, On which day he intends to introduce the Bill for the drainage of the Bann?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): As the House is aware, I expressed the hope before now that I should be able to introduce this Bill before Whitsuntide. After consultation with the Leader of the House, I do not see any opportunity of doing it before Whitsuntide, unless on Friday afternoon before the adjournment of the House. I do not know whether that course would be convenient, and I leave that to the Leader of the House to determine.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) repeated the Question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I suppose the right hon. Gentleman was in communication with some Gentleman near him and did not hear; but I have just answered the Question.

INDIA—THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY—THE PROPOSED DISMEMBERMENT.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Government of India have lately proposed to dismember the Bombay Presidency, by annexing Sind to the Punjab; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will place the Correspondence upon the Table of the House before arriving at final decision on the subject?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): No such proposal has been submitted to the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State is aware that a correspondence on the subject is going on between the Government of Bombay and the Government of India; but no such change could be made without the sanction of the Government of India. There is at present no correspondence to lay upon the Table.

Mr. Matthews

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—TRIAL AND SENTENCE ON MR. DILLON, M.P.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Can he inform the House of what offence the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) was convicted by the Court presided over by Mr. Hamilton, R.M.; and, will that magistrate be invited to correct his letter to Mr. Speaker?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN) (Dublin University): The hon. Member for East Mayo was convicted of the offence of taking part in a criminal conspiracy to compel and induce certain tenants of farms in diverse parts of Ireland not to fulfil their legal obligations with regard to payment of rent, and of the further offence of inciting others to take part in such conspiracy. It appears from the evidence that the particular conspiracy for taking part in which the hon. Member was convicted was the conspiracy known as "the Plan of Campaign." As regards the second paragraph of the Question, I have to state that the matter is not within the province of the Government, but rests rather with the Authorities of the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to give Notice that on Thursday I shall move to expunge the letter of Mr. Hamilton from the Minutes of the House.

METROPOLITAN BUILDING ACT—NEW BUILDING AT ALBERT GATE—EXCESSIVE HEIGHT.

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.) (for Mr. WHITMORE) (Chelsea) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he has obtained any definite answer as to the total height to which it is now proposed that the new buildings at Albert Gate should be raised?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (MR. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): Since I was last questioned on this subject the promoters of the buildings at Albert Gate have been in communication with me, and they have agreed to reduce the proposed mansions by two stories, bringing the ridge of the roof down to a height of 100 feet. The new buildings will thus not much exceed in height the adjoining houses.

MR. W. BECKETT (Notts, Bassett-law): How many stories will the buildings be?

MR. PLUNKET: Well, they have been reduced two stories. I forget exactly how many stories they are now; but I think the building will be rather a handsome one.

METROPOLIS—OPEN SPACES—VACANT GROUND ADJOINING THE ROYAL COURTS OF JUSTICE.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) (for Mr. R. T. REID) (Dumfries, &c.) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he is aware that the piece of land lying to the west of the buildings of the Royal Courts of Justice, in the Strand, is now lying in a waste and unsightly condition, and has been in that state for some years; and, whether he will cause this land, until required for building, to be laid out in grass, or otherwise made available for recreation, especially for the children of the crowded streets adjoining?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (MR. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): A considerable portion of the land now vacant on the west side of the Courts of Justice will be almost immediately required in connection with the building of the new Bankruptcy Offices. As to the remainder, it may be at any time wanted for an extension of the Courts of Justice, for which purpose it is reserved.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—ST. STEPHEN'S CHAPEL.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether, seeing that the entrance to the St. Stephen's Chapel is through the Members' Cloak Room, there is any reason why hon. Members and their friends should not have the privilege of visiting and showing to their friends this interesting and beautiful portion of the Parliament House; and, whether he will make arrangements to enable them to do so?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): I have referred the question to the Home Office, and I am informed by my right hon. Friend that it is now under the consideration of the Police Authorities.

OFFICIAL TRUSTEE BILL—LEGISLATION.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.) asked Mr. Attorney General, When the Government propose to introduce their promised Bill for the appointment of an Official Trustee; if it will be introduced in this House or the House of Lords; and, if they will consider the advisability of including in it provisions to permit and facilitate the performance of the burdensome duties of Trustees by Public Companies under proper Regulations?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): I am informed by the First Lord of the Treasury that the Bill in question will be introduced in the House of Lords. With regard to the last part of the Question, I have no doubt the matter therein referred to will be carefully considered.

LAW OF AGISTMENT AND DISTRAINT.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether, in the case of agistment, a landlord can distrain upon stock not the property of the tenant, but which are on other crops sub-let by the tenant to another person?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): In the case of agistment, properly so called, the landlord cannot distrain upon stock not the property of the tenant. But if, as the latter part of the Question of the hon. Member supposes, the crop has been sub-let, it is not a case of agistment so called, and the stock are not free from distress.

PERPETUAL PENSIONS—ACTION OF THE EXECUTIVE.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What steps have been taken by the Government to give effect to the recent Resolution of this House relating to hereditary pensions and allowances; and, whether he can now make any statement as to the course the Government intend to take to give effect to the remainder of such Resolution?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am not yet in a position to make a statement as to the course which the Government intend to pursue. The subject has not been lost sight of, and progress is being made towards the solution of a somewhat difficult question.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would take care not to overlook that the Resolution said "forthwith."

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that in the case of a difficult question, and of a hardly-worked official, "forthwith" must be allowed some little latitude.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—WHIT-SUNTIDE.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What Business the Government propose to take at the resumed Sitting of the House on Thursday, May 31?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The Government propose to take the Civil Service Estimates in Committee of Supply on Thursday, the 31st May. Since last evening I have been aware of the fact that hon. Gentlemen have remained in town—some of them with the view to take part in the discussion of the Employers' Liability Bill, which it was understood would come on next Thursday—and having regard to that fact, and having regard also to the extreme desirableness of getting that Bill referred to the Grand Committee on Trade and Commerce, I think it better to revert to the original arrangement with regard to that Bill and take it on Thursday, in place of the Irish Bills which were intended to be taken. It is, therefore, proposed that we should take a Vote on Account, which is absolutely necessary for the Public Services, on Thursday, and the second reading of the Employers' Liability Bill, in the hope that we may be able to refer it to the Committee on Trade and Commerce. The two Irish Bills will then stand for Monday the 4th of June.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham W.) asked at what hour Progre would be reported, and the Employers' Liability Bill taken?

MR. W. H. SMITH: We will report Progress the moment we get the Vote on Account; and I trust hon. Gentlemen will not occupy more than the necessary time for the discussion of the Vote on Account. It is unusual to occupy a very long time on a question of that kind, but it is absolutely necessary for the Public Service that we should have the Vote. Seeing that is the case, the Vote will stand as the first Business, and the Employers' Liability Bill as the second.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) said, that after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman he would not go on with his Motion, of which he had given Notice for Thursday. Could the right hon. Gentleman see his way to postpone the Criminal Evidence Bill until the 4th of June?

MR. W. H. SMITH: It will not be taken before the 4th of June.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells) asked when the Railway and Canal Traffic Bill would be taken?

MR. W. H. SMITH: That is a matter which does not rest with me. It is for arrangement by the Committee on Trade and Commerce.

LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANIES—RECENT JUDGMENT OF THE LORDS JUSTICES OF APPEAL.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the fact that several hundreds of Companies registered under the Limited Liability Acts will probably be forced into liquidation, owing to the recent Judgment of the Lords Justices of Appeal, that the issue of shares at a discount is ultra vires, he is now prepared to state what course the Government propose to take in the matter?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The hon. Member is aware that the Government intend introducing a Bill dealing with this subject; and as to the date of the introduction of such Bill, I am unable to add anything to the answer I gave on the 1st instant.

SUGAR BOUNTIES—THE INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION.

MR. J. C. BOLTON (Stirling) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is true, as stated in the public Press, that the International Conference on Sugar Bounties have concluded a Convention for the abolition of bounties, and that all the Powers have engaged to prohibit absolutely the importation of bounty fed sugar?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): In answer to the hon. Member, I have to say that, at the concluding sitting of the International Conference on Sugar Bounties, the final Protocol, with the Draft Convention, was signed by the Representatives of all the Powers. Those Representatives will now submit the Draft Convention, with the reserves they have made, to their respective Governments, who will communicate their views to Her Majesty's Government by July 5. The Plenipotentiaries will be invited to meet in London, on August 16 at latest, for the signature of the Treaty. Pending the receipt of such communications and the re-assembling of the Plenipotentiaries, it would be obviously improper, and contrary to diplomatic usage, to give to the House the details of a Draft Treaty, which, in its present form, is the property of the Powers collectively, and not of any individual Power. I may add that this view has been adopted by the Delegates of all the Powers, who agreed at their last meeting that no publicity should be given to the Draft Convention until after the re-assembling of the Plenipotentiaries.

MR. J. C. BOLTON asked, whether the statement, as reported, that all the Powers had engaged to prohibit absolutely the importation of bounty fed sugar was true or false?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The accurate statement is that which I have just read out to the House.

In reply to Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne),

MR. W. H. SMITH added that, with regard to giving an opportunity for the discussion of the Convention, the usual course would be followed.

MR. J. C. BOLTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury to give a pledge on behalf of the Government that an opportunity would be given to the House of expressing its opinion on the question before the country was finally committed to absolute prohibition.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) asked, whether the Government had taken into account the increased amount the people of this country would have to pay for their sugar if its importation were prohibited?

MR. PICTON (Leicester) wished to know whether the Government had power to prohibit the importation of any kind of commodity without a Resolution or an Act of Parliament?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman who asked me the last Question has answered the hon. Member for Stirlingshire. It is absolutely impossible to carry out any engagement without the authority of Parliament.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby) asked, whether the 16th of August was the date at which the final ratification of this Treaty was to take place?

MR. W. H. SMITH: That, I believe, is the present arrangement of the Powers; but any agreement springing out of the Convention will be a prospective arrangement.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.) asked, whether it was not desirable that legislation in regard to this subject should be as early as possible, in order that if there was a disinclination on the part of Parliament to proceed, other Governments would be saved further trouble in the matter?

MR. W. H. SMITH: It is absolutely impossible for us to propose legislation in the meantime, seeing that the Convention may fall to the ground, or that the Powers, or any of them, may disagree with it.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, he meant that as they had taken the initiative in regard to the Conference, so they might in reference to legislation.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART— ROYAL NORMAL SCHOOL AT SOUTH KENSINGTON.

SIR HENRY ROSCOE (Manchester, S.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether any steps have been taken, and, if so, what steps, for the purpose of providing accommodation for the physical laboratory in the Royal Normal School at South Kensington, in consequence of the appropriation of the site of the present temporary building by the authorities of the Imperial Institute?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The Office of Works is in communication with the Science and Art Department; and is about to report to the Treasury as to what arrangements can be made for providing accommodation for the physical laboratory.

WALES—INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION —LEGISLATION.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When the promised measure for organizing and promoting intermediate education in Wales will be introduced?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Her Majesty's Government are aware of the interest felt on the subject of intermediate education in Wales, and will be glad to take the earliest opportunity of dealing with it that the state of Public Business and the progress of legislation permit. I cannot consent to send the two Bills already before the House to a Select Committee. The question is one which the Government alone ought to deal with.

CROFTERS' COLONIZATION.

DR. R. MACDONALD (Ross and Cromarty) (for Dr. CLARK) (Caithness), asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce an Estimate for Crofter Emigration before making arrangements to send out the crofters, or after all the arrangements were made and a portion of the money spent?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): A small advance has been authorized to meet the immediate necessities of the case; but an Estimate will be laid before the House as soon as possible.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) asked, whether it was the case that agents of the Government had already gone and invited crofters to emigrate?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, it was the case that some few individuals had been invited to emigrate, under very pressing circumstances, with a view to their immediate relief; and also with a view to the fact that, unless they emigrated immediately, it would be impossible for them to do so until next year.

DR. R. MACDONALD asked, whether it was the case that 25 families left Stornoway on Wednesday week?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he was not aware whether that was the case or not.

Sir Wilfred Lawson

Subsequently,

Dr. CLARK asked, when the right hon. Gentleman intended to lay the Supplementary Estimates relating to the crofters on the Table?

Mr. W. H. SMITH: It will be laid on the Table immediately after Whitsuntide.

Dr. CLARK gave Notice that in Committee he would move to reduce the salary of the First Lord of the Treasury by the amount asked for.

AUSTRALIA—CHINESE IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies a Question of which he had given him private Notice, Whether he would lay on the Table of the House a copy of the long and important protest respecting the landing of Chinese in Australia which was cabled by Lord Carrington, the Governor of New South Wales, at the instance of the Premier of his Government to the Secretary of State for the Colonies; also copies of any Treaties between England and China bearing on the important question at issue regarding the influx of Chinese into Australia?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): It would not be convenient to present to Parliament one part only of a correspondence in progress; and some little time must be allowed in order that a stage in the question permitting of presentation of Papers may be reached.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887 (PERSONS PROCEEDED AGAINST, &c.)—RETURN.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he would consent to lay on the Table a Return connected with the administration of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887, containing the following particulars: (1) Names of all Persons who have been proceeded against under that Act down to Whitsuntide, 1888; (2) the specific Offence charged against each Person; (3) the Result of the Trial; (4) Cases in which there was an Appeal; (5) the Result of the Appeal?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I have no objection; but the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to make inquiries in Dublin as to whether there is any difficulty in the way of preparing such a Return.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL—CONSTITUTION.

In reply to Mr. MUNRO-FERGUSON (Leith, &c.),

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, he had already stated that a Bill for the constitution of an Agricultural Department was in progress; but he was unable to say when it would be possible to introduce it. The Government were giving their serious attention to the matter; and he hoped it would be possible to bring in the measure shortly after Whitsuntide.

MOTIONS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (NOTICES OF MOTION).—RESOLUTION.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Order of the Day for the Committee on Imperial Defence [Expenses] have precedence this day of the Notices of Motion and other Orders of the Day."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

Mr. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.) said, he must protest against the course proposed to be adopted by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith). On Thursday last the right hon. Gentleman professed to recognize the importance of a Motion which stood in his (Mr. Broadhurst's) name on the Paper for to-night, and went so far as to give a pledge to keep a House for the discussion of the subject until 10 o'clock at night. But the right hon. Gentleman had broken faith, and now proposed to take the whole of the Sitting for Business which might well be taken at some other time. It was perfectly conceivable that a measure for the Imperial defence of the country was of more pressing importance than the Motion he proposed to bring forward; but that was no answer to his appeal. The reply to that was that the Imperial Defence Bill was of more importance than the King-Harman Salary Bill, and the Imperial Defence Bill could have been taken yesterday in preference to the Colonel King-Harman Bill. If it was irregular to mention the name of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, he would say that the Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Salary) Bill could have been taken on some other occasion. They were asked to believe a most astounding proposition—namely, that it was of such importance for the Government to provide a salary for a political friend that the National Defences Bill must be delayed. The appropriation by the Government of a private Members' Sitting at this period of the Session, especially when Public Business was in such a forward position, was altogether unprecedented. They had learned a good deal from right hon. Gentlemen opposite—even from the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord himself, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour), as well as the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen). The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a speech delivered in the country in the early part of the year, told them that this was to be a Session for English legislation, and that the interests of the English people were to command and receive the attention of Her Majesty's Government. But where, up to the present moment, had been the interests of the English people which had been considered? So far, it had been a Session for the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Under Secretary, and it was certainly much more like a King-Harman's Session than anything else. He protested against the proceedings of the Government, and he hoped the House would do something to show the Government how unjustifiable those proceedings were, and he should certainly divide the House as a protest. He had secured a place on the Paper for that evening, which afforded a favourable opportunity for submitting to the consideration of the House a subject of great interest and importance to the poorer classes of the people of the country. He made this protest with some warmth, but he believed that that warmth was fully justified by the conduct of the Government. He begged to give the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury Notice that if any other person, of more importance and authority than himself, would make a proposition, he would willingly divide the House against the Motion which the right hon. Gentleman had just submitted.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury pressed the proverb too far that "silence was golden." He had brought forward a proposal like this, and had not even apologized for it, although it was a distinct breach of a deliberate bargain entered into by the right hon. Gentleman. What was it that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury did last week? When questioned on the subject, he assured the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) that there would be a Morning Sitting to-day, but that at 9 o'clock the Government would keep a House in order that the hon. Gentleman might be able to bring forward his important Motion. Why had not the right hon. Gentleman adhered to his bargain? It was simply because he knew exceedingly little about the Rules of the House. He had jumped up last night, in an autocratic manner, and tried to impose a new Rule upon the House. Indeed, he was only prevented by the intervention of Mr. Deputy Speaker; and then, when 12 o'clock was reached, the right hon. Gentleman proposed that the Under Secretary for Ireland (Salary) Bill should be put down for 2 o'clock to-day. Of course, that would have involved the sitting of the House at 2 o'clock; but when it was explained to the right hon. Gentleman that he was under a delusion, he said he presumed Mr. Deputy Speaker had a right to decide the matter by taking the voices of the House. He was told that there was no such right, and that he was entirely and absolutely in the wrong; and now the hon. Member for West Nottingham was positively to suffer because the right hon. Gentleman had adopted this course, and had, as it were, to be closed by the action of the Chair. Why did the right hon. Gentleman take this course to-day? It was because, as usual, he had blundered over the Business of the House. Why had the right hon. Gentleman forced on the Secretary for Ireland Bill yesterday? Was it of urgent and paramount importance that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman) should receive a salary one day before another day? Most assuredly not. If the right hon. Gentleman had felt that the question of the defence of the Colonies was of paramount importance he might have brought it forward on Monday. The House thought that he intended to stand to his bargain, and some surprise was felt that he had not brought on that Bill. Hon. Members did not know that he had made up his mind to throw over the bargain he had entered into with the hon. Member for West Nottingham. In future they would really have to be most careful with the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to be very much like certain persons who, when they found themselves in financial difficulties, endeavoured to get the money out of somebody else. Notwithstanding his pledge to the contrary, he now came forward and endeavoured to take a day from private Members. He (Mr. Labouchere) objected to the whole system, and to the right hon. Gentleman taking days which ought to be devoted to private Members, when there was no absolute and paramount necessity for doing so, at the beginning of a Session. When the House passed the new Procedure Rules it was on the distinct understanding that only under exceptional circumstances would the days of private Members be taken. The right hon. Gentleman could not say that this was a case of exceptional urgency, because, if so, the Bill might have been brought forward yesterday. The right hon. Gentleman had given a specific pledge, and most assuredly it was not a question of importance and urgency that the Defences Bill should be taken to-day. Even on Friday last the right hon. Gentleman took no steps to keep a House, although it was understood that a House would be kept. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) sought in a previous Parliament to take away all the time of the House for one of the Coercion Bills, it was the Conservative Opposition who opposed the proposition and moved an Amendment. He presumed, therefore, that he should be in Order in moving an Amendment to the Resolution which had just been proposed by the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Broadhurst

He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House is not prepared to surrender this day to the Government, in view of the fact that the Government has already pledged itself to arrange to enable the Member for the West Division of Nottingham to bring on this evening the Motion that stands in his name, and Her Majesty's Ministers yesterday devoted the time at their disposal to a stage of the Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland Salary Bill, which time would otherwise have been at their disposal for the purposes for which they are now asking for the time of private Members."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, he had listened to the remarks of the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) and the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), who accused him of blundering in regard to the conduct of the Business of the House. That was an allegation which the hon. Member had made before, and he was afraid it would not cease as long as he occupied his present position. He really was exceedingly sorry that it had been the duty of the Government to ask for the time of the House that evening for the question they were desirous of bringing forward. The hon. Member for West Nottingham protested that he had entered into an engagement with him. Certainly, he had entered into a provisional engagement to do all in his power to secure the consideration of the hon. Gentleman's Motion, and he had mentioned 2 o'clock to-day as the hour which he trusted the House would sit; but the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), in the exercise of his right, had objected under the Standing Orders to the meeting of the House at 2 o'clock, and had thereby prevented him from keeping the engagement he had entered into. He had, therefore, felt it his duty to put down for 3 o'clock the question which he had intended to proceed with at 2 o'clock. The importance of this question was his answer to the hon. Member, and he was exceedingly sorry that he was prevented from carrying out the engagement. It was, however, the hon. and learned Member for North Longford, who, in the exercise of his undoubted right, had prevented him from carrying out his engagement. If, however, the discussion upon the Defences Bill was kept, as he hoped it might be, within reasonable limits, there would still be a considerable portion of the evening left for the consideration of the important question which the hon. Member for West Nottingham proposed to raise. The hon. Member said that the proceedings of the Government were without precedent. He was sure the hon. Gentleman would find that there were many precedents for the course he had been obliged to take under the pressure of Public Business in the exercise of his duty in putting down the Business for a Morning Sitting. The Government must be responsible for the conduct of Business in that House, and the House would see what a large amount of time had been devoted to a measure which they had hoped would have been soon disposed of—namely, the Bill for creating the Office of Permanent Under Secretary for Ireland.

MR. LABOUCHERE: For giving a salary, not the creation of the Office.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Hon. Gentlemen had interposed delay in the progress of the Bill. They were quite within their right in doing what they believed to be their bounden duty in submitting this Bill to the consideration of the House. In all the circumstances, he trusted the hon. Member for West Nottingham would feel that the course now proposed to be taken was one that had been forced upon him, and that he had no alternative whatever. He therefore hoped that the hon. Member would not trouble the House to divide, seeing that by so doing he would only defeat the object he had in view of delaying the time when the House would take up the question in which he himself took a personal interest.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby) said, the House was getting quite used to the right hon. Gentleman telling them that the Government, and he in particular, were always actuated by an overwhelming sense of public duty. No doubt, that was the case; but when the right hon. Gentleman had applied exalted maxims of that kind to the provision of a salary for the Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland, and spoke of the duty he owed to the nation in respect of that salary, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would excuse him for adding that when, with what seemed like infatuated obstinacy, he made that Bill the chief measure of the Government day after day and night after night, hon. Members would hardly moderate their views as to these exalted notions of the public interests and public duty. The right hon. Gentleman knew perfectly well that this was a Bill which was obnoxious to Members who sat on that side of the House. He knew that it was a measure calculated to provoke violent resistance on the part of the Representatives of the country for whom this Under Secretaryship was being created and salaried. He knew, further, that those who advocated the cause of public economy on the Opposition side of the House would necessarily and properly resist what they regarded as a rank and flagrant job; and, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman had to calculate upon a strong resistance from that side of the House, unless he had been very badly informed indeed by his own agents on the other side. He must have known that the Parliamentary Under Secretary Bill would not receive the support of a great number of hon. Gentlemen who were prepared to support him on almost every other occasion. He ought to have known that it would be opposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage), who last night withdrew the light of his countenance from the Government, and yet the Leader of the House pressed upon the House, as a measure of first rate national importance, to take precedence of the question of Imperial Defence, a measure upon which he escaped, like Job, by only the skin of his teeth. Without emulating the virtues of that patriarch, including the virtue of patience, the right hon. Gentleman came forward and told them that he was actuated by an overwhelming sense of public duty in introducing such a Bill, and making it the first Order of the Day, night after night. All he could say was that he entirely agreed with the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) in saying that this was a novel and unexampled method of conducting Public Business; and when, having so conducted Public Business, the right

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—PORTUMNA
BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. HARRIS (Galway, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it be true that Mr. Patrick Larkin was appointed rate collector by the Portumna Board of Guardians on March 31 last, and that the Local Government Board refused to sanction his appointment; and, whether the reasons assigned for such refusal were that he had taken part in an assembly at his father's door, and that he had spoken harshly to Constable Clemens, who followed Mr. D. Crilly, M.P., into his (Mr. Larkin's) father's house; and, if so, whether, having regard to the light character of the offence for which Mr. Larkin was held to bail, the Local Government Board will withdraw their opposition to his appointment?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): My reply to the first paragraph of the Question is in the affirmative. Upon the matter coming before the Local Government Board, it was found that this man had, in 1886, been convicted of being one of a party charged with assaulting persons, and he was bound over for six months; again, on the 12th of March last, he was put under a rule of bail for 12 months for using violent and abusive language towards a police sergeant in the discharge of his duty. In these circumstances, the Local Government Board are of opinion that he is a person who should not be entrusted with the office, and they decline, therefore, to sanction the appointment.

RIOTS, &c. (IRELAND)—CAPTAIN L. S.
PAYNE AT FERMOY—REMOVAL OF
BANNERS, &c.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the report in The Cork Examiner of the 8th of May, of the trial of Captain Ludlow Strange Payne, at Fermoy, on a summons charging him with tearing down after midnight certain banners and decorations erected across the streets of Fermoy in honour of the visit of the hon. Member for North East Cork (Mr. O'Brien); whether the evidence showed that Captain Payne was caught in the act by the night watchman; whether, although the summons was dismissed on the ground that the complainant should have been the Town Commissioners, the presiding magistrate stated that—

"So far as the emblem was concerned there was nothing to object to in it. We cannot understand why Captain Payne interfered with them;"

and added, in giving judgment—

"That both Mr. Furlong and himself considered that Mr. Payne had acted not only with very bad taste but with the most extreme imprudence and danger. By the insult he committed he not only placed himself in danger, but also other people who might be supposed to regard Mr. Payne's action with favour; but on the legal point they did not see their way to a conviction;"

and, will Captain Payne be allowed to retain his Militia command?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): With regard to the first three Questions asked by the hon. and learned Gentleman, I can only refer him to the answer given for me last night by my hon. Friend the Member for Wigton (Sir Herbert Maxwell). In answer to the fourth Question, I have to say it would depend upon the result of further inquiries, which are being made.

MR. T. M. HEALY asked, when it would be convenient for the right hon. Gentleman to answer the Question?

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he was afraid he should not be in a position to answer it on Thursday. He had communicated with the authorities in Ireland; but he had not yet received a reply.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he would repeat the Question on Thursday.

LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)—
PROPOSED MEETING IN TRAFALGAR
SQUARE.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, if a bond fide political meeting be called by responsible persons to discuss the Local Government Bill in its bearing upon the Metropolis, in Trafalgar Square, the police will be directed or authorized in any way to interfere with the same?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): The Regulation of the Chief Commissioner of Police of November 18, 1887, is still in force. It has been very useful in preserving the peace and good order of the Metropolis, and in protecting the trade postpone this question until after the Whitsuntide Holidays, when probably most hon. Members would by that time have been able to study the interesting and instructive discussion, which had just taken place in "another place." To come back to the manner in which Her Majesty's Government were putting forward the Public Business. They all knew that Her Majesty's Ministers had treated the question of the salary of the Under Secretary for Ireland as if it were the most important question they had in hand. So much haste had been shown to push forward the Bill to provide a salary of £1,500 a-year for the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman) that he (Mr. Illingworth) was disposed to think the Government were under some obligation of which the House was ignorant, and that the Bill was a sop thrown to a certain section of hon. Members on the other side of the House. Certainly the Government must be under some private undertaking of which the House had no knowledge, or otherwise it would be inconceivable that the time of the House should have been frittered away upon such a frivolous proposal. It was quite possible that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury had pushed the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) into a corner because he did not like the terms of the Resolution which had been placed on the Paper; but there was ample justification for saying that the unemployed, both in the towns and the country, were of opinion that Parliament might occupy itself much more satisfactorily in considering the great social and economic problems of the day than it was in the habit of doing. When it was seen that such indecent haste was shown for the introduction of changes into our Army and Navy system, and that great social problems were thrust aside for them, he thought the country would see that the present Government was one almost entirely of profession, and had failed in their duty with regard to economy and in all other respects.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) said, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury to reconsider his position with regard to the Motion of his hon. Friend. It was well known throughout the House that the Motion of the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) was the subject of great interest on the part of the public, for it dealt with the sad problems that were thrust upon them periodically when the cold weather came on. The supporters of the Motion had placed their views before the Ministry in the hope that they might be able to hold out some prospect of aid to the suffering masses. He could not help thinking that the conduct of the Government in postponing the Motion was due to a desire to shirk responsibility which would be thrown upon them if the Motion were carried. He could not congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the crumb of comfort which he had offered to the hon. Member for West Nottingham when he said that Government might be able to come to his Motion in the course of the evening. That he thought was, indeed, adding insult to injury. Did the right hon. Gentleman think that a discussion of one or two hours would be sufficient to decide that for which the supporters of the Motion considered a whole day should be devoted? But, even if half or two-thirds of that time were taken, did the right hon. Gentleman believe that it would be possible for them to go into all the details of this gigantic problem? He thought the Imperial Defence Bill could wait its turn. There were some of them who believed that great home questions were as important as great foreign questions; that in the past too much money and time had been wasted on foreign affairs; and that in the future more of the time of the House should be devoted to the welfare of the masses. He hoped his hon. Friend the Member for West Nottingham would divide the House on this question, in order to show who were in favour of this all-important subject receiving proper attention at the hands of the Government.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) said, he wished to make a few remarks in explanation of his action, which had been commented upon by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. As he (Mr. T. M. Healy) had stated last night, he had not the least objection whatever to the Government getting on with the National Defence Question, if they were really serious in their desire to do so; but what he objected to was their putting down as the

Mr. Illingworth

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—PORTUMNA
BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

Mr. HARRIS (Galway, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it be true that Mr. Patrick Larkin was appointed rate collector by the Portumna Board of Guardians on March 31 last, and that the Local Government Board refused to sanction his appointment; and, whether the reasons assigned for such refusal were that he had taken part in an assembly at his father's door, and that he had spoken harshly to Constable Clemens, who followed Mr. D. Crilly, M.P., into his (Mr. Larkin's) father's house; and, if so, whether, having regard to the light character of the offence for which Mr. Larkin was held to bail, the Local Government Board will withdraw their opposition to his appointment?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): My reply to the first paragraph of the Question is in the affirmative. Upon the matter coming before the Local Government Board, it was found that this man had, in 1886, been convicted of being one of a party charged with assaulting persons, and he was bound over for six months; again, on the 12th of March last, he was put under a rule of bail for 12 months for using violent and abusive language towards a police sergeant in the discharge of his duty. In these circumstances, the Local Government Board are of opinion that he is a person who should not be entrusted with the office, and they decline, therefore, to sanction the appointment.

RIOTS, &c. (IRELAND)—CAPTAIN L. S.
PAYNE AT FERMOY—REMOVAL OF
BANNERS, &c.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the report in The Cork Examiner of the 8th of May, of the trial of Captain Ludlow Strange Payne, at Fermoy, on a summons charging him with tearing down after midnight certain banners and decorations erected across the streets of Fermoy in honour of the visit of the hon. Member for North East Cork (Mr. O'Brien); whether the evidence showed that Captain Payne was caught in the act by the night watchman; whether, although the summons was dismissed on the ground that the complainant should have been the Town Commissioners, the presiding magistrate stated that—

“So far as the emblem was concerned there was nothing to object to in it. We cannot understand why Captain Payne interfered with them;”

and added, in giving judgment—

“That both Mr. Furlong and himself considered that Mr. Payne had acted not only with very bad taste but with the most extreme imprudence and danger. By the insult he committed he not only placed himself in danger, but also other people who might be supposed to regard Mr. Payne's action with favour; but on the legal point they did not see their way to a conviction;”

and, will Captain Payne be allowed to retain his Militia command?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): With regard to the first three Questions asked by the hon. and learned Gentleman, I can only refer him to the answer given for me last night by my hon. Friend the Member for Wigton (Sir Herbert Maxwell). In answer to the fourth Question, I have to say it would depend upon the result of further inquiries, which are being made.

MR. T. M. HEALY asked, when it would be convenient for the right hon. Gentleman to answer the Question?

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he was afraid he should not be in a position to answer it on Thursday. He had communicated with the authorities in Ireland; but he had not yet received a reply.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he would repeat the Question on Thursday.

LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)—
PROPOSED MEETING IN TRAFALGAR
SQUARE.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, if a bond fide political meeting be called by responsible persons to discuss the Local Government Bill in its bearing upon the Metropolis, in Trafalgar Square, the police will be directed or authorized in any way to interfere with the same?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): The Regulation of the Chief Commissioner of Police of November 18, 1887, is still in force. It has been very useful in preserving the peace and good order of the Metropolis, and in protecting the trade and many hon. Gentlemen on the Benches opposite rather ashamed of the conduct of their friends. I was saying that we are content with the management of the Business of the House, and the country knows that this year we have, under the guidance of my right hon. Friend, been able to bring the Business of the country to a more advanced point than has been possible during many past Sessions. It, therefore, ill becomes hon. Members, under these circumstances, to cast blame on my right hon. Friend. It has been said that we are forcing on the Parliamentary Under Secretary Bill, and hon. Members opposite have expressed surprise that the word "Obstruction" should have fallen from the First Lord of the Treasury during his remarks about the opposition which that Bill had met with. But do hon. Members remember that yesterday, if I am not mistaken, was the seventh night of their opposition to this Bill? It is a Bill of two clauses only, and the principle involved is very small. That principle is one which has been generally accepted in practice by right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench. It is that a man is entitled to his hire, and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, by drawing their salaries when in Office, have shown their respect for that principle. The hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) said that we have got the man, and was not that enough? And another hon. Member has hinted that we must be under some private obligations to the right hon. and gallant Member for the Isle of Thanet. No; we are not under a private obligation; but we are under an obligation of honour. If the right hon. and gallant Member is doing his part in the service of his country, he is as much entitled to his salary as any other Member of the Government, or as any right hon. Gentleman or any hon. Member opposite would be. We shall go through with the Bill, because we think this an obligation of honour. This is the reason why we consider it absolutely necessary. We, moreover, do not think it would be right for hon. Members opposite, after taking seven nights in discussing that Bill—["Oh!"]—well, at any rate, after discussing it on seven separate occasions—to occupy more of the time of Parliament, when there is but one clause left in the Bill, which might have been disposed of in an hour. Everything has been said about it that could have been said—["Hear, hear!"]—and the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) cheers that, and yet he, with others, is continually voting for more of the time of the House in order further to discuss this Bill. It would be well if we could accept that as the conduct of hon. Members opposite—that their object in discussing this Bill upon seven occasions is to drive the majority to do that which they had objected to on so many occasions—that it was to get the majority to surrender their will to the minority, and that that could be accomplished, provided they only spoke often enough, and interposed their opposition with sufficient frequency. It was not my intention to interfere in this debate; but I must protest once more against the injustice of Members in placing blame for this matter upon the First Lord of the Treasury, who has been able to advance the Business of the House in such a way as even to receive the compliments of right hon. Gentlemen opposite.

Mr. Goschen

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): The Chancellor of the Exchequer has informed us that the Bill for granting a salary to the Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland, which has been the unfortunate cause of all these difficulties—for it is quite evident that the embarrassment in which we are placed and the censure passed on the First Lord of the Treasury is due to that—is pressed forward by the Government because it is a matter of honourable obligation to provide the salary, and because the labourer is worthy of his hire. If it is a matter of honourable obligation to provide this salary, why was it not provided last year? Last year it was made a matter of boasting by the Government that they were providing gratuitously for the valuable services of this right hon. and gallant Gentleman. You cannot take it both ways. You cannot make it a matter of boast and credit to yourselves that you are giving us the great advantage of such valuable services for nothing, and then plead that it is a matter of honourable obligation which makes you invade the rights of private Members to furnish a salary for that purpose. For my part, I am bound to say I do not recognize the argument in the other form in which it has been put by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He says you have enjoyed the benefit of these services, and therefore you ought to be ready to pay for them. I am not ready to pay for them, and I do not recognize the benefit of the services. I am not of opinion that they are, or have been, beneficial. I do not ask how far it is the fault of the right hon. Gentleman; but I am bound to say that, quite independent of the fact that this is the creation by Parliament of a totally unnecessary Office, it has been made the occasion for selecting for that Office a Gentleman whose appointment, in the unfortunate circumstances in which it stands, is no less than an insult to the people of Ireland. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says that you have objected to this again and again, whereas everything that had to be said could be said in the course of an hour. I have never heard anything of an obstructive or over-prolonged debate upon this Bill. I was not present—[Ministerial Cheers]. I was going to say that I was absent from the House during a portion of the evening when, as I understand, there was a prolonged debate—not prolonged by the opponents of the Bill, but by its supporters, from a dread of being placed in a minority. If, therefore, there is any foundation for the complaint of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it is a complaint against his own side of the House. But when the Chancellor of the Exchequer objects to our repeating our objections to a Bill like this, I say this is the very purpose for which the House provides successive stages in a Bill, so that when a Bill is judged by a large portion of the House to be of a most objectionable character, both in principle and effect, that objection may be repeated at every stage of the Bill, and I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer may fully expect that he will see that objection repeated upon the stages of the Bill which yet remain; not, I hope, in obstruction to the general Business, but undoubtedly in such a manner as to draw the attention of the House more and more to the nature and character of a Bill which I think to be one of the most objectionable ever submitted to us upon the creation of an Office, with regard to which, if it lays an honourable obligation on the Government to promote it, it is an equally honourable obligation on the objectors to record their votes again and again in condemnation of it. I mean to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton, not simply on account of the objectionable character of the Bill, but on account of the fact that this Bill—being one of the simplest scope, and one affecting personal convenience—was last night most improperly preferred to other measures of the greatest importance concerning the national defences. That precedence having been given, it is proposed to inflict the penalty of that error—to call it by a mild name—upon my hon. Friend the Member for West Nottingham, and through my hon. Friend upon those vast masses of the labouring classes of this country who take an interest in his Motion alike legitimate and profound.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to correct an error into which he has fallen. He has told us that if there was Obstruction, the Obstruction was Conservative; that there were speeches made on our side with a view of delaying a Division until a majority were secure for the Government. I do not know where the right hon. Gentleman got his information from.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) made the statement about an hour before.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Wherever the right hon. Gentleman got his information from he was wrongly informed.

MR. HENEAGE: What I stated was this—that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House never asked the House to come to a decision upon the Amendment of which I had charge until 25 minutes past 10, and that at any time between half-past 9 and half-past 10 he could have had a Division if he had asked for one, and I said that the reason he did not do so was very well known to himself—because he did not desire a Division at that time. But I did not say that speeches were made on the opposite side of the House. In that my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) was mistaken.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Now we know exactly what Tory Obstruction means. It means that the closure was not put on one hour and a-half earlier than it was. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian will now perceive that he gave a totally wrong version of the information which he received, because he distinctly stated that the Division was delayed by the speeches made on the Government side.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): The right hon. Gentleman said nothing of the kind.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the right hon. Gentleman could, and would, contradict me if I were wrong. The only speech made on this side of the House was made by the hon. and learned Member for Stafford (Mr. Staveley Hill); and if that was made with a view of aiding the Government, my hon. and learned Friend disguised his friendship in a very singular manner, because he spoke against the Bill. Now, if the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian tells us that we boasted last Session that the Under Secretary was to take Office without salary, he will allow me, for the second time, to correct him. We never boasted anything of the kind. The condition of Public Business last Session was such that everyone who was in the House knows that it was absolutely impossible to ask Parliament to pass the Bill which is now before the House. The duty which was cast upon us then remains a duty, though we were unable to carry it through last Session. We were bound by every principle of public policy and honour to carry out that duty, and we mean to do so. The right hon. Gentleman has attacked my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who said that the labourer was worthy of his hire, and said—"We do not admit that we get any benefit from his services. We do not want his services. We do not think he ought to be paid for them." Well, Sir, my experience of Members of the Opposition is that they very seldom think that the Members of the Government are worth their salaries. If I had often been tempted to think that the right hon. Gentleman opposite was, when he was in power, considerably overpaid for any benefit conferred on the country, I never thought that was a sufficient reason to come down to the House and oppose a Vote for giving him his salary. The right hon. Gentleman worked hard and conscientiously for what he thought was the interest of the country. I think he was mistaken—we all on this side of the House thought he was mistaken. But that did not make it a matter of public policy that the right hon. Gentleman should be deprived of his salary. I cannot admit that the criterion of merit laid down by the right hon. Gentleman that the action of Ministers must meet the approval of the Opposition Bench is one that will be accepted by the House. Then the right hon. Gentleman talked about our overriding the convenience of the House. Who is it that is overriding the convenience of the House? The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that, because he objects to a Bill, he has not only an unlimited right but an unlimited duty to discuss that Bill. If that principle is accepted you give up every argument against Obstruction once and for ever. The whole principle, as I understand the matter, in which in restoring to Parliament the right to manage its own Business is that when a question has once been adequately discussed and accepted by the majority, the minority shall accept the situation. It is a pure accident—a Parliamentary accident I may call it—that so many opportunities have been given for the discussion of this particular Bill. The Bill having been brought in by a Resolution of the House, undoubtedly opportunities have been given to hon. Members, which they have very seldom availed themselves of with regard to other Bills, of discussing the question on four or five separate stages; and every opportunity has been used for repeating over and over again the same stock arguments and the same violent personal invective. I deny the position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman opposite; I deny that the Opposition have a duty cast upon them of repeating and repeating and repeating indefinitely precisely the same speeches, precisely the same arguments, and precisely the same statements; and I deny, above all, that the Government are bound to regulate their policy in managing the Business of this House by the degree of Obstruction it may please the right hon. Gentleman to oppose to them. If you once admit that principle it is perfectly clear that the persons who will arrange the order of Business will not be the Government, who are responsible for that Business, but the irresponsible Gentlemen of the Opposition, who think they have a right to speak as long and as often as they like on every question. I confess I think that if the right hon. Gentleman will only examine into the principles which underlie the speech he has just made to the House, he will see that they are absolutely subversive of the conduct of the whole of the Public Business of the House; and on that ground, if on no other, I object to the Amendment he supports.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I think the right hon. Gentleman is rather ungrateful to me when he says that the Members of the Opposition always deem Members of the Government unworthy of their salaries, because the right hon. Gentleman will remember that last night I vindicated the right of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to his salary. The right hon. Gentleman has attempted once more to vindicate the position taken up by the Government last year. I am not again going to read to the House the answers made to me last year by the First Lord of the Treasury and by the right hon. Gentleman himself; but when the right hon. Gentleman says that last year the Government had recognized it in their own minds as an obligation of honour to remunerate the Parliamentary Under Secretary, I cannot help recalling a speech made outside this House by the Under Secretary himself. On a certain day in April the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman) made a speech to his constituents at Margate, in which "he thanked God he was not like Irish Members, who took their payments from the maidservants of New York." "Here am I," he said, "serving and going to serve my country for nothing." [Mr. T. M. HEALY: For 15 hours a day.] I do not want to lay stress upon that, because the right hon. and gallant Gentleman is not here to defend himself; but the Chief Secretary must know that that statement was made. Therefore, my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian was perfectly justified in saying that the country and the House last year understood, not only from Gentlemen on the Front Bench opposite, but from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet himself, that the Office was to be a gratuitous one. We were charged—and I never heard a more unjust charge made—by the First Lord of the Treasury last night with unnecessarily wasting the time of the House. As a matter of fact, I said to my right hon. Friend the Member for Grimsby—"Surely this has gone on long enough; why do not you get up and urge them not to go on any longer?" He was on the point of doing so when the First Lord of the Treasury got up and stopped the debate; and for a reason of his own which I did not then know—and now I know it I do not quite sympathize with it—my right hon. Friend did not press for a Division. It was notorious that if we had taken a Division before 10 o'clock we should have put the Government into a minority on this Bill, and I now wish that we had done it. We have heard a great deal as to the right of the majority, and I can understand if the majority had been 100 or 120 all that high language might have been used; but when a minority which comes within eight or nine of the majority prolongs a discussion, it is monstrous that that should be called "factious opposition." The right hon. Gentleman said that the discussion last night turned on points which had been argued repeatedly. I submit to him that several new points were made—as he himself will admit, if, as I hope, he has some candour still left—none of which could be said to have been over-argued or over-laboured. I can only tell the right hon. Gentleman that, as far as I am concerned, it is my full intention to argue out all the points the three clauses of the Bill contain, and I hope that before we come to the end of the Bill we shall find it possible to drive the Government a little closer than we drove them last night.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston) said, he hoped the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) would press his Amendment to a Division, and that it would be made clear to the country what they were dividing about. They asked, on the Motion of the hon. Member for West Nottingham, to consider a question of the utmost importance to the masses of the people both in towns and in the country; a question which was inquired into and reported upon by a Royal Commission some three or four years ago, but on which no practical steps had been taken, and a question which was evidently as acute to-day as it was then. They were now asked by the Government to brush aside the important Motion of which the hon. Member had given Notice, in order to consider the advisability of spending nearly £1,000,000 on Colonial defence. He had yet to learn that there was any Colonial danger; and if there were any such danger to be apprehended, he could not conceive the wisdom of spending this £1,000,000 in fortifying the Australian Colonies. He and his hon. Friends wished to make it clear to their countrymen that night after night, during the present Session, had been devoted to the consideration of questions relating to the Army and Navy; but that not one night had been given to the consideration of the all-important subject which the hon. Member for West Nottingham invited the House to consider. This was the old story of the people asking for bread and receiving a stone. The people said—"We want better wages," and the Government offered to build more iron-clads, which proved that they were out of sympathy with the demands and wishes of the people; and the sooner that was made clear to the people's apprehension the better. The Government were asking the House to vote money which would lead the Colonies into a swaggering and defiant attitude; and he hoped when they had secured their mechanical majority they would tell the House where the danger existed, whence the foe was likely to come, and from what source of taxation this £1,000,000 was to be raised. The Government were not willing to give even one night of the Session to the consideration of the requirements of the people; while night after night they were frittering away the time of the House and the country on the consideration of questions which were not of the enormous and pressing importance attaching to that dealt with in the Motion of the hon. Member for West Nottingham.

MR. LABOUCHERE rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question, "That the Question be now put," put, and agreed to.

Mr. Cremer

Question put accordingly, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 290; Noes 187: Majority 103.

AYES.

Addison, J. E. W.	Cochrane-Baillie, hon.
Agg-Gardner, J. T.	C. W. A. N.
Aird, J.	Coddington, W.
Ambrose, W.	Coghill, D. H.
Amherst, W. A. T.	Collings, J.
Anstruther, Colonel R.	Colomb, Capt. J. C. R.
H. L.	Compton, F.
Anstruther, H. T.	Cooke, C. W. R.
Ashmead-Bartlett, E.	Corbett, A. C.
Baden-Powell, Sir G. S.	Corry, Sir J. P.
Bailey, Sir J. R.	Cotton, Capt. E. T. D.
Baird, J. G. A.	Cranborne, Viscount
Balfour, rt. hon. A. J.	Cross, H. S.
Barclay, J. W.	Crossman, Gen. Sir W.
Baring, T. C.	Cubitt, right hon. G.
Barnes, A.	Currie, Sir D.
Barry, A. H. S.	Curzon, Viscount
Bartley, G. C. T.	Curzon, hon. G. N.
Barttelot, Sir W. B.	Dalrymple, Sir C.
Bass, H.	Darling, C. J.
Bates, Sir E.	Davenport, H. T.
Baumann, A. A.	Dawnay, Colonel hon.
Bazley-White, J.	L. P.
Beach, right hon. Sir	De Lisle, E. J. L. M. P.
M. E. Hicks	De Worms, Baron H.
Beach, W. W. B.	Dimsdale, Baron R.
Beadel, W. J.	Dixon, G.
Beckett, W.	Dixon-Hartland, F. D.
Bentinck, rt. hn. G. C.	Donkin, R. S.
Beresford, Lord C. W.	Dugdale, J. S.
de la Poer	Duncan, Colonel F.
Bethell, Commander G.	Dyke, right hon. Sir
R.	W. H.
Biddulph, M.	Ebrington, Viscount
Bigwood, J.	Egerton, hon. A. J. F.
Blundell, Colonel H.	Egerton, hon. A. de T.
B. H.	Elliot, G. W.
Bolitho, T. B.	Ewart, Sir W.
Bond, G. H.	Eyre, Colonel H.
Bonsor, H. C. O.	Feilden, Lt.-Gen. R. J.
Borthwick, Sir A.	Fergusson, right hon.
Bridgeman, Col. hon.	Sir J.
F. C.	Field, Admiral E.
Bristowe, T. L.	Fielden, T.
Brodrick, hon. W. St.	Finch, G. H.
J. F.	Finlay, R. B.
Brookfield, A. M.	Fisher, W. H.
Brooks, Sir W. C.	Fitzgerald, R. U. P.
Brown, A. H.	Fitzwilliam, hon. W.
Bruce, Lord H.	J. W.
Burdett-Coutts, W. L.	Fitz - Wygram, Gen.
Ash.-B.	Sir F. W.
Burghley, Lord	Fletcher, Sir H.
Campbell, Sir A.	Folkestone, right hon.
Campbell, J. A.	Viscount
Campbell, R. F. F.	Forwood, A. B.
Carmarthen, Marq. of	Fowler, Sir R. N.
Cavendish, Lord E.	Fraser, General C. C.
Chamberlain, rt. hn. J.	Fry, L.
Chamberlain, R.	Fulton, J. F.
Chaplin, right hon. H.	Gardner, R. Richard-
Churchill, right hon.	son-
Lord R. H. S.	Gathorne-Hardy, hon.
Clarke, Sir E. G.	A. F.

Gedge, S.
 Giles, A.
 Gilliat, J. S.
 Godson, A. F.
 Goldsmid, Sir J.
 Goldsworthy, Major
 General W. T.
 Gorst, Sir J. E.
 Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.
 Gray, C. W.
 Green, Sir E.
 Greene, E.
 Grimston, Viscount
 Gunter, Colonel R.
 Gurdon, R. T.
 Haldane, R. B.
 Hall, C.
 Halsey, T. F.
 Hambro, Col. C. J. T.
 Hamilton, right hon.
 Lord G. F.
 Hamilton, Lord C. J.
 Hamilton, Lord E.
 Hamilton, Col. C. E.
 Hamley, Gen. Sir E. B.
 Hanbury, R. W.
 Hankey, F. A.
 Hardcastle, E.
 Hardcastle, F.
 Hartington, Marq. of Hastings, G. W.
 Havelock-Allan, Sir
 H. M.
 Heaton, J. H.
 Heneage, right hon. E.
 Herbert, hon. S.
 Hervey, Lord F.
 Hill, right hon. Lord
 A. W.
 Hill, Colonel E. S.
 Hill, A. S.
 Hoare, E. B.
 Hoare, S.
 Hobhouse, H.
 Hornby, W. H.
 Houldsworth, Sir W. H.
 Howard, J.
 Howorth, H. H.
 Hozier, J. H. C.
 Hubbard, hon. E.
 Hughes, Colonel E.
 Hughes-Hallett, Col.
 F. C.
 Hulse, E. H.
 Hunt, F. S.
 Hunter, Sir W. G.
 Isaac, L. H.
 Isaacson, P. W.
 Jackson, W. L.
 James, rt. hon. Sir H.
 Jardine, Sir R.
 Jarvis, A. W.
 Jennings, L. J.
 Kelly, J. R.
 Kenaway, Sir J. H.
 Kendrick, W.
 Kenyon, hon. G. T.
 Kenyon-Slaney, Col.
 W.
 Kerans, F. H.
 Kimber, H.
 King, R. S.
 Knightley, Sir R.

Knowles, L.
 Lambert, C.
 Lawrance, J. C.
 Lawrence, Sir J. J. T.
 Lawrence, W. F.
 Lea, T.
 Lechmere, Sir E. A. H.
 Lees, E.
 Leighton, S.
 Lethbridge, Sir R.
 Lewisham, right hon.
 Viscount
 Llewellyn, E. H.
 Lowther, hon. W.
 Lubbock, Sir J.
 Lymington, Viscount
 Macartney, W. G. E.
 Macdonald, rt. hon. J.
 H. A.
 Mackintosh, C. F.
 Maclean, F. W.
 Maclean, J. M.
 Maclure, J. W.
 Madden, D. H.
 Makins, Colonel W. T.
 Malcolm, Col. J. W.
 Maskelyne, M. H. N.
 Story-
 Matthews, rt. hon. H.
 Mattinson, M. W.
 Maxwell, Sir H. E.
 Mayne, Adml. R. C.
 Mildmay, F. B.
 Mills, hon. C. W.
 Milvain, T.
 Morgan, hon. F.
 Morrison, W.
 Moss, R.
 Mount, W. G.
 Mowbray, rt. hon. Sir
 J. R.
 Mowbray, R. G. C.
 Mulholland, H. L.
 Muncaster, Lord
 Muntz, P. A.
 Murdoch, C. T.
 Noble, W.
 Norris, E. S.
 Northcote, hon. Sir
 H. S.
 Norton, R.
 O'Neill, hon. R. T.
 Paget, Sir R. H.
 Parker, hon. F.
 Pelly, Sir L.
 Penton, Captain F. T.
 Plunket, rt. hon. D. R.
 Powell, F. S.
 Price, Captain G. E.
 Puleston, Sir J. H.
 Quilter, W. C.
 Raikes, rt. hon. H. C.
 Rankin, J.
 Rasch, Major F. O.
 Reed, H. B.
 Richardson, T.
 Ridley, Sir M. W.
 Ritchie, rt. hon. C. T.
 Robertson, J. P. B.
 Robinson, B.
 Ross, A. H.
 Rothschild, Baron F.
 J. de

Russell, T. W.
 Salt, T.
 Sandys, Lt.-Col. T. M.
 Saunderson, Col. E. J.
 Sellar, A. C.
 Selwin-Ibbetson, right
 hon. Sir H. J.
 Selwyn, Captain C. W.
 Seton-Karr, H.
 Shaw-Stewart, M. H.
 Sidebotham, J. W.
 Sinclair, W. P.
 Smith, right hon. W.
 H.
 Smith, A.
 Spencer, J. E.
 Stanhope, rt. hon. E.
 Stanley, E. J.
 Stephens, H. C.
 Stewart, M. J.
 Stokes, G. G.
 Swetenham, E.
 Sykes, C.
 Talbot, J. G.
 Taylor, F.
 Temple, Sir R.

Theobald, J.
 Thorburn, W.
 Townsend, F.
 Trotter, Col. H. J.
 Tyler, Sir H. W.
 Vincent, C. E. H.
 Walsh, hon. A. H. J.
 Waring, Colonel T.
 Watkin, Sir E. W.
 Watson, J.
 Webster, R. G.
 Wharton, J. L.
 Whitley, E.
 Whitmore, C. A.
 Wilson, Sir S.
 Winn, hon. R.
 Wodehouse, E. R.
 Wolmer, Viscount
 Wood, N.
 Wortley, C. B. Stuart-
 Wright, H. S.
 Young, C. E. B.

TELLERS.

Douglas, A. Akers-Walrand, Col. W. H.

NOES.

Acland, A. H. D.
 Allison, R. A.
 Anderson, C. H.
 Asquith, H. H.
 Atherley-Jones, L.
 Austin, J.
 Balfour, rt. hon. J. B.
 Balfour, Sir G.
 Barran, J.
 Biggar, J. G.
 Bolton, J. C.
 Bradlaugh, C.
 Bright, Jacob
 Brown, A. L.
 Brunner, J. T.
 Bryce, J.
 Buchanan, T. R.
 Buxton, S. C.
 Byrne, G. M.
 Cameron, C.
 Cameron, J. M.
 Campbell, Sir G.
 Campbell, H.
 Campbell-Bannerman, right hon. H.
 Carew, J. L.
 Causton, R. K.
 Cavan, Earl of Channing, F. A.
 Childers, right hon. H.
 C. E.
 Clark, Dr. G. B.
 Cobb, H. P.
 Colman, J. J.
 Conway, M.
 Conybeare, C. A. V.
 Cossham, H.
 Cozens-Hardy, H. H.
 Craig, J.
 Crawford, D.
 Crawford, W.
 Cremer, W. R.
 Davies, W.
 Dillwyn, L. L.
 Duff, R. W.

Ellis, J.
 Ellis, J. E.
 Ellis, T. E.
 Esslemont, P.
 Farquharson, Dr. R.
 Fenwick, C.
 Ferguson, R. C. Munro-
 Finucane, J.
 Firth, J. F. B.
 Flower, C.
 Flynn, J. C.
 Forster, Sir C.
 Foster, Sir W. B.
 Fowler, right hon. H.
 H.
 Fox, Dr. J. F.
 Gane, J. L.
 Gardner, H.
 Gaskell, C. G. Milnes-
 Gladstone, right hon.
 W. E.
 Gourley, E. T.
 Graham, R. C.
 Grey, Sir E.
 Gully, W. C.
 Harcourt, rt. hon. Sir W.
 G. V. V.
 Harrington, E.
 Hayden, L. P.
 Hayne, C. Seale-
 Healy, M.
 Healy, T. M.
 Hingley, B.
 Howell, G.
 Hoyle, I.
 Hunter, W. A.
 Illingworth, A.
 Jacoby, J. A.
 James, hon. W. H.
 Joicey, J.
 Jordan, J.
 Kay-Shuttleworth, rt.
 hon. Sir U. J.
 Kenny, C. S.
 Kilbride, D.

Lalor, R.	Randell, D.
Lawson, Sir W.	Rathbone, W.
Leahy, J.	Reed, Sir E. J.
Leake, R.	Reid, R. T.
Lefevre, right hon. G.	Rendel, S.
J. S.	Reynolds, W. J.
Lockwood, F.	Richard, H.
Lyell, L.	Roberts, J.
Mac Innes, M.	Roe, T.
M'Arthur, A.	Roscoe, Sir H. E.
M'Arthur, W. A.	Rowlands, J.
M'Carthy, J.	Rowlands, W. B.
M'Donald, P.	Rowntree, J.
M'Donald, Dr. R.	Samuelson, Sir B.
M'Ewan, W.	Samuelson, G. B.
M'Kenna, Sir J. N.	Schwann, C. E.
M'Lagan, P.	Shaw, T.
M'Laren, W. S. B.	Sheehan, J. D.
Marjoribanks, rt. hon. E.	Simon, Sir J.
Mayne, T.	Smith, S.
Montagu, S.	Spencer, hon. C. R.
Morgan, rt. hon. G. O.	Stack, J.
Morgan, O. V.	Stanhope, hon. P. J.
Morley, rt. hon. J.	Stansfeld, right hon. J.
Morley, A.	Stevenson, F. S.
Mundella, rt. hon. A. J.	Stevenson, J. C.
Murphy, W. M.	Stuart, J.
Nolan, J.	Sullivan, D.
O'Brien, P. J.	Sullivan, T. D.
O'Connor, A.	Summers, W.
O'Connor, J.	Sutherland, A.
O'Connor, T. P.	Swinburne, Sir J.
O'Doherty, J. E.	Tanner, C. K.
O'Keeffe, F. A.	Thomas, A.
O'Kelly, J.	Thomas, D. A.
Palmer, Sir C. M.	Trevelyan, right hon. Sir G. O.
Parker, C. S.	Vivian, Sir H. H.
Paulton, J. M.	Waddy, S. D.
Pease, A. E.	Wallace, R.
Pease, H. F.	Warrington, C. M.
Phillips, J. W.	Watt, H.
Pickard, B.	Wayman, T.
Pickersgill, E. H.	Will, J. S.
Picton, J. A.	Williams, A. J.
Playfair, right hon. Sir L.	Williamson, J.
Plowden, Sir W. C.	Williamson, S.
Powell, W. R. H.	Wilson, C. H.
Power, P. J.	Wilson, H. J.
Power, R.	Winterbotham, A. B.
Price, T. P.	Woodhead, J.
Priestley, B.	Wright, C.
Provand, A. D.
Pugh, D.

TELLERS.

Broadhurst, H.
Labouchere, H.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Order of the Day for the Committee on Imperial Defence [Expenses], have precedence this day of the Notices of Motion and other Orders of the Day.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

IMPERIAL DEFENCE [EXPENSES].

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I rise, Sir, to invite the Committee to consider proposals which the Government deem to be of great importance in the interests of the country—proposals deliberately adopted by the Government after considerable and careful study, and which are the issue of consultation with, and advice and assistance of, eminent Naval and Military Authorities during last year and the winter which has just passed. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) and my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) have both explained in their Statements the course which the Government propose to adopt, and the scheme itself was alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) in his Statement with regard to the finances of the year. The House is not, therefore, in any way without notice of the deliberate intention of the Government, which I have explained to be the result of long study and deliberation. The proposals which we now make are an addition to the expenditure on the Estimates for the Army and Navy for the defence of the country. The course which we have adopted is one which, as we think, may well be adopted not only with regard to the particular works we now recommend, but might with advantage be adopted with regard to any other serious works for the defence of the country. With regard to works which are vital and necessary to be provided for by Parliament once for all, economy, efficiency, and safety alike demand that they should be final in their character, and that the work on which we are entering should be thoroughly carried out. It has not been customary in the past to provide for expenditure in any year of more money than is required for particular works, and it has been customary to postpone the completion of such works for one, two, or three years until the Estimates of the year are brought under the notice of the House, and until the money is provided under the financial arrangements of the year. There is a great deal to be said in favour of that view; but I think hon. Members will see that it is inadvisable to propose from time to time the provision for works which are useless unless they are completed, and for fortifications and ships which are useless unless armed—and a gun takes almost

hon. Gentleman came forward, having wasted and abused the time of the Government on the nights appropriated to them, by giving them up to a measure which was not only frivolous but obnoxious to the exclusion of all others, the right hon. Gentleman asked them to set aside for urgent Business a question of interest and importance to the poorer classes of the community, like that which was advocated by the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst), it seemed perfectly right that a protest should be made against such a method of conducting Public Business.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanarkshire, N.W.) said, he wished to enter an emphatic protest against the course the Government proposed to take in not allowing time for the discussion of one of the most important Motions brought forward in this generation. If the Government apprehended how the poor of England and the unemployed were looking towards the action to be taken for their benefit, they would have hesitated to refuse one evening for the discussion of the question.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, he rose to protest against the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury that there had been any obstruction or factious opposition to the Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland Bill last night. He wished to remind the House of what the circumstances of the case were on Monday night. It was not until 20 minutes to 8 o'clock that he could rise to move his Amendment. Four speeches had been made before Mr. Deputy Speaker left the Chair for the usual interval during the dinner hour, the debate went on until 25 minutes past 10, and no Member of the Government rose to ask for a Division. The right hon. Gentleman then rose for the first time, and asked the House if the time had not arrived at which a Division ought to be taken. He (Mr. Heneage) was actually on the point of rising, at the suggestion of his right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley), to request other hon. Members who took an interest in the question to allow a Division to be taken. It was at that moment that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury interposed, and if there had been obstruction it was solely attributive to the right hon. Gentleman who moved the closure. Other people had a character at stake in that House as well as the right hon. Gentleman; and, therefore, he could not allow the remarks which had been made to pass by unnoticed. The right hon. Gentleman could, at any time after half-past 9 o'clock, have appealed to the House to take a Division. He (Mr. Heneage) would, however, tell the right hon. Gentleman why he did not take that course. He refrained from taking a Division because he knew that he was in a minority, and although that fact was known to himself, much as he should have liked to have defeated the Bill, he was restrained from moving the closure, because the means by which he acquired his knowledge prevented him from taking advantage of it. He challenged the Government to deny that the debate was not allowed to be continued until the attendance of the supporters of the Government enabled them to take a Division.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.) said, he thought the House was entitled to look at the proposal of the Government from another aspect. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House was himself in a panic, and appeared to have lost his head. He was constantly making his blunders, and there was a fear that they would be continued in an aggravated manner as the Session proceeded. It was most desirable that the proposal of the Government for making provision for the National Defences should not be considered by the House in any sense as if there was a panic. The right hon. Gentleman could have done no more than he now proposed if war had been imminent or actually declared. He could only have declared to the House that there was not an hour to lose; that the country was in a defenceless and dangerous position; and that it was necessary immediately to put aside every other question in order to put the country in a condition of defence. He had no wish to refer to what had taken place in "another place;" but he thought the House must be of opinion that Her Majesty's Government did not appear to have any well-matured policy on military and naval expenditure, or upon any other question that went along with great questions of high policy. He believed the House would be acting wisely if they asked the Government to been brought to a satisfactory conclusion, steps would be taken to obtain the sanction of Parliament to the proposals on which they were agreed. Acts sanctioning the Agreement, which was provisionally approved at the Colonial Conference of 1887, having been passed by the Legislatures of five out of the seven Colonies concerned, it now becomes incumbent on the Imperial Government to obtain the sanction of Parliament to the expenditure for which the Home Country will be responsible. I may state to the Committee for its information the development which has taken place upon naval construction. The arrangement I have described was made with the Colonies at the Colonial Conference last year. At that time it was proposed to provide a certain class of ship which, it was thought, in point of tonnage, speed, and fighting power, would be adequate for the protection of the commerce of England and Australia, and of the common interests of a united Empire. Of the vessels of the Archer class which it was proposed to construct, and which the Colonial Conference accepted, the length proposed was 225 feet, the length now approved is 265 feet; the displacement proposed was 1,770 tons, that now approved is 2,500 tons; and speed 17 knots, now 19 knots. The armament was to have been six 6-inch breech-loading guns, but now it is to be eight 36-pounder quick-firing guns. A similar development has followed the arrangement with regard to the torpedo boats. The Committee will observe that this development of power is a progressive development. A capacity now exists for producing vessels of great speed and great offensive power, which did not exist two, three, or four years ago; and even in one year there is an addition of one, two, or three knots speed of our ships, and also, I am sorry to add, an addition to their cost. But, Mr. Courtney, in this respect we are bound to provide the most efficient vessels we can for the objects we have in view. Those objects are the protection and safety of the commerce of the country, and the security of the great enterprizes in which the merchants of this country embark from time to time. Unless we can protect our commerce, our harbours, and our shores alike at Home and in our Colonies, I am afraid the time may come when a great disaster may overtake us. I cannot help remarking on the extreme value of the principle which underlies the engagement which has been made between this country and the Australian Colonies. We have in this Agreement recognized the principle of a common duty by the people of this country and our cousins, friends, and children in the Colonies in connection with the protection and defence of the Empire. They recognize that they must do something for the protection of their own interests, and they express their confidence in the capacity of this country to aid and protect them. They do something in the way of protecting themselves by imposing on themselves a considerable annual charge, while they place the entire control of the Naval Force in the hands of our naval officers in the South Seas. I think we have in this Agreement—which we now ask Parliament to ratify and enable us to carry out—the indication of a policy which we may distinctly follow with great advantage to the common interests of all who call themselves Englishmen, whether they are found in England or Australia, in Canada or the Cape of Good Hope, or in any other Colony. Once more I wish to point out that this is an addition to the strength of the Navy; it is in no way substitutionary for the provision made in the Estimates for the general purposes of the Navy. The sums I refer to are to be regarded as additional in all respects to the sum already asked for by the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty for the service of the country in the coming year. Now, I will refer to the second part of the plan for which we ask the approval of Parliament. We ask for a sum not exceeding £2,600,000, such as may be required for the defence of certain ports and coaling stations, and for making further provisions for Imperial defence. In asking for this provision we are only seeking to supply deficiencies which have been ascertained in past years. I am not going to impute blame or neglect to those who have gone before. It is no part of my purpose to endeavour to arouse any Party feeling or sentiment whatever with respect to this grave proposal to which I desire the attention of the Committee and the assent of Parliament. Whether or not adequate provision has been made from the point first question the Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Salary) Bill—he objected to give £1,500 a-year to the right hon. and gallant Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman) for the reasons which had been over and over again expressed. He thought he might say, in the words of an American orator, that he was willing to give “millions for defence, but not a cent for tribute.” The Government had put down this Bill on Monday before the Land Commission Bill, and they had done the same on previous days. The latter measure was one in which the Irish Members, it was needless to say, were greatly interested; but, as in the case of the little boys at Dotheboys Hall, the Government were determined to make them take their treacle before breakfast. He thought that was an inverted mode of procedure. They had never been able to get a satisfactory answer from the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury with regard to the discussion of this measure, and they always found that if they obtained a Morning Sitting the right hon. Gentleman immediately dove-tailed to it another measure. What he wished to say to the right hon. Gentleman with reference to this conduct was that he did not get the support of his Colleagues; they might give him their countenance, but they did not give him their counsel. It seemed to him that many of them were very glad to see him floundering in this business. He could see last night the malicious pleasure which some of his Colleagues evinced in the fact that the right hon. Gentleman was not conducting Public Business in the manner in which they thought they could conduct it if only they enjoyed his place. That was the way in which the inferior Members of the Government unfortunately acted on occasions of this kind, bearing out the proverb that persons were able to bear with great equanimity the misfortunes of their friends. He thought the Government had taken a most unfortunate course with regard to the Under Secretary's Bill. They objected to that course, because the Government had already got a man for the post; and it was said that the Bill was not to create but to regulate the Office. But how was it to regulate the Office if the House was only asked to give the right hon. and gallant Gentleman £1,500 a-year? The effect of the opposition of Members on that side of the House would be that his salary would only date from the passing of the Bill; and if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had managed to screw a large amount of rack-rents from his tenants, they had fined him, at any rate, to the extent of £100.

Mr. W. H. Smith

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): If we have interfered but little in this debate, it is because we are anxious to get to the next Order upon the Paper—namely, the Imperial Defence Bill, and because it did not seem necessary to answer some of the observations which have been made. It has been said that we wish to evade the important discussion which is to be inaugurated by the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst). Hon. Members will bear in mind that we pledged ourselves to make a House for the hon. Member, and that but for the action taken by the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) the Motion would have stood on the Paper for 9 o'clock to-night, and we should have proceeded at 9 o'clock to discuss that Motion. I think that any hon. Member who views the circumstances with fairness and impartiality in his mind will at once see that the suggestion that we wish to evade discussion is utterly absurd. The suggestion can only have been pressed into the debate in order to prejudice our case. An hon. Member has complained of the management of the Business of the House by the First Lord of the Treasury. Well, I am glad to be able to point to the results which have already been reached this Session. Business is more advanced than it has been at this time in many previous Sessions. [An hon. MEMBER: No thanks to you.] We have listened with great patience while much insult has been heaped upon us. Hon. Members opposite seem hardly able to keep silence when a defence of any Member of the Government is made on this side of the House—a defence which we are entitled to make, and one which I think any Gentleman who is accustomed to decent society would tolerate. The interruptions and laughter which proceed from hon. Members above and below the Gangway are sometimes such as to make right hon. Gentlemen take measures for the increase of the defence of our coasts, and also for increasing the strength of our Navy. These changes involve alterations in the power of guns and in the strength of iron-clads which could not have been foreseen, because these guns did not exist seven, eight, nine, or ten years ago. It was only in 1879 that I signed, on behalf of the Navy, the drawings of the first breech-loading gun for mounting on our ships, and that gun certainly was not made for two or three years after those drawings were signed. Small breech-loading guns had been in use for many years before; but hon. Gentlemen who are acquainted with the affairs of the Navy are aware that these breech-loading guns were withdrawn from the Service, owing to the strong objections entertained for some years previously to the date I have named, and it was only when we came to realize the absolute necessity of being able to meet the increasing strength of foreign guns and ships that we felt we must have breech-loading guns instead of muzzle-loading guns. It is not that a breech-loading gun in itself is a better gun than a muzzle-loading gun; but the objection is that you cannot handle them long—you cannot load and fire them as you can a breech-loading gun. The Committee go on to say that the next matters in importance to the Channel and Home defences are the defences of Gibraltar and Malta; and I am sure that any Gentleman capable of forming a judgment and of taking a survey of the responsibilities of the country, and of the dangers we should run if Gibraltar and Malta were not preserved as strong places for the security of the Empire, will readily agree with the Committee as to the absolute necessity of keeping these two fortresses in a proper condition of defence. Gibraltar and Malta, in common with our military ports at home, have suffered from the enormous increase in the power of large guns; and it is, therefore, necessary to give them guns and works which will enable them to resist any attack which may be made upon them. I would remind the Committee that the amount required, in the opinion of experts, to put these ports in a state of security in all contingencies is not less than £1,500,000. For that expenditure we shall be able to put the military ports in the Channel, Malta, and Gibraltar in a condition of security. [Sir GEORGE BALFOUR (Kincardine): How about powder?] Powder and projectiles are not provided for in this loan. The principle upon which we have proceeded is this—and I think the Committee will agree that it is a sound principle. We have provided for permanent works, and for that which is next in endurance to permanent works, heavy guns, by this loan. We thought we would not be justified in providing powder and projectiles, matters which come under revision in the ordinary way in Annual Estimates. [Sir GEORGE BALFOUR dissented.] Whether my hon. and gallant Friend agrees with me or not, I am afraid I cannot retract from the position I take up—namely, that we should not have been justified in asking for money on loan which was to be spent from day to day and week to week, and which would disappear altogether by the use of powder and projectiles. That is a matter for the Estimates. Well, Sir, I will not occupy the House long on the question of mercantile ports. I have stated the principle upon which we have proceeded with regard to them. They will be made reasonably secure against attacks from gunboats or torpedo boats; but it is obvious that to fortify our mercantile ports, or make them strong places in the ordinary sense of the word, would be a mistake of the gravest character, for it would draw upon them the fire of the enemy, and the results might be serious, even if the attack were beaten off. There is one point in this Report to which I wish to draw special attention, and that is the remark of the Committee as to the necessity of providing for garrisons. They say—

“The Committee have received from the head of the Intelligence Division of the War Office evidence as to the necessity of providing for the requisite garrisons, and for their maintenance in an effective state. Moreover, every battery of modern guns has its peculiar features, which, if it is to be worked effectively, ought to be thoroughly studied beforehand by the actual troops (whether of the Regular or Auxiliary Forces) likely to have charge of it in war time. Many circumstances combine to make it very difficult for our garrisons to have sufficient experience of the guns they will have to serve. This is a point which, in the opinion of the Committee, requires very careful attention, and they would recommend that every arm of the Service which is told off for the defence of a particular port should, wherever reasonably practicable, have an opportunity of being exercised upon the ground which it may have to the argument in the other form in which it has been put by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He says you have enjoyed the benefit of these services, and therefore you ought to be ready to pay for them. I am not ready to pay for them, and I do not recognize the benefit of the services. I am not of opinion that they are, or have been, beneficial. I do not ask how far it is the fault of the right hon. Gentleman; but I am bound to say that, quite independent of the fact that this is the creation by Parliament of a totally unnecessary Office, it has been made the occasion for selecting for that Office a Gentleman whose appointment, in the unfortunate circumstances in which it stands, is no less than an insult to the people of Ireland. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says that you have objected to this again and again, whereas everything that had to be said could be said in the course of an hour. I have never heard anything of an obstructive or over-prolonged debate upon this Bill. I was not present—[Ministerial Cheers].—I was going to say that I was absent from the House during a portion of the evening when, as I understand, there was a prolonged debate—not prolonged by the opponents of the Bill, but by its supporters, from a dread of being placed in a minority. If, therefore, there is any foundation for the complaint of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it is a complaint against his own side of the House. But when the Chancellor of the Exchequer objects to our repeating our objections to a Bill like this, I say this is the very purpose for which the House provides successive stages in a Bill, so that when a Bill is judged by a large portion of the House to be of a most objectionable character, both in principle and effect, that objection may be repeated at every stage of the Bill, and I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer may fully expect that he will see that objection repeated upon the stages of the Bill which yet remain; not, I hope, in obstruction to the general Business, but undoubtedly in such a manner as to draw the attention of the House more and more to the nature and character of a Bill which I think to be one of the most objectionable ever submitted to us upon the creation of an Office, with regard to which, if it lays an honourable obligation on the Government to promote it, it is an equally honourable obligation on the objectors to record their votes again and again in condemnation of it. I mean to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton, not simply on account of the objectionable character of the Bill, but on account of the fact that this Bill—being one of the simplest scope, and one affecting personal convenience—was last night most improperly preferred to other measures of the greatest importance concerning the national defences. That precedence having been given, it is proposed to inflict the penalty of that error—to call it by a mild name—upon my hon. Friend the Member for West Nottingham, and through my hon. Friend upon those vast masses of the labouring classes of this country who take an interest in his Motion alike legitimate and profound.

Mr. W. H. Smith

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to correct an error into which he has fallen. He has told us that if there was Obstruction, the Obstruction was Conservative; that there were speeches made on our side with a view of delaying a Division until a majority were secure for the Government. I do not know where the right hon. Gentleman got his information from.

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) made the statement about an hour before.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Wherever the right hon. Gentleman got his information from he was wrongly informed.

Mr. HENEAGE: What I stated was this—that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House never asked the House to come to a decision upon the Amendment of which I had charge until 25 minutes past 10, and that at any time between half-past 9 and half-past 10 he could have had a Division if he had asked for one, and I said that the reason he did not do so was very well known to himself—because he did not desire a Division at that time. But I did not say that speeches were made on the opposite side of the House. In that my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) was mistaken.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Now we know exactly what Tory Obstruction means. It means that the closure was past, we have ourselves provided against the repetition of a delay which is not only exceedingly disappointing, but which may be very dangerous to the public interest. A remark has been made in the course of the discussions upon this question as to the new rifle. Now, I wish to tell the Committee frankly what has occurred in this matter. If anything is kept back, it may be said we have some motive in keeping it back. Like other countries, we have been for a long time desirous of having a new rifle, the best rifle obtainable. For six years, I think, the subject has been studied by the Military Authorities. A Committee of experts, under pressure from myself I am afraid, reported two years ago in favour of a particular rifle; but no sooner had the Report been adopted and some rifles had been manufactured than it became clear to the Military Authorities that a better rifle was in prospect. Therefore, the manufacture was stopped, new experiments were undertaken, and the Committee was re-assembled; and now at last, after the lapse of another two years, we have a pattern which is approved by the Military Authorities, and is about to be tried in all climates and under all circumstances before it is finally adopted. But our experience is precisely the experience of other countries. It is said that France has got a start in the manufacture of a rifle; but we are not quite certain that that is the case, and certainly Germany has not yet started the manufacture of a new small-bore Magazine rifle, which is the arm that to our Military Authorities seems to be most necessary. I mention these circumstances in order to show that, however great may be the faults of our civilian administration of the War Department—and I am far from saying they have not faults—here is a particular question which has been entirely in the hands of experts during the last six years. [An hon. MEMBER: Seven years.] A right hon. Gentleman opposite says longer—that it is seven years. These experts have had every assistance, and all available resources which successive Governments possessed placed at their disposal; but so great are the difficulties, so many are the considerations involved in the choice of weapons, that it is only now that the Military Authorities have succeeded in deciding for themselves that they believe they have at last got the best weapon. One of the complaints made against the Government is, that we are slow in adopting improvements, and that so soon as we have adopted an improvement we do not immediately replace all the material of war that we possess by the improved article. In the first place, we must have some trial of a new article before we can know whether it is an improved weapon; and, in the next place, we must consider what expenditure is required to replace the rifle in the hands of 650,000 men who are mentioned as the strength of our Army, including Volunteers, but omitting the forces in India. It is complained that we have not organized the Departments and welded them into one vast machine. No efforts have been spared during the last three years—and I doubt not in years preceding, but certainly not on the part of Her Majesty's present Government—to avail themselves of the intelligence at their command at the War Office in the endeavour to improve the organization of the Army, to render it capable of undertaking any duties it may be called upon to discharge—in point of fact, to make it what it ought to be, ready to go anywhere, and to discharge any duty the country can reasonably call upon it to discharge. We have had great assistance from our Military Advisers and from experts specially called in. I should delay the Committee too much if I were to attempt to describe the work which has been done. Most valuable work has been done in the Departments of the Adjutant General and the Quartermaster General and by the head of the Intelligence Department, and they have combined in framing a scheme which has received the approval of the Secretary for War, and which has gone very far indeed to make the Army mobile and an easily-used machine for the purpose for which it is intended. I do not say this for the purpose of eliciting expressions of praise or of confidence. I know it is only natural that members of the Military and Naval Professions should have a certain want of confidence in civilians in the administration of great Services like the Army and Navy; but it is only fair that I should state that both at the Admiralty and at the War Department the professional officers who have been sponsible for that Business, but the irresponsible Gentlemen of the Opposition, who think they have a right to speak as long and as often as they like on every question. I confess I think that if the right hon. Gentleman will only examine into the principles which underlie the speech he has just made to the House, he will see that they are absolutely subversive of the conduct of the whole of the Public Business of the House; and on that ground, if on no other, I object to the Amendment he supports.

Mr. W. H. Smith

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I think the right hon. Gentleman is rather ungrateful to me when he says that the Members of the Opposition always deem Members of the Government unworthy of their salaries, because the right hon. Gentleman will remember that last night I vindicated the right of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to his salary. The right hon. Gentleman has attempted once more to vindicate the position taken up by the Government last year. I am not again going to read to the House the answers made to me last year by the First Lord of the Treasury and by the right hon. Gentleman himself; but when the right hon. Gentleman says that last year the Government had recognized it in their own minds as an obligation of honour to remunerate the Parliamentary Under Secretary, I cannot help recalling a speech made outside this House by the Under Secretary himself. On a certain day in April the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman) made a speech to his constituents at Margate, in which "he thanked God he was not like Irish Members, who took their payments from the maidservants of New York." "Here am I," he said, "serving and going to serve my country for nothing." [Mr. T. M. HEALY: For 15 hours a day.] I do not want to lay stress upon that, because the right hon. and gallant Gentleman is not here to defend himself; but the Chief Secretary must know that that statement was made. Therefore, my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian was perfectly justified in saying that the country and the House last year understood, not only from Gentlemen on the Front Bench opposite, but from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet himself, that the Office was to be a gratuitous one. We were charged—and I never heard a more unjust charge made—by the First Lord of the Treasury last night with unnecessarily wasting the time of the House. As a matter of fact, I said to my right hon. Friend the Member for Grimsby—"Surely this has gone on long enough; why do not you get up and urge them not to go on any longer?" He was on the point of doing so when the First Lord of the Treasury got up and stopped the debate; and for a reason of his own which I did not then know—and now I know it I do not quite sympathize with it—my right hon. Friend did not press for a Division. It was notorious that if we had taken a Division before 10 o'clock we should have put the Government into a minority on this Bill, and I now wish that we had done it. We have heard a great deal as to the right of the majority, and I can understand if the majority had been 100 or 120 all that high language might have been used; but when a minority which comes within eight or nine of the majority prolongs a discussion, it is monstrous that that should be called "factious opposition." The right hon. Gentleman said that the discussion last night turned on points which had been argued repeatedly. I submit to him that several new points were made—as he himself will admit, if, as I hope, he has some candour still left—none of which could be said to have been over-argued or over-laboured. I can only tell the right hon. Gentleman that, as far as I am concerned, it is my full intention to argue out all the points the three clauses of the Bill contain, and I hope that before we come to the end of the Bill we shall find it possible to drive the Government a little closer than we drove them last night.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston) said, he hoped the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) would press his Amendment to a Division, and that it would be made clear to the country what they were dividing about. They asked, on the Motion of the hon. Member for West Nottingham, to consider a question of the utmost importance to the masses of the people both in towns and in the country; a question which to create a considerable drain upon the Army in this country, and to expose the battalions serving at home to an amount of exhaustion, so to speak, in order to maintain the strength of the battalions serving abroad of which few people have any conception. We think that the system has now been in operation long enough to justify a careful examination of its results, and we shall take care that that examination is complete and thorough. The Prime Minister himself is giving attention to the question, with the view of ascertaining whether the system is one which ought to be maintained. Sir, I am no optimist. On the contrary, I am willing to admit that there are many deficiencies to be supplied, many evils to be grappled with, many improvements to be effected. But the recognition of invention and improvement brings upon us some of the charges now made. A fast ship with a powerful battery discredits the slower and the weaker vessels; a new gun of great range and penetration, a new rifle, or a new explosive by the side of the weapons previously relied upon, condemns them as obsolete, although they have done good service to the country. It is our duty to avail ourselves of the ingenuity, the scientific skill, and the mechanical power of the country to obtain the best arms that can be put into the hands of our soldiers and sailors; but there are enormous difficulties in manufacture, failures and delays in new material, new designs, and immensely developed powers. It is impossible to improvise at once complete supplies for Services like ours of the best and the latest patterns. I do not say that to excuse inefficiency, to excuse indifference, to excuse procrastination. It is our duty to consider what the necessities of the country are, to examine them with care upon our responsibility, and to see that, to the best of our ability, those necessities are met as they from time to time arise. But hon. Gentlemen should remember that we are sometimes apt to insist upon absolute perfection, and we are inclined to wait until we get absolute perfection. We have waited seven years, for instance, for a rifle, because we had not got that which was the very best. We have to use the material at our hands from day to day; we have to take the men who are at our disposal; we have to take the ships which we can find; we have to adopt the guns which are at hand; we have to put the best weapon we can into the hands of our soldiers and sailors; and we believe that, in doing so, we shall best protect the interests of the country at large, and do our duty to the people who have sent us here. We have shown our readiness to effect any economy which knowledge and experience can suggest. We welcome inquiry and criticism. We do not seek to conceal shortcomings or mistakes for which either we ourselves or the system may be responsible. We do not shelter ourselves by aid of a storm of Party recrimination; but, adhering loyally to the principles of Parliamentary government which we are bound to maintain, we still hold to our view that the Government, and the Government alone, must be responsible for the measures to be recommended to Parliament and for the cost involved. If we fail to secure for ourselves the best advice, the most competent guidance, and to form a judgment upon the facts—to give shape and direction to a policy suited to the necessities of the country; or if, in the judgment of the House of Commons, we are deemed to be incapable of doing so, it becomes at once the duty of Parliament to replace the men in whom it has no confidence for the discharge of the most important function of any Government—the provision for the safety of the country. I beg to move the 1st Resolution which stands in my name.

Mr. W. H. Smith

THE CHAIRMAN: Before a discussion begins, I may point out that though the right hon. Gentleman has naturally dealt with several questions, there are nine separate Resolutions to be proposed. The first four deal exclusively with the arrangement with the Australian Colonies. The general discussion, therefore, would more properly and consistently with Parliamentary usage take place on the 5th Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is expedient to ratify an Agreement for Naval Defence made between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of Her Majesty's Australasian Colonies."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, there were one or two points which certainly required a little further explanation. As far as he could gather from the speech—the very clear speech—of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, we were practically to give £4,440,000 towards certain ships. [Cries of "No!"] Yes; he thought so.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that the entire expenditure for ships, including armaments, was £850,000, and the entire expenditure in respect of the military ports at home and abroad, coal-ing stations, and mercantile ports was £3,500,000, of which £2,600,000 only was to be raised on loan.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked, if he was to understand that only £850,000 was to be given to Australia?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that £850,000 was the total to be spent on the Australian Squadron. The ships would be ours at the end of the 10 years.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked, what good would the ships be when they were turned over to us? The whole thing amounted to this—that certain ships were to be built by us and used by Australia. We were to contribute £850,000 towards the ships. In order to be quite correct, he would like to ask what we were to expend upon the ships per annum—was the Australian Government to pay a farthing?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing) said, that the whole arrangement was contained in the Report of the proceedings of the Colonial Conference which was laid before Parliament last year, and which had been discussed over and over again.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that he imagined he was right in supposing that £35,000 was to be spent by us upon these ships annually?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the hon. Gentleman had quite misunderstood the arrangement. The Colonies were to pay £35,000 per annum as interest on the capital expended on the ships, and they were to pay the whole of the cost, including superannuation, of the officers and crews, and the estimated cost of the maintenance of the ships during the 10 years, which amounted to £91,000 per annum.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that in that case we were to give a grant-in-aid of these ships to the Australian Colonies of £850,000, and the ships were to be used exclusively for the defence of Australian ports and shores. He objected to that entirely, and he objected to it so strongly that, so far from letting the thing go by default, of which there seemed a great likelihood before he rose, he should take a Division if he could find any Member to tell with him. They had heard lately a very great deal about Imperial Federation. He was no very great believer in the schemes and proposals to federate the Empire. He thought that the relations which existed at present between the Colonies and ourselves were a far better tie than any which could be devised. He had always known that when Imperial Federation was translated into deeds it would mean that we should be called upon to spend money for the Colonies. What was this? Surely, it was nothing but a call upon us to spend money for the Australian Colonies. [Admiral FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): No.] The hon. and gallant Gentleman said "No;" but it was. It must be remembered that we, at the present moment, had our Fleet spread out all over the globe. We had to defend all our commerce upon the seas; we had to defend all our fortresses; we had, as they saw from these Resolutions, to vote money for coal-ing stations; and all this not only for our own benefit, but also for the benefit of the commerce of our Colonies. At present, it was thought by the Australian Colonies desirable to have a Fleet which was not to cruise on the high seas, but which was to be there to defend their ports and shores. He said that, far from our paying for that Fleet, the Australians ought to pay for it. If the Australians wanted to come into Imperial Federation, it seemed to him it would be only reasonable that they should commence by making a contribution to those Imperial charges from which they benefited—the charges for the Diplomatic Services, and the like. Who paid those charges? We in the United Kingdom paid them, though the Colonists benefited from them equally with us. Who paid for the Army? We paid for it? Some time ago, when we sent some troops to Suakin, we were told that the expedition would benefit India. India paid something towards the cost of the expedition. We were also told that the Colonies would be benefited by the expedition; but the Colonies contributed absolutely nothing towards the expenses. It was true the Australians did send a number of men to Suakin; but they misconducted themselves. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen cried "Oh, oh!" but he challenged the Government to produce any report as to what the men did in Malta. [An hon. MEMBER: They did not go to Malta.] They put in at Malta. [Cries of "No!"] He begged hon. Members' pardon; they did. The Canadian Contingent—the Voyageurs—did. At any rate, he did not think any single military man who was in the expedition—he said nothing about despatches, because some of the despatches were written with the object of patting the Colonists on the back—would say that the expedition to Suakin was in any sort of way benefited by the presence of the Australians, or that the operations on the Nile were benefited by the presence of the Canadian Voyageurs. Therefore, he maintained that although the Colonies benefited in every way by the vast expenditure, not only military, but civil, which we incurred, they did not pay their share. At the present moment the Australians wished to have a Home Squadron, and they asked us to pay a portion of the cost of it. We might be considered to be the parent of the Colonies. The Colonies were thriving children; we were getting old; we had very large debts to pay; we had to pay the interest on loans incurred during wars which were of benefit to the Colonies. Surely, if we were to keep up the large establishment we now kept up, if we were to expend and extend our establishment as was suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, we ought, instead of being called on to make any contribution to the home defences of Australia, to receive some contribution from the Australian Colonies. It was said we should derive some benefit from this arrangement, because the ships were to be called ours. But they were to become ours when they were perfectly useless. Instead of indulging in generous, recklessly generous, ideas, because the thing was labelled "Imperial Federation," which was only a phrase, and worth nothing at all, the House ought to refuse to sanction this arrangement. The House should at once say—"What we believe is, that the Colonies ought to contribute to the general expenditure of the Empire, and the Colonies themselves should pay for the expenditure which is necessary for each of them." He should take a Division upon this Resolution.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, he wished, in a few sentences, to make it quite clear what the arrangement was. Perhaps he had better say what the arrangement was in the first instance. The ships were originally to cost £700,000. On that cost the Australians agreed to pay 5 per cent for 10 years, at the end of which time the ships would not belong to Australia but remain ours. That did not strike him as a particularly bad bargain for this country. There was no gift of any kind. We were to advance the money, the Colonies were to pay the interest upon the money, and at the end of 10 years the ships were to revert to us. The increase in the cost of the ships from £700,000 to £850,000 reduced the contribution of £35,000 a-year to about 4 per cent instead of 5 per cent. That was the position in which the matter stood at present. The ships were not to be for the defence of the inland ports of Australia, if one might use such a phrase, but for the defence of the general commerce of Australia; and as the commerce of Australia was mostly carried on in English bottoms, no one would deny that English commerce had as great an interest in this matter as Colonial commerce. He was bound to say that the Colonies had shown every disposition to make an equitable bargain with us, and one which would not be heavy on the Mother Country. The arrangement which had been arrived at seemed to him to be fairly equitable between the Colonies and ourselves. He did not wish to enter upon the question as to whether the Colonies ought to pay the entire cost of their own defence. What he wanted to make clear was that this was not a gift. At the end of 10 years the ships would, of course, not be as valuable as they were now; but if at the end of 10 years, when old ships, they reverted to us, we should have been paid at the rate of 4 per cent for the use of the capital expended upon them.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.) said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had done them a good service in making somewhat more plain the arrangement between the Imperial Government and the Colonies; because as long as a ship to construct, and is almost as expensive as some ships, the construction of which may be undertaken by Naval Authorities. It is a matter of the highest vital importance that the whole cost of any enterprize in which the country may be embarked should be stated, and should be faced by Parliament as a liability to be met within the period which the completion of the work will occupy. The Government have decided to make these proposals to the House upon information obtained by Royal Commissions and Committees which have sat during the last six or seven years, at the instance first of one Government and then of another, and also upon information existing at the Admiralty and the War Office. We came to the conclusion last year that it was our duty to apply that information for the purpose of providing for the defences of the country. These proposals are the results of the inquiries we have made. With regard, first of all, to the Navy, the Resolution provides that there shall be an addition to the Australian Squadron, the cost of which is to be £850,000. The agreement was arrived at in the course of last year during the progress of the Conference which was held in London, and at which the Australian Colonies were represented. The proposals agreed to at the Conference in 1887 may be thus summarized. There is a provision for an additional force of sea-going ships of war for the protection of the floating trade in the Australian waters at the joint cost of the Imperial and Colonial funds, such additional force to be manned by officers and men of the Royal Navy, and to be under the sole control and orders of the Admiral commanding Her Majesty's ships and vessels on the Australian Station. The vessels are to be employed on the station in the same way as the other ships of the Squadron, and not to be removed beyond the limits of the station without the consent of the Colonial Governments. No reduction is to be made in the normal strength of the force maintained on the Australian Station in consequence of such additional force. The vessels are to consist of five fast cruisers of the improved Archer class, and torpedo gunboats of the Rattlesnake class, of which three cruisers and one gunboat are to be kept constantly in commission, the Imperial Government to bear the first cost of constructing and equipping these vessels. The Colonies are to pay interest at 5 per cent per annum on the first cost of the vessels to an amount not exceeding £35,000 annually, and to bear the actual cost of maintaining four vessels in commission and three in reserve, including liability on account of retired pay, of pensions to officers and men, and charge for relief of crews to an amount not exceeding £91,000 per annum. The Imperial Government are to bear the cost of commissioning and maintaining the three vessels in reserve in time of emergency or actual war. Any of these vessels that may be lost are to be replaced at the cost of the Imperial Government. The agreement, in the first instance, is to be enforced for a period of 10 years from the date of commissioning the first of these vessels, terminable then, or subsequently, only on notice being given two years previously. On the termination of the Agreement the vessels are to remain the property of the Imperial Government, and nothing in the agreement is to affect the purely local Naval Defence Forces, which are to be paid for by, and are solely under the control of, the several Colonies. It may be within the knowledge of hon. Members that some of the Colonies have small Naval Forces of their own, which have long been recognized as being exceedingly useful for police purposes on their coasts. The total cost, as estimated, is as follows:—Hulls and engines of the five improved Archers, £605,000; armament and stores, £125,000; total, £730,000; hulls and engines of two Rattlesnakes, £95,000; armament and stores, £25,000; total, £120,000, or, altogether for the hulls, engines, armaments, and stores of the vessels, £850,000. Provided that the armaments are ready at the same time as the ships, the five Archers could, it is estimated, be completed in 18 months, and the two Rattlesnakes in 15 months. There is, therefore, every hope that these vessels will be efficient for the purposes of the Service by the end of next year, or of the March following that—that is, by December, 1889, or March, 31, 1890. A pledge was given by the Admiralty that, so soon as the negotiations for the increase of the Australian Squadron at the joint charge of the Imperial and Colonial Governments had ship between the Colonies and the Mother Country; and, so far from taking the view which the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) entertained that this arrangement was unjust to the English taxpayer, he believed it might operate in precisely the opposite direction. The Colonial Representatives showed no narrow or prejudiced spirit. They were not influenced by local considerations; indeed, the last words a leading Delegate said to him before leaving this country were—

"I am glad the Imperial Government have met us in a frank and liberal spirit. We, in Australia, are now only 4,000,000; but in 30 or 40 years we may be 40,000,000 or 50,000,000, and then, when our riches and our power have increased, we shall be able to treat the Mother Country in as generous and liberal a spirit as it now treats us."

He (Lord George Hamilton) trusted, when a question of such Imperial importance came before the Imperial Parliament, that Parliament would not be found wanting. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had called attention to the increase in the cost of the ships, and that was a point on which he (Lord George Hamilton) desired to say a few words, because it brought home at once to anybody who was in any way interested in naval affairs the danger of attempting to embark upon a wholesale expenditure upon ships. The march of mechanical science was now extraordinarily rapid. One of the arrangements they made at the Colonial Conference was that whatever type of ship was adopted it should, so far as its displacement was concerned, be equal in power and speed to anything afloat. The Colonists said that, being a new and go-a-head people, they would only be satisfied with the most modern type of war ship. The ship the Admiralty proposed was an improved type of the Archer class, which, at that time, fulfilled these conditions; but, owing to a delay on the part of one of the Colonies in assenting to the proposal, they were unable to put out last year the tenders for the building of the ships. In the meantime, certain foreign nations designed and commenced ships more powerful than the vessels of the Archer class; and the Admiralty were therefore obliged, in order to fulfil their bargain, to substitute, for the vessels originally decided upon, ships of the size mentioned by his right hon. Friend. It, therefore, came to this—that although they had lost five months in point of time, they had gained considerably by an increase in the power, speed, and generally efficiency of the ships. If the vessels had been laid down last year they would have been inferior to the vessels subsequently laid down. That, he thought, brought home very clearly the unwisdom of prematurely rushing into shipbuilding. They might be confident that, as soon as a vessel was laid down, one superior in speed and probably in power would be commenced. He thought he had answered all the questions put to him; and he hoped the Committee, considering the manner in which these proposals were treated by the Colonial Legislature, would endeavour to act in a reciprocal spirit, and not go to a Division.

Lord George Hamilton

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD (Marrylebone, E.) said, he desired to reserve what he had to say upon the Resolutions until a later period, and what he rose for now was to repudiate what the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) said about the Australians who came to help us at Suakin. He went up the Nile, and he went to Suakin afterwards, and he might say, on behalf of every soldier and sailor serving in that expedition, that they were very grateful to the Australians for the help they rendered. Their discipline in camp was splendid, they were excellent soldiers, and they could not have done better than they did. As to the Canadian Voyageurs, he very much doubted whether our men could have got as far as they did if they had not had the Voyageurs with them. The experience on the Nile was something totally new to our officers and men; but the Voyageurs took charge of the boats; it was an old game of theirs. They understood the rapids and rocks, and they were, in truth, found most useful. He was fully persuaded he only expressed the opinion of every man in the expedition, when he said they were most grateful to the Canadians for what they did on the Nile. As to the Australians, he did not think they went to Malta. The hon. Gentleman was totally misinformed upon that point. The Canadians did go to Malta; but he had never heard anything but a good account of them in whatever they undertook.

of view of right hon. Gentlemen who have been responsible during the time being for the necessities of the country, is not a question to which I now desire to ask the attention of the Committee. What we now desire the House to say is that existing deficiencies, from whatever cause they may have arisen, must, as far as possible, be made good in the interests of the country at large, and of the safety of the Empire. I have stated that Commissions have sat and reported on the unprotected condition of our coal- ing stations and ports. It was the duty of the Government to bring together all the information they could obtain, and it was obtained after careful examination by a Committee which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War invited to consider the Reports and recommendations of previous Commissions and take evidence. That Committee included the hon. and gallant Member—well known in this House as a great authority on all matters of fortification—I refer to the hon. and gallant Member for Birkenhead (Sir Edward Hamley), and upon the Committee which rendered these good services to the country were Sir Frederick Bramwell, Admiral Sir William M. Dowell, the hon. Baronet the Member for North-West Manchester (Sir William Houldsworth), the hon. Member for the Penrith Division of Cumberland (Mr. J. W. Lowther), Mr. G. W. Lowther, the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), and the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. E. R. Wodehouse). These Gentlemen were requested to consider the plan proposed for the fortification and armament of our military and home mercantile ports, and the relative importance and approximate cost of the works and armaments necessary for the adequate defence of these stations. I should greatly regret to weary the House with long quotations; but the importance of the subject will, I hope, be my excuse for quoting some of the statements from this most valuable and interesting Report for which the Government and the country are so greatly indebted to those distinguished and hon. Gentlemen who have devoted their time and attention to the matter. The Committee, in their Report, state—

“In order to form an opinion as to the relative importance of the defence of the ports under consideration, and of the particular works proposed at each of them, the Committee have examined many of our most eminent Naval and

Military Authorities, including His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, General Viscount Wolseley, Admiral Sir G. Phipps Hornby, General Sir J. Lintorn Simmons, Lieutenant General Sir Andrew Clarke, the Inspector General of Fortifications, the Director of Artillery and Stores, the Director of the Intelligence Division of the War Office, the Directors of Naval Ordnance and Intelligence, the Inspector of Submarine Mining Defences, the Assistant Director of Torpedoes, and others. These witnesses have been unanimous in pointing out the weakness of our present position, and in urging the imperative necessity of strengthening and adding to the existing defences, though with some natural divergence of opinion on minor questions. The Estimates before the Committee appeared to represent the full amount which, in the judgment of experts, are required to put all these ports into a state of security against all probable contingencies. In the case of the principal military ports, the scheme is framed on the assumption that the command of the Channel has been temporarily lost to us by the fact that the Channel Squadron is absent or disabled, and that these ports and dockyards might have suddenly to rely exclusively on their own resources for defence against attacks by a powerful squadron of armour-clad. On the other hand, the plans for the defence of the mercantile ports do not generally contemplate anything more serious than an attack by one or two armoured cruisers, accompanied by torpedo boats and other small craft.”

I have quoted this in order to show hon. Members that the matter has been gone into exhaustively, with a full sense of the danger to which the country is exposed, or would be exposed in the event of the temporary absence or dispersion of the Channel Squadron. In their opinion these recommendations appear to meet the requirements which, in the judgment of experts, it is necessary to meet. Well, Sir, they go on to say—

“After inquiring carefully into the condition of each of these forts, the Committee have no hesitation in stating their conviction that deficiencies exist in the defences of each of them which render our position dangerously insecure. It must not, indeed, be supposed from this statement that the money spent upon fortifications since 1860 has been injudiciously applied. They gave us adequate protection for many years; but now the enormously increased range and penetration of modern guns, and the great strength of iron-clads (what at the time of the erection of the fortifications could not have been foreseen), render partial, and in some cases very extensive, reconstruction essential, and necessitate an armament equal to modern requirements.”

It appears to me that in these few words the Committee state, what all who have any knowledge of the changes which have been going on during the last 10 years will admit, that these changes make it imperative upon us to take measures for the increase of the defence of our coasts, and also for increasing the strength of our Navy. These changes involve alterations in the power of guns and in the strength of iron-clads which could not have been foreseen, because these guns did not exist seven, eight, nine, or ten years ago. It was only in 1879 that I signed, on behalf of the Navy, the drawings of the first breech-loading gun for mounting on our ships, and that gun certainly was not made for two or three years after those drawings were signed. Small breech-loading guns had been in use for many years before; but hon. Gentlemen who are acquainted with the affairs of the Navy are aware that these breech-loading guns were withdrawn from the Service, owing to the strong objections entertained for some years previously to the date I have named, and it was only when we came to realize the absolute necessity of being able to meet the increasing strength of foreign guns and ships that we felt we must have breech-loading guns instead of muzzle-loading guns. It is not that a breech-loading gun in itself is a better gun than a muzzle-loading gun; but the objection is that you cannot handle them long—you cannot load and fire them as you can a breech-loading gun. The Committee go on to say that the next matters in importance to the Channel and Home defences are the defences of Gibraltar and Malta; and I am sure that any Gentleman capable of forming a judgment and of taking a survey of the responsibilities of the country, and of the dangers we should run if Gibraltar and Malta were not preserved as strong places for the security of the Empire, will readily agree with the Committee as to the absolute necessity of keeping these two fortresses in a proper condition of defence. Gibraltar and Malta, in common with our military ports at home, have suffered from the enormous increase in the power of large guns; and it is, therefore, necessary to give them guns and works which will enable them to resist any attack which may be made upon them. I would remind the Committee that the amount required, in the opinion of experts, to put these ports in a state of security in all contingencies is not less than £1,500,000. For that expenditure we shall be able to put the military ports in the Channel, Malta,

Mr. W. H. Smith

and Gibraltar in a condition of security. [Sir GEORGE BALFOUR (Kincardine): How about powder?] Powder and projectiles are not provided for in this loan. The principle upon which we have proceeded is this—and I think the Committee will agree that it is a sound principle. We have provided for permanent works, and for that which is next in endurance to permanent works, heavy guns, by this loan. We thought we would not be justified in providing powder and projectiles, matters which come under revision in the ordinary way in Annual Estimates. [Sir GEORGE BALFOUR dissented.] Whether my hon. and gallant Friend agrees with me or not, I am afraid I cannot retract from the position I take up—namely, that we should not have been justified in asking for money on loan which was to be spent from day to day and week to week, and which would disappear altogether by the use of powder and projectiles. That is a matter for the Estimates. Well, Sir, I will not occupy the House long on the question of mercantile ports. I have stated the principle upon which we have proceeded with regard to them. They will be made reasonably secure against attacks from gunboats or torpedo boats; but it is obvious that to fortify our mercantile ports, or make them strong places in the ordinary sense of the word, would be a mistake of the gravest character, for it would draw upon them the fire of the enemy, and the results might be serious, even if the attack were beaten off. There is one point in this Report to which I wish to draw special attention, and that is the remark of the Committee as to the necessity of providing for garrisons. They say—

“The Committee have received from the head of the Intelligence Division of the War Office evidence as to the necessity of providing for the requisite garrisons, and for their maintenance in an effective state. Moreover, every battery of modern guns has its peculiar features, which, if it is to be worked effectively, ought to be thoroughly studied beforehand by the actual troops (whether of the Regular or Auxiliary Forces) likely to have charge of it in war time. Many circumstances combine to make it very difficult for our garrisons to have sufficient experience of the guns they will have to serve. This is a point which, in the opinion of the Committee, requires very careful attention, and they would recommend that every arm of the Service which is told off for the defence of a particular port should, wherever reasonably practicable, have an opportunity of being exercised upon the ground which it may have to defend, and with the guns which it may have to use."

Well, I think any reasonable man will fully recognize the importance and value of these recommendations, and I am happy to be able to say that steps have been taken to provide garrisons, to provide arrangements under which the men, whether they belong to the Regular or Auxiliary Forces, who will be told off to work the guns and man the fortifications will be practised on the guns, and will be employed for this purpose. An increase in the Garrison Artillery has been made for the purpose, and I think an increase has been sanctioned in the Fortress Engineers also.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The whole increase asked for is not yet made.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Anyhow, before the fortresses are ready an increase will be provided. The Volunteer Artillery and Sub-Marine Miners will be increased according to the necessity of each part of the coast. We provide the necessary money for the permanent works at home and abroad which are required. We provide money for heavy guns; but all the naval, all the light guns, all the small arms, and all the ammunition are provided for in the Estimates, and we consider that it is necessary to adhere to that arrangement, so that no guns for the Navy will be provided for out of the loan. The expenditure which will be involved in this scheme altogether is £2,600,000, and the cost of the small arms, ammunition, and light guns which falls on the Estimates will be £900,000, making £3,500,000 which we propose for the Services we have undertaken. We have reason to believe that the guns will be complete in the time mentioned—three years. [Cries of "Oh!"] Three years may appear to be a very long time; but I am sorry to say our experience during the last four or five years has been that heavy guns are never completed within the time named in the first instance, either by the contractors or the Gun Factory. I make no complaint of the individuals who are themselves responsible in some measure for this delay, because when we come to examine the facts of the case it turns out that the delays arise in many cases from circumstances beyond their control. A gun may fail under the severe tests which are applied, and then the heavy forging has to be done over again and the gun is delayed. It is only fair, right, and just to the men who are doing their best to fulfil their engagements with the country that these facts should be stated. But, on the other hand, it is the duty of the Government to look these facts in the face, to look a long way ahead, and to avail themselves of the dearly-bought experience they have obtained from, I will not say the errors of the past, but from the facts of the past, and see that any work upon which they may enter shall be so carefully thought out beforehand, that when ships and fortifications are ready for guns, the guns shall be ready for them. I do not despair of even accelerating the delivery of these guns. I will only mention one fact to justify the statements I have made as to the period required for the delivery of the guns. I was myself responsible for an order given to a great firm in September, 1885, and I am sorry to say that but a very small portion of that order has as yet been executed. It was an order for £150,000 worth of guns. I believe the manufacturers have exercised due diligence in the endeavour to complete the order; but they have not yet completed it, and the result is that some of our ships are waiting for guns which we had every reason to believe would have been put in the ships by this time. I say this without, in the slightest degree, imputing blame to my Predecessors. They, no doubt, believed that when they ordered guns two or three years would be a reasonable time within which to expect delivery of them; but that has not proved to be the case, and disappointments and delays have resulted. Neither the Royal Gun Factories nor the private manufacturers have been able to complete guns within the contract time, and we are without them at the present time. But as soon as we knew that these delays were occurring the Government took every step in their power to see that due diligence was exercised in completing the guns now in arrear. We have put such pressure as we are able to put upon the manufacturers themselves; we have requested a competent engineer to visit the works, and see whether he can suggest any definite measures to secure earlier delivery of the guns; and, taking warning from the past, we have ourselves provided against the repetition of a delay which is not only exceedingly disappointing, but which may be very dangerous to the public interest. A remark has been made in the course of the discussions upon this question as to the new rifle. Now, I wish to tell the Committee frankly what has occurred in this matter. If anything is kept back, it may be said we have some motive in keeping it back. Like other countries, we have been for a long time desirous of having a new rifle, the best rifle obtainable. For six years, I think, the subject has been studied by the Military Authorities. A Committee of experts, under pressure from myself I am afraid, reported two years ago in favour of a particular rifle; but no sooner had the Report been adopted and some rifles had been manufactured than it became clear to the Military Authorities that a better rifle was in prospect. Therefore, the manufacture was stopped, new experiments were undertaken, and the Committee was re-assembled; and now at last, after the lapse of another two years, we have a pattern which is approved by the Military Authorities, and is about to be tried in all climates and under all circumstances before it is finally adopted. But our experience is precisely the experience of other countries. It is said that France has got a start in the manufacture of a rifle; but we are not quite certain that that is the case, and certainly Germany has not yet started the manufacture of a new small-bore Magazine rifle, which is the arm that to our Military Authorities seems to be most necessary. I mention these circumstances in order to show that, however great may be the faults of our civilian administration of the War Department—and I am far from saying they have not faults—here is a particular question which has been entirely in the hands of experts during the last six years. [An hon. MEMBER: Seven years.] A right hon. Gentleman opposite says longer—that it is seven years. These experts have had every assistance, and all available resources which successive Governments possessed placed at their disposal; but so great are the difficulties, so many are the considerations involved in the choice of weapons, that it is only now that the Military Authorities have succeeded in deciding for themselves that they believe they have at last got the best weapon. One of the complaints made against the Government is, that we are slow in adopting improvements, and that so soon as we have adopted an improvement we do not immediately replace all the material of war that we possess by the improved article. In the first place, we must have some trial of a new article before we can know whether it is an improved weapon; and, in the next place, we must consider what expenditure is required to replace the rifle in the hands of 650,000 men who are mentioned as the strength of our Army, including Volunteers, but omitting the forces in India. It is complained that we have not organized the Departments and welded them into one vast machine. No efforts have been spared during the last three years—and I doubt not in years preceding, but certainly not on the part of Her Majesty's present Government—to avail themselves of the intelligence at their command at the War Office in the endeavour to improve the organization of the Army, to render it capable of undertaking any duties it may be called upon to discharge—in point of fact, to make it what it ought to be, ready to go anywhere, and to discharge any duty the country can reasonably call upon it to discharge. We have had great assistance from our Military Advisers and from experts specially called in. I should delay the Committee too much if I were to attempt to describe the work which has been done. Most valuable work has been done in the Departments of the Adjutant General and the Quartermaster General and by the head of the Intelligence Department, and they have combined in framing a scheme which has received the approval of the Secretary for War, and which has gone very far indeed to make the Army mobile and an easily-used machine for the purpose for which it is intended. I do not say this for the purpose of eliciting expressions of praise or of confidence. I know it is only natural that members of the Military and Naval Professions should have a certain want of confidence in civilians in the administration of great Services like the Army and Navy; but it is only fair that I should state that both at the Admiralty and at the War Department the professional officers who have been

of view of right hon. Gentlemen who have been responsible during the time being for the necessities of the country, is not a question to which I now desire to ask the attention of the Committee. What we now desire the House to say is that existing deficiencies, from whatever cause they may have arisen, must, as far as possible, be made good in the interests of the country at large, and of the safety of the Empire. I have stated that Commissions have sat and reported on the unprotected condition of our coal-ing stations and ports. It was the duty of the Government to bring together all the information they could obtain, and it was obtained after careful examination by a Committee which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War invited to consider the Reports and recommendations of previous Commissions and take evidence. That Committee included the hon. and gallant Member—well known in this House as a great authority on all matters of fortification—I refer to the hon. and gallant Member for Birkenhead (Sir Edward Hamley), and upon the Committee which rendered these good services to the country were Sir Frederick Bramwell, Admiral Sir William M. Dowell, the hon. Baronet the Member for North-West Manchester (Sir William Houldsworth), the hon. Member for the Penrith Division of Cumberland (Mr. J. W. Lowther), Mr. G. W. Lowther, the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), and the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. E. R. Wodehouse). These Gentlemen were requested to consider the plan proposed for the fortification and armament of our military and home mercantile ports, and the relative importance and approximate cost of the works and armaments necessary for the adequate defence of these stations. I should greatly regret to weary the House with long quotations; but the importance of the subject will, I hope, be my excuse for quoting some of the statements from this most valuable and interesting Report for which the Government and the country are so greatly indebted to those distinguished and hon. Gentlemen who have devoted their time and attention to the matter. The Committee, in their Report, state—

“In order to form an opinion as to the relative importance of the defence of the ports under consideration, and of the particular works proposed at each of them, the Committee have examined many of our most eminent Naval and

Military Authorities, including His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, General Viscount Wolseley, Admiral Sir G. Phipps Hornby, General Sir J. Lintorn Simmons, Lieutenant General Sir Andrew Clarke, the Inspector General of Fortifications, the Director of Artillery and Stores, the Director of the Intelligence Division of the War Office, the Directors of Naval Ordnance and Intelligence, the Inspector of Submarine Mining Defences, the Assistant Director of Torpedoes, and others. These witnesses have been unanimous in pointing out the weakness of our present position, and in urging the imperative necessity of strengthening and adding to the existing defences, though with some natural divergence of opinion on minor questions. The Estimates before the Committee appeared to represent the full amount which, in the judgment of experts, are required to put all these ports into a state of security against all probable contingencies. In the case of the principal military ports, the scheme is framed on the assumption that the command of the Channel has been temporarily lost to us by the fact that the Channel Squadron is absent or disabled, and that these ports and dockyards might have suddenly to rely exclusively on their own resources for defence against attacks by a powerful squadron of armour-clads. On the other hand, the plans for the defence of the mercantile ports do not generally contemplate anything more serious than an attack by one or two armoured cruisers, accompanied by torpedo boats and other small crafts.”

I have quoted this in order to show hon. Members that the matter has been gone into exhaustively, with a full sense of the danger to which the country is exposed, or would be exposed in the event of the temporary absence or dispersion of the Channel Squadron. In their opinion these recommendations appear to meet the requirements which, in the judgment of experts, it is necessary to meet. Well, Sir, they go on to say—

“After inquiring carefully into the condition of each of these forts, the Committee have no hesitation in stating their conviction that deficiencies exist in the defences of each of them which render our position dangerously insecure. It must not, indeed, be supposed from this statement that the money spent upon fortifications since 1860 has been injudiciously applied. They gave us adequate protection for many years; but now the enormously increased range and penetration of modern guns, and the great strength of iron-clads (what at the time of the erection of the fortifications could not have been foreseen), render partial, and in some cases very extensive, reconstruction essential, and necessitate an armament equal to modern requirements.”

It appears to me that in these few words the Committee state, what all who have any knowledge of the changes which have been going on during the last 10 years will admit, that these changes make it imperative upon us to

to create a considerable drain upon the Army in this country, and to expose the battalions serving at home to an amount of exhaustion, so to speak, in order to maintain the strength of the battalions serving abroad of which few people have any conception. We think that the system has now been in operation long enough to justify a careful examination of its results, and we shall take care that that examination is complete and thorough. The Prime Minister himself is giving attention to the question, with the view of ascertaining whether the system is one which ought to be maintained. Sir, I am no optimist. On the contrary, I am willing to admit that there are many deficiencies to be supplied, many evils to be grappled with, many improvements to be effected. But the recognition of invention and improvement brings upon us some of the charges now made. A fast ship with a powerful battery discredits the slower and the weaker vessels; a new gun of great range and penetration, a new rifle, or a new explosive by the side of the weapons previously relied upon, condemns them as obsolete, although they have done good service to the country. It is our duty to avail ourselves of the ingenuity, the scientific skill, and the mechanical power of the country to obtain the best arms that can be put into the hands of our soldiers and sailors; but there are enormous difficulties in manufacture, failures and delays in new material, new designs, and immensely developed powers. It is impossible to improvise at once complete supplies for Services like ours of the best and the latest patterns. I do not say that to excuse inefficiency, to excuse indifference, to excuse procrastination. It is our duty to consider what the necessities of the country are, to examine them with care upon our responsibility, and to see that, to the best of our ability, those necessities are met as they from time to time arise. But hon. Gentlemen should remember that we are sometimes apt to insist upon absolute perfection, and we are inclined to wait until we get absolute perfection. We have waited seven years, for instance, for a rifle, because we had not got that which was the very best. We have to use the material at our hands from day to day; we have to take the men who are at our disposal; we have to take the ships which we can find; we have to adopt the guns which are at hand; we have to put the best weapon we can into the hands of our soldiers and sailors; and we believe that, in doing so, we shall best protect the interests of the country at large, and do our duty to the people who have sent us here. We have shown our readiness to effect any economy which knowledge and experience can suggest. We welcome inquiry and criticism. We do not seek to conceal shortcomings or mistakes for which either we ourselves or the system may be responsible. We do not shelter ourselves by aid of a storm of Party recrimination; but, adhering loyally to the principles of Parliamentary government which we are bound to maintain, we still hold to our view that the Government, and the Government alone, must be responsible for the measures to be recommended to Parliament and for the cost involved. If we fail to secure for ourselves the best advice, the most competent guidance, and to form a judgment upon the facts—to give shape and direction to a policy suited to the necessities of the country; or if, in the judgment of the House of Commons, we are deemed to be incapable of doing so, it becomes at once the duty of Parliament to replace the men in whom it has no confidence for the discharge of the most important function of any Government—the provision for the safety of the country. I beg to move the 1st Resolution which stands in my name.

Mr. W. H. Smith

THE CHAIRMAN: Before a discussion begins, I may point out that though the right hon. Gentleman has naturally dealt with several questions, there are nine separate Resolutions to be proposed. The first four deal exclusively with the arrangement with the Australian Colonies. The general discussion, therefore, would more properly and consistently with Parliamentary usage take place on the 5th Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is expedient to ratify an Agreement for Naval Defence made between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of Her Majesty's Australasian Colonies."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, there were one or two points which certainly required a little further explanation. As far as he could gather from the speech—the very clear speech—of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, we were practically to give £4,440,000 towards certain ships. [Cries of "No!"] Yes; he thought so.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that the entire expenditure for ships, including armaments, was £850,000, and the entire expenditure in respect of the military ports at home and abroad, coal-ing stations, and mercantile ports was £3,500,000, of which £2,600,000 only was to be raised on loan.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked, if he was to understand that only £850,000 was to be given to Australia?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that £850,000 was the total to be spent on the Australian Squadron. The ships would be ours at the end of the 10 years.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked, what good would the ships be when they were turned over to us? The whole thing amounted to this—that certain ships were to be built by us and used by Australia. We were to contribute £850,000 towards the ships. In order to be quite correct, he would like to ask what we were to expend upon the ships per annum—was the Australian Government to pay a farthing?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing) said, that the whole arrangement was contained in the Report of the proceedings of the Colonial Conference which was laid before Parliament last year, and which had been discussed over and over again.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that he imagined he was right in supposing that £35,000 was to be spent by us upon these ships annually?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the hon. Gentleman had quite misunderstood the arrangement. The Colonies were to pay £35,000 per annum as interest on the capital expended on the ships, and they were to pay the whole of the cost, including superannuation, of the officers and crews, and the estimated cost of the maintenance of the ships during the 10 years, which amounted to £91,000 per annum.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that in that case we were to give a grant-in-aid of these ships to the Australian Colonies of £850,000, and the ships were to be used exclusively for the defence of Australian ports and shores. He objected to that entirely, and he objected to it so strongly that, so far from letting the thing go by default, of which there seemed a great likelihood before he rose, he should take a Division if he could find any Member to tell with him. They had heard lately a very great deal about Imperial Federation. He was no very great believer in the schemes and proposals to federate the Empire. He thought that the relations which existed at present between the Colonies and ourselves were a far better tie than any which could be devised. He had always known that when Imperial Federation was translated into deeds it would mean that we should be called upon to spend money for the Colonies. What was this? Surely, it was nothing but a call upon us to spend money for the Australian Colonies. [Admiral FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): No.] The hon. and gallant Gentleman said "No;" but it was. It must be remembered that we, at the present moment, had our Fleet spread out all over the globe. We had to defend all our commerce upon the seas; we had to defend all our fortresses; we had, as they saw from these Resolutions, to vote money for coal-ing stations; and all this not only for our own benefit, but also for the benefit of the commerce of our Colonies. At present, it was thought by the Australian Colonies desirable to have a Fleet which was not to cruise on the high seas, but which was to be there to defend their ports and shores. He said that, far from our paying for that Fleet, the Australians ought to pay for it. If the Australians wanted to come into Imperial Federation, it seemed to him it would be only reasonable that they should commence by making a contribution to those Imperial charges from which they benefited—the charges for the Diplomatic Services, and the like. Who paid those charges? We in the United Kingdom paid them, though the Colonists benefited from them equally with us. Who paid for the Army? We paid for it? Some time ago, when we sent some troops to Suakin, we were told that the expedition would benefit India. India paid something towards the cost of the expedition. We were also told that the Colonies would be benefited by the expedition; but the Colonies contributed absolutely nothing towards the expenses. It was true the Australians did send a number of men to Suakin; but they misconducted themselves. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen cried "Oh, oh!" but he challenged the Government to produce any report as to what the men did in Malta. [An hon. MEMBER: They did not go to Malta.] They put in at Malta. [Cries of "No!"] He begged hon. Members' pardon; they did. The Canadian Contingent—the Voyageurs—did. At any rate, he did not think any single military man who was in the expedition—he said nothing about despatches, because some of the despatches were written with the object of patting the Colonists on the back—would say that the expedition to Suakin was in any sort of way benefited by the presence of the Australians, or that the operations on the Nile were benefited by the presence of the Canadian Voyageurs. Therefore, he maintained that although the Colonies benefited in every way by the vast expenditure, not only military, but civil, which we incurred, they did not pay their share. At the present moment the Australians wished to have a Home Squadron, and they asked us to pay a portion of the cost of it. We might be considered to be the parent of the Colonies. The Colonies were thriving children; we were getting old; we had very large debts to pay; we had to pay the interest on loans incurred during wars which were of benefit to the Colonies. Surely, if we were to keep up the large establishment we now kept up, if we were to expend and extend our establishment as was suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, we ought, instead of being called on to make any contribution to the home defences of Australia, to receive some contribution from the Australian Colonies. It was said we should derive some benefit from this arrangement, because the ships were to be called ours. But they were to become ours when they were perfectly useless. Instead of indulging in generous, recklessly generous, ideas, because the thing was labelled "Imperial Federation," which was only a phrase, and worth nothing at all, the House ought to refuse to sanction this arrangement. The House should at once say—"What we believe is, that the Colonies ought to contribute to the general expenditure of the Empire, and the Colonies themselves should pay for the expenditure which is necessary for each of them." He should take a Division upon this Resolution.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, he wished, in a few sentences, to make it quite clear what the arrangement was. Perhaps he had better say what the arrangement was in the first instance. The ships were originally to cost £700,000. On that cost the Australians agreed to pay 5 per cent for 10 years, at the end of which time the ships would not belong to Australia but remain ours. That did not strike him as a particularly bad bargain for this country. There was no gift of any kind. We were to advance the money, the Colonies were to pay the interest upon the money, and at the end of 10 years the ships were to revert to us. The increase in the cost of the ships from £700,000 to £850,000 reduced the contribution of £35,000 a-year to about 4 per cent instead of 5 per cent. That was the position in which the matter stood at present. The ships were not to be for the defence of the inland ports of Australia, if one might use such a phrase, but for the defence of the general commerce of Australia; and as the commerce of Australia was mostly carried on in English bottoms, no one would deny that English commerce had as great an interest in this matter as Colonial commerce. He was bound to say that the Colonies had shown every disposition to make an equitable bargain with us, and one which would not be heavy on the Mother Country. The arrangement which had been arrived at seemed to him to be fairly equitable between the Colonies and ourselves. He did not wish to enter upon the question as to whether the Colonies ought to pay the entire cost of their own defence. What he wanted to make clear was that this was not a gift. At the end of 10 years the ships would, of course, not be as valuable as they were now; but if at the end of 10 years, when old ships, they reverted to us, we should have been paid at the rate of 4 per cent for the use of the capital expended upon them.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.) said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had done them a good service in making somewhat more plain the arrangement between the Imperial Government and the Colonies; because although he had nothing but praise for the very lucid and ample statement of the First Lord of the Treasury, the right hon. Gentleman did not give to the Committee full particulars, especially as to the payment to be made by the Colonies. He had no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman trusted to knowledge on the part of Members of the Committee which all of them did not possess. The right hon. Gentleman ought to have remembered that the information was hidden away in a mass of Papers, and that it was difficult to glean it from the Report of the proceedings of the Colonial Conference last year. But there were one or two points he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) would still like a little more information upon. As he understood the First Lord of the Treasury, the development of the size and of other qualities of these ships, and the consequent development of their cost, was represented by an additional £150,000, the difference between £700,000 and £850,000, £700,000 having been the amount originally decided upon, and £850,000 being the amount dealt with in these Resolutions. The Colonies were to pay, as he understood, £35,000 a-year, and they were to pay the whole cost of the crews. But would not the addition of these ships to the Navy involve an addition to the number of men under training, and would the ships be manned from the British Navy? Would the Colonies pay, not only the direct cost of the maintenance of the crews on the station, but the indirect charges, which sometimes were very heavy in such cases, which would otherwise fall on the British taxpayer? It would be interesting to be informed on these points. Now, he was not disposed, like his hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere) to raise an objection to this arrangement; but he thought it right to remark that he believed it was absolutely the first time that the expenses of building ships had been met by a loan of public money. Hitherto such an expenditure as this had always been met and charged upon the current Estimates of the year. That was a new departure, and he hoped it would not be regarded as a precedent in the case of our own expenditure; that it would be considered as solely justified on the ground of the peculiar relations between ourselves and the Colonies, and of the bargain that had been made between the two. The sum was small to be got by way of loan, and the object was one which he believed had never been met in the way proposed. Loans had only been raised, as he had been taught to understand, for such great objects as fortifications, or some definite and tangible work. But, as he had said, he did not share the objection of his hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere). If the arrangement stood as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had explained, it did not seem to him to be a disadvantageous one for this country, as the commerce which was to be protected by those vessels was substantially British commerce rather than Australian. He certainly did not think it would be right to put any impediment in the way of an encouragement of a patriotic spirit on the part of the Colonies.

Lord GEORGE HAMILTON asked to be allowed to explain a little more in detail the arrangement which was negotiated with the Colonial Representatives. The financial part of the arrangement had been properly described by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Colonists undertook to pay on the cost of these vessels a sum not exceeding £35,000 a-year for 10 years—that was on the cost of construction. They further arranged that of the ships constructed, three of the larger, and one of the smaller, should be permanently in commission, and that the remainder should have a certain staff and crew, and be in such a condition as to be ready for commission at a moment's notice. The whole cost of the maintenance of the ships in commission, and of the ships out of commission—the whole cost, both direct and indirect, everything connected with their maintenance—was to be borne by the Colonies, provided it did not exceed the sum of £91,000 a-year. In other words, the Colonies undertook to pay practically an appropriation in aid of the Imperial Naval Estimates amounting to £91,000. [An hon. MEMBER: For 10 years?] Yes; and at the end of that time the ships were to become the property of the British Government. That arrangement was arrived at after long and careful negotiation between them, and he thought it was one equitable to the Mother Country as well as to the Colonies. It established for the first time the great principle of financial partnership between the Colonies and the Mother Country; and, so far from taking the view which the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) entertained that this arrangement was unjust to the English taxpayer, he believed it might operate in precisely the opposite direction. The Colonial Representatives showed no narrow or prejudiced spirit. They were not influenced by local considerations; indeed, the last words a leading Delegate said to him before leaving this country were—

"I am glad the Imperial Government have met us in a frank and liberal spirit. We, in Australia, are now only 4,000,000; but in 30 or 40 years we may be 40,000,000 or 50,000,000, and then, when our riches and our power have increased, we shall be able to treat the Mother Country in as generous and liberal a spirit as it now treats us."

He (Lord George Hamilton) trusted, when a question of such Imperial importance came before the Imperial Parliament, that Parliament would not be found wanting. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had called attention to the increase in the cost of the ships, and that was a point on which he (Lord George Hamilton) desired to say a few words, because it brought home at once to anybody who was in any way interested in naval affairs the danger of attempting to embark upon a wholesale expenditure upon ships. The march of mechanical science was now extraordinarily rapid. One of the arrangements they made at the Colonial Conference was that whatever type of ship was adopted it should, so far as its displacement was concerned, be equal in power and speed to anything afloat. The Colonists said that, being a new and go-a-head people, they would only be satisfied with the most modern type of war ship. The ship the Admiralty proposed was an improved type of the Archer class, which, at that time, fulfilled these conditions; but, owing to a delay on the part of one of the Colonies in assenting to the proposal, they were unable to put out last year the tenders for the building of the ships. In the meantime, certain foreign nations designed and commenced ships more powerful than the vessels of the Archer class; and the Admiralty were therefore obliged, in order to fulfil their bargain, to substitute, for the vessels originally decided upon, ships of the size mentioned by his right hon. Friend. It, therefore, came to this—that although they had lost five months in point of time, they had gained considerably by an increase in the power, speed, and generally efficiency of the ships. If the vessels had been laid down last year they would have been inferior to the vessels subsequently laid down. That, he thought, brought home very clearly the unwisdom of prematurely rushing into shipbuilding. They might be confident that, as soon as a vessel was laid down, one superior in speed and probably in power would be commenced. He thought he had answered all the questions put to him; and he hoped the Committee, considering the manner in which these proposals were treated by the Colonial Legislature, would endeavour to act in a reciprocal spirit, and not go to a Division.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD (Marylebone, E.) said, he desired to reserve what he had to say upon the Resolutions until a later period, and what he rose for now was to repudiate what the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) said about the Australians who came to help us at Suakin. He went up the Nile, and he went to Suakin afterwards, and he might say, on behalf of every soldier and sailor serving in that expedition, that they were very grateful to the Australians for the help they rendered. Their discipline in camp was splendid, they were excellent soldiers, and they could not have done better than they did. As to the Canadian Voyageurs, he very much doubted whether our men could have got as far as they did if they had not had the Voyageurs with them. The experience on the Nile was something totally new to our officers and men; but the Voyageurs took charge of the boats; it was an old game of theirs. They understood the rapids and rocks, and they were, in truth, found most useful. He was fully persuaded he only expressed the opinion of every man in the expedition, when he said they were most grateful to the Canadians for what they did on the Nile. As to the Australians, he did not think they went to Malta. The hon. Gentleman was totally misinformed upon that point. The Canadians did go to Malta; but he had never heard anything but a good account of them in whatever they undertook.

Lord George Hamilton

although he had nothing but praise for the very lucid and ample statement of the First Lord of the Treasury, the right hon. Gentleman did not give to the Committee full particulars, especially as to the payment to be made by the Colonies. He had no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman trusted to knowledge on the part of Members of the Committee which all of them did not possess. The right hon. Gentleman ought to have remembered that the information was hidden away in a mass of Papers, and that it was difficult to glean it from the Report of the proceedings of the Colonial Conference last year. But there were one or two points he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) would still like a little more information upon. As he understood the First Lord of the Treasury, the development of the size and of other qualities of these ships, and the consequent development of their cost, was represented by an additional £150,000, the difference between £700,000 and £850,000, £700,000 having been the amount originally decided upon, and £850,000 being the amount dealt with in these Resolutions. The Colonies were to pay, as he understood, £35,000 a-year, and they were to pay the whole cost of the crews. But would not the addition of these ships to the Navy involve an addition to the number of men under training, and would the ships be manned from the British Navy? Would the Colonies pay, not only the direct cost of the maintenance of the crews on the station, but the indirect charges, which sometimes were very heavy in such cases, which would otherwise fall on the British taxpayer? It would be interesting to be informed on these points. Now, he was not disposed, like his hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere) to raise an objection to this arrangement; but he thought it right to remark that he believed it was absolutely the first time that the expenses of building ships had been met by a loan of public money. Hitherto such an expenditure as this had always been met and charged upon the current Estimates of the year. That was a new departure, and he hoped it would not be regarded as a precedent in the case of our own expenditure; that it would be considered as solely justified on the ground of the peculiar relations between ourselves and the Colonies, and of the bargain that had been made between the two. The sum was small to be got by way of loan, and the object was one which he believed had never been met in the way proposed. Loans had only been raised, as he had been taught to understand, for such great objects as fortifications, or some definite and tangible work. But, as he had said, he did not share the objection of his hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere). If the arrangement stood as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had explained, it did not seem to him to be a disadvantageous one for this country, as the commerce which was to be protected by those vessels was substantially British commerce rather than Australian. He certainly did not think it would be right to put any impediment in the way of an encouragement of a patriotic spirit on the part of the Colonies.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked to be allowed to explain a little more in detail the arrangement which was negotiated with the Colonial Representatives. The financial part of the arrangement had been properly described by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Colonists undertook to pay on the cost of these vessels a sum not exceeding £35,000 a-year for 10 years—that was on the cost of construction. They further arranged that of the ships constructed, three of the larger, and one of the smaller, should be permanently in commission, and that the remainder should have a certain staff and crew, and be in such a condition as to be ready for commission at a moment's notice. The whole cost of the maintenance of the ships in commission, and of the ships out of commission—the whole cost, both direct and indirect, everything connected with their maintenance—was to be borne by the Colonies, provided it did not exceed the sum of £91,000 a-year. In other words, the Colonies undertook to pay practically an appropriation in aid of the Imperial Naval Estimates amounting to £91,000. [An hon. MEMBER: For 10 years?] Yes; and at the end of that time the ships were to become the property of the British Government. That arrangement was arrived at after long and careful negotiation between them, and he thought it was one equitable to the Mother Country as well as to the Colonies. It established for the first time the great principle of financial partner-end of 10 years the ships and engines, if not worn out, would be so much depreciated that they would not be worth taking into account. They would be more like old iron than anything else; so that at the end of the 10 years all we should get would be the value of the ships as they would be then. We should receive the ships back, and he supposed they would be sent to the Dockyards and broken up.

An hon. MEMBER: We do not break up war vessels 10 years old.

MR. WADDY said, he was glad to hear it. Though the vessels might not have to be destroyed at the end of 10 years, still they would clearly be in a very depreciated condition, and would be comparatively useless. Whatever might be their state of depreciation—and on this point he did not wish to insist—the article they would get back at the end of the period of 10 years would not be of the value of £850,000 which they were now spending. It might be a very desirable arrangement that the Government proposed to make; but, inasmuch as it was such an arrangement as he had described, it was evidently important to them that they should consider what had been said by a right hon. Member from the Front Bench on the Opposition side of the House—namely, that this was the first time the Government of this country was found borrowing money in this way for such a purpose. It did seem to him (Mr. Waddy) that if this was a proper outlay—and that it was not a proper outlay he did not suggest, because he did not wish to contest that point at this moment—it, at any rate, appeared to him that we were in this position. We were making a provision for what were said to be the ordinary requirements of the Empire—[Cries of "No, no!"] Yes; that was what was said now. We were undertaking an entirely new system of provision for the ordinary requirements of the Empire, for the Government declared that these ships were not wanted for the protection of the Colonies, but for the defence of the Empire generally. The ships were required for the protection of our own commerce, and, no doubt, that was true; but it had always been the case. The only difference was that we were now making a better provision for the protection of our commerce in far-off parts of the world than had been made before. Then let us have our eyes quite open as to what we were doing. If it was necessary and desirable that this money should be spent, then by all means let it be spent; but it surely was not desirable to raise the money in the manner proposed? It ought to be raised on the ordinary Estimates of the year. He felt this point very strongly indeed—that, for a purpose which the Government held to be necessary, they were spending more money on the ordinary provision for the year, without allowing the expenditure to come into the ordinary Estimates of the year. It was, in point of fact, an attempt to conceal the real expenditure of the country by calling it by a new name, and spreading the amount over 10 years. If, as he said, the money ought to be spent, in the name of common sense spend it; but let the expenditure take place in the ordinary fashion.

Mr. Waddy

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport), in reply to the hon. and learned Member for the Brigg Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Waddy), said, that if this arrangement was not made with the co-operation of Australia, we should still have to supply these vessels ourselves for the protection of our commerce, though, instead of its costing the country the sum which the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to think it would cost, we should be actually receiving something like £90,000 from Australia in support of these vessels. There was one bit of information which he (Captain Price) should have liked to have received from the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) as to the control of this Australian Squadron. He understood that the Squadron was to be under the control of the senior naval officer on that Station, but, at the same time, it was only to be used in Australian waters. Now, he wished to know who was to be the judge as to how, from the Australian shores, this Squadron should act, because there was one very important duty which a Squadron such as this would be called upon to fulfil in connection with commerce—that was to say, the duty of convoy? He would put this question to the noble Lord, who, perhaps, would be able to give them an answer before the end of the discussion, and say whether some arrangement could not be made with the Australian Government by which, in case of war, these vessels would be allowed to convoy merchantmen for a certain distance from the shores of Australia, say, to the Cape or to Singapore, or to such other place as the merchantmen could be handed over to the Imperial Navy? It certainly seemed to him that there should be some definite arrangement between ourselves and the Australian Colonies for this purpose. Before he sat down he should like to express his great regret for the slur which had been cast upon our Australian Colonies by the hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) in regard to their having sent troops to Egypt to our assistance. Whether or not what the hon. Member had said this evening was calculated to advance his notoriety in this country, at any rate he (Captain Price) sincerely trusted that the hon. Member's words would not, in any shape, reach the shores of our Australian Colonies.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, that whilst he objected to the proposal to raise money for the purpose of Imperial defence by loan, he should feel bound, if a Division were challenged, to vote in favour of ratifying the agreement which had been entered into with the Australian Colonies.

COLONEL BRIDGEMAN (Bolton) said, he wished to protest against the language used by the hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) with reference to the New South Wales contingent at Suakin, and to bear out what had been said by the noble and gallant Lord the Member for East Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford) and the hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Price). It would be a very serious thing if it should go forth from England to Australia that the services of the Colonial troops who served in the Soudan were not appreciated. The hon. Member for Northampton had said that no soldier would rise to say that those Volunteers had been of any use; but, having served in the same brigade with them, he (Colonel Bridgeman) wished to bear testimony to the admirable manner in which they had performed their duty. No men could have worked harder or more willingly, or shown a keener anxiety to learn a soldier's duties. It was a splendid thing for a Colony to have sent men out, at its own expense, to the help of the Mother Country in a time of danger, and it would be a national misfortune if it went forth to Australia that England had failed to appreciate the loyalty which was shown to her.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, he wished to know whether the Colonies were to pay for the repair and maintenance of the vessels in commission, in addition to the payment of the £91,000 referred to?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that the arrangement was that the Colonies were to bear the expense of the maintenance of the ships in commission up to £91,000. That sum, it had been estimated, would be sufficient to keep them in proper repair, and to pay for their coaling and for caretakers of the vessels when out of commission. They also estimated that the indirect charges would fall within that sum of £91,000, though he did not mean to say that that sum would never be exceeded.

MR. BRADLAUGH asked, if it were exceeded, whether this country would have to pay the extra expenditure?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Yes.

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.) said, he desired to add a word or two to what had fallen from his right hon. Friend (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) at an earlier part of the debate. They would probably have a great deal to say upon the 5th and some of the following Resolutions. No doubt, the Committee would be glad of further elucidation as to the effect of those Resolutions; but as regarded the present Resolution, as affecting the arrangement with the Australian Government, he was bound to say—and he said it with some recollection of the arrangement made a long time ago, in fact before he occupied the post of First Lord of the Admiralty, in connection with the Victorian Squadron of that day—that he thought the Government had made a very fair and reasonable arrangement. The Government were going to spend £850,000—an enlarged expenditure from the sum of £700,000 originally contemplated—upon this Squadron, which, though it would be for service in Australian waters, would be entirely under the command of Her Majesty's officers. That amount appeared to him to be a reasonable sum to spend as the initial cost of these ships. What he understood would happen would be this, that the Australian Governments amongst them would contribute every year, during a period of 10 years, somewhere about £125,000 towards the capital expenditure on the ships, and the annual maintenance of the vessels, that was to say, we should receive £1,250,000 towards a fleet which in all probability, even if it had not been for this arrangement with the Colony, the necessity for protecting our commerce would have compelled us to establish ourselves. He did not say that if it were not for this arrangement with the Colonies, we should be spending an amount equal to that which it was proposed now to spend, but, at any rate, we should have had to incur a large outlay for the protection of our enormous commerce to and from Australia, and the fact remained that that burden was shared by the Australian Colonies to the extent of £1,250,000, spread over a period of 10 years. So far, then, as regarded the arrangement with the Colonies, he was well satisfied; but he must say that he was not quite so sure of the wisdom of the arrangement between the Admiralty and the Treasury. He confessed he shared the apprehensions of some of those who had asked whether as between the Admiralty and the Treasury, in regard to a strictly internal arrangement in the matter of the cost of providing these ships, was it worth while to break through the great principle on which all ships had hitherto been built? The cost of these works had hitherto been defrayed out of the annual Votes of Parliament, but now it was proposed to defray the cost of so small a charge as £850,000 by means of a loan. If the money were to be borrowed, he admitted that the arrangements for the loan itself were not unreasonable. The repayment of capital and interest was to be spread over a period of 10 years, and that was preferable to the 20 years for which loans of the same kind had formerly been raised—that, for instance, for fortifications which was contracted under Lord Palmerston's Government. What he was afraid of, was, that if once they began to raise loans for perishable things such as ships, although they only began with the small amount of £850,000, the time would come when it would be quoted as a precedent, and they would be asked to build a much larger Navy by the aid of money raised on loan.

Mr. Childers

He did not suggest that such a proposal would be made by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury or the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. He did not believe it would be made by them; they had disavowed any such idea, but the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) would forgive him for reminding him that such a proposal was made by a distinguished statesman not many years ago, and that it was possible it might be renewed on some future occasion. If the proposal were not made now it was not the noble Lord's fault that it was not. He (Mr. Childers) remembered perfectly well the controversy which took place when that proposal was made, and he shared very much the apprehensions of those who feared that what was now being done would be quoted as a precedent on some future occasion. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) had assured them that so far as he was concerned, this would not be made a precedent of, and that assurance would find a place on the authentic records of the debates of Parliament, and, therefore, he (Mr. Childers) would at that moment say no more on the subject. He had risen not only to say that, but to express his great satisfaction with the words to which the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty had given utterance as to shipbuilding. The noble Lord had put before them the unreasonableness of embarking upon an enormous amount of shipbuilding of the type which happened to be the best type of the year. There, again, we had had, and should have both now and in the future, proposals made for an enormous amount of shipbuilding to be undertaken for the reason that some person in authority might come to the conclusion that our Navy was insufficient, and that a very large amount of tonnage ought to be built. But the noble Lord had spoken clearly as to the grave objections which existed to such a policy, and he (Mr. Childers) hoped that the very wise words of which the noble Lord had made use would not be forgotten. They would remember that the French had fallen into precisely the same error which it was so essential that the Parliament of this country should avoid in this matter. A very able Commission was appointed not so many years ago in France, and he remembered very well its inception, and its recommending to the Imperial Government of France that it should embark upon a very large programme of shipbuilding. The French Government approved of the recommendation, and ordered a very large Fleet to be prepared, the expenditure on that Fleet to be spread over, he thought, 10 years or some such period. Well, what had been the result? Why by the end of the 10 years two-thirds of the vessels built were found to be of an obsolete character. The French had thus been engaged in a most wild shipbuilding speculation, quite forgetting that the type and character of modern ships of war changed very rapidly. Ten years, or certainly 12 years, after these ships were taken in hand, it was found that they were, to a great extent, obsolete, and those who had compared the strength of the French Fleet with our own at that time—and it was his business to take part in that comparison—had felt very easy as to the final outcome of the enormous shipbuilding speculation undertaken by the French Government. Therefore, he was very glad when he heard the noble Lord lay down such a sound doctrine. Might he ask the noble Lord to add another principle to that which he had laid down, and it was this, that whatever decision might be arrived at as to the number of ships to be laid down, do not be afraid to finish them—that it was better to undertake three or four new ships, and not be afraid to finish them, than to contemplate building a large fleet, and spend a small sum on each, but then to patch and alter them from time to time as shipbuilding science advanced, and never complete them according to the original designs. If they undertook three or four new ships and finished them, when they were well forward with these they could commence another batch, in which all more recent improvements would find place. In this way they would get the advantage from time to time of whatever advance was made in shipbuilding, gunnery, and engineering science, as the Government had shown that within 12 months they had been forced to take advantage of the most modern principles in the type of vessel to be built for the Australian Station. He hoped he was not unduly pressing this principle upon the attention of the Government. It was one that all Admiralties always disliked to face; but he hoped it was one that the Government would adhere to. He thought he saw signs of its having been adhered to by the noble Lord, and he congratulated the noble Lord upon the circumstance, and he trusted that the principle would receive the approval of the House.

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth) said, he only rose to refer to a remark which had fallen from the hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) as to the part taken by the Australian Colonies in the expenditure for Imperial defence. He (Sir William Crossman) had visited the Colonies some seven years ago, and had been very much struck by the preparations which had been made by the Colonists in the direction of fortifications for their own ports. From all he had heard, the Colonies were keeping pace with the times, and were improving their fortifications year by year. The Colonies had done very much for their own defence; and he thought that when it came to a question of the defence of British commerce, it was for the Government to make the best bargain in their power with the Colonies.

MR. J. M. MACLEAN (Oldham) said, the principle involved in this Resolution was so important and novel that he thought the Government ought to feel very well satisfied with the general acceptance it had obtained in this country as well as in Australia. He confessed that, looking at the matter as a financial operation, it seemed to him that the English people had not altogether got the best of the bargain. From the statement made by the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty this evening, it appeared that originally the cost of these ships was to be £700,000; but the Australians, who were a go-a-head people, came forward and said they wanted the best and fastest ships which could be supplied, the result being that the expenditure had been increased to £850,000. He did not find, however, that the Australians were to pay any more on account of this increase in the expenditure. It was very easy for the Colonists to appear a go-a-head people in this way with the money of other persons. Nor was he greatly comforted by the assurance of the Australian delegates, which the First Lord of the Admiralty had quoted with so much satisfaction, that Australia, if generously treated by England now, would repay the debt a hundredfold at some future time when she became a nation of 40,000,000; for no people had the right to pledge their descendants in this way, and, besides, the Australians were very much better off now, when they had a small population possessing boundless mineral and agricultural resources, than they were likely to be when their numbers had largely increased. If then, he looked upon this as a purely business arrangement, in that light he considered that the Australians had made a very good bargain indeed for themselves with the taxpayers of this country. The real defence of this proposal seemed to him to be that it was an immense improvement upon the existing state of things, for at the present moment the Australian Colonies enjoyed all the benefits of being protected by this mighty Empire, whilst they did not share in its expense and responsibility. Now, for the first time, the Government had succeeded in inducing them to enter formally into an arrangement by which they would pay a portion of the expenses of the Imperial Government, and by which they were willing to join us in defending the commerce of the Empire. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) had said that the ships which went to Australia were English ships, and that, therefore, it was only right that we should contribute a large proportion of the expenditure necessary for protecting them. But if we entered into any scheme of Imperial Federation, or entered into the consideration of the principle upon which such a federation could be carried out, they would all agree that each portion of the Empire should pay for its own defence. That was the principle we acted upon in regard to India. We treated India in a very different fashion to the way in which we treated our Colonies. We required her to pay for every man and every pound of powder she got from us, and the principle of protecting at our own expense all the British ships that traded with India was not recognized in our treatment of her in the slightest degree. If a scheme of anything like a real federation were adopted, we should have to give our Colonies an equal control with ourselves over the policy of the whole Empire. At present, the Colonies did not possess that, and therefore it was perhaps only reasonable to expect that they should not contribute as largely as they should otherwise do towards the defence of the whole Empire. All that could be said for the present proposal was that a beginning had been made in the right direction, and that now, for the first time, the Australian Colonies recognized their responsibilities, and were willing to take a share in the defence of the Empire.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he congratulated the hon. Gentleman the Member for Oldham (Mr. J. M. Maclean) in having delivered the most sensible speech which had been made on that side of the House, although he was very much afraid the hon. Member was about to vote precisely in opposition to the views he had expressed. The noble and gallant Lord the Member for East Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford) had complained that he (Mr. Labouchere) had stated that the New South Wales contingent had not conducted themselves properly at Malta. He had been speaking not only of the New South Wales contingent, but of the Canadian Voyageurs, and the fact was that this force was composed principally of young men who had emigrated as boys from England to Canada, and were very glad of this opportunity of getting back to Europe for a holiday. With respect to the New South Wales contingent, he only wished that hon. Gentlemen, instead of reading the Jingo organs in this country, would consult the newspapers published in Australia—there might be three or four Jingo organs in Australia; but he would recommend to the attention of hon. Members those organs which were best appreciated by the inhabitants of that country. It would be seen, from the statements in those papers, that all persons in Australia not of a Jingo disposition were of opinion that the whole expedition of the New South Wales contingent to Egypt was entirely a mistake. The idea was put forward by a Prime Minister, who had naturally a servile spirit, and who wished to show his servility to this country. It was a most undesirable and regrettable circumstance that they had dragged the Australian Colonies into this miserable warfare—to make war upon people, who in the words of the late Prime Minister, were “rightly struggling to be free.”

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he would not go into the question of the expedition to Suakin; but with respect to this particular Vote he desired to say that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) had made the matter clear to them, so that they now knew exactly what the arrangement would cost. Financially, it was most unquestionably a bad bargain; and it was desirable that the electors of this country should perfectly understand this, that taking the price at which we could borrow money at this time, and the amount we were to be paid, the operation of raising the money would cost us, from first to last, £220,000. Now, an hon. Member on the other side had said that this was an addition to the Imperial Navy. It was not a bit of an addition to the Imperial Navy. These ships would be essentially a local Navy to protect the Australian waters. They would do no more than that, as they would have not only to protect vessels in Australian waters, but also to protect Australian forts. He had read the speeches made by gentlemen who were touched with this Imperial Federation mania. He had read the speeches of gentlemen from Canada, protesting against their ports being open to attacks from the Navies of other nations when those nations might be at war with this country. He had seen it stated that, in the event of a war breaking out between England and some Foreign Power, a hostile ship might go in front of one of their towns and insist on bombarding it, unless some ransom were paid. That also was the argument used by the Australians when this proposal was made, and that was one of the grounds upon which the arrangement was carried out; but now the Government turned round and said it was British commerce that was to be protected by these proposed new vessels. How was British commerce to be protected by these ships? British commerce would have to go out to Australia before it could receive protection. We were to bear the expense of protecting our commerce between England and Australia, and when it arrived in Australian waters we were still to share the expense of protecting it in the manner proposed. As a matter of fact, the Australians had few ships of their own; but Australian imports came in ships which went to Australia from this country, and therefore it was Australian commerce which required to be protected in Australian waters. If we were to say to the Australians—"We want you to contribute not towards a general Fleet to defend British commerce all over the world, but towards the maintenance of a special local Fleet in British waters, in order to protect ships coming from Australia, because in those ships there happen to be Australian goods," what would be the reply of the people of Australia? And yet that mutatis mutandis was the argument hon. Gentlemen opposite used on this occasion. The hon. Member for Oldham had said that this was the beginning of a new principle, and that was precisely what he (Mr. Labouchere) objected to. It was, no doubt, the commencement of a new principle, and what he complained of was that, if sanctioned in this case, it would be extended to other Colonies. If they made this bargain with Australia, how could they refuse to enter into a similar one with Canada and the Cape? In the future they should find that wherever they had Colonies, those Colonies would come sponging upon them and asking to have ships built and equipped for them for the defence of their shores, and, forsooth, that they would support them when they were built, and, generous creatures, give them back to this country when they were worth nothing. With regard to this condition that this country was to get the ships back again, if he were a prophet he should be inclined to say that they should not even get them back at the end of the 10 years, or if they did get them back that it would be simply on condition of giving new ships to replace them, at a cost of another £700,000 or £800,000. An hon. Member opposite had stated that the Australian Colonies had spent a large sum of money upon fortifications for the protection of our commerce; but that seemed to him (Mr. Labouchere) a most extraordinary argument. He should certainly vote against the proposal of the Government. The matter really resolved itself into this, practically. He was sorry he should not have the support of the hon. Members sitting on the Front Opposition Bench; but it had sometimes occurred to him to divide the House without having had the privilege of that support. The question was really this—they had, at the beginning of the evening, to choose whether they would discuss the proposal—this wretched proposal, for giving £850,000 raised from the taxpayers of this country, from the tea and coffee and tobacco of the poor people of the country—in the method suggested—or the mature proposal of the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) for finding some means of spending English money in housing poor persons at home. He was in favour of that proposal, but the Government had shirked it in order to bring forward this miserable plan of spending £850,000 for the benefit of Australia.

Mr. J. M. Maclean

COLONEL DUNCAN (Finsbury, Holborn) said, he was sure the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) always desired to be historically correct, but in his description of the Canadian Voyageurs he had made an error which he (Colonel Duncan) should like to correct. The hon. Member had said that the Voyageurs who had been employed in the Soudan were men who had emigrated as boys from this country. He (Colonel Duncan), however, could assure the hon. Member that, as a rule, they had been either French, Indians, or English Canadians of the second or third generation.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 85; Noes 37: Majority 48.—(Div. List, No. 111.)

(1.) Resolved, That it is expedient to ratify an Agreement for Naval Defence made between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of Her Majesty's Australasian Colonies.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That it is expedient to authorise the issue out of the Consolidated Fund of such sums, not exceeding £850,000, as may be required for building, arming, and completing the vessels mentioned in the Agreement.”—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

Mr. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg) said, he did not wish to repeat what he had already stated as to this matter; but here, at all events, there could be no justification for the particular Resolution. Assuming the justice of the Resolution just agreed to, and assuming that this money ought to be raised for these Colonial ships, surely the mode of raising the money proposed in the present Resolution could not be justified. It was admitted that what was wanted was to defend our own commerce as well as that of the Colonies, and that was unquestionably a legitimate outgoing expenditure for the year. The expenditure ought, therefore, to appear in the financial statements for the year. If the Government desired to provide these ships the Government should pay for them, and should not leave the cost as a burden upon incoming Governments. There could be no excuse for allowing the expenditure to run over a period of 10 years, during part of which period in all probability other Governments would have to share the burden of finding the necessary finds. The invariable custom had been time out of mind to provide the money for ships as they were required. The Government would now obtain the whole of this £850,000, but it was to be paid back year by year, and, therefore, the debt would be practically one which would fall upon the shoulders of other Governments. He, for one, strongly protested against this mode of dealing with the simple financial question, and, therefore, if no one else cared to do so, he should divide the House upon this Resolution.

Mr. Labouchere

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) asked, whether they were not to have some statement from the Treasury Bench on this subject? No doubt, as was suggested on the Treasury Bench, they had had a full statement with regard to these Resolutions from the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) at the commencement of the proceedings in Committee, but the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means had stated that the Resolutions were to be put separately in order that there might be a discussion upon each one. Well, to discuss a thing required two parties to the arrangement, two persons of different opinions. As yet, upon the resolution before the Committee they had had only one opinion, that of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Brigg Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Waddy), and he would put it to the Government that to leave that expression of opinion unanswered could hardly be called discussion. As a matter of fact the history of this transaction was only part of the whole history of Conservative Governments—Conservatives spending money and Liberals providing it. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was looking forward to having a surplus next year. Well, if the right hon. Gentleman could secure a surplus by making savings, well and good; but what he (Mr. Labouchere) strongly objected to was making a surplus at the expense of future Chancellors of the Exchequer and then swaggering about it. He did not believe in making surpluses by postponing the burden of expenditure of one year to future years. Here they had a large amount of money to be spent at once, which was to be borrowed or got in some sort of way, the repayment being deferred to future years. He (Mr. Labouchere) certainly hoped his hon. and learned Friend (Mr Waddy) would do what he had just declared to be his intention of doing, namely—to divide the Committee on this Vote.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, that as the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken seemed to desire that there should be a discussion upon this subject, perhaps it would be as well if he (Mr. Goschen) said a word or two in reply to the hon. Member who had started the conversation.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Hear, hear!

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. GOSCHEN said, he did not know whether the hon. Member opposite (Dr. Tanner) thought that his interruption was a Parliamentary contribution to the discussion of the subject. It would certainly seem that hon. Gentlemen sitting behind and supporting the hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) were not inclined to give much encouragement to that Parliamentary discussion which was demanded.

DR. TANNER: I rise to Order. I wish to ask you, Mr. Chairman, whether I am out of Order in saying "Hear, hear!" to the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is ashamed of my cheer?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is not entitled to rise in that way.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he rose to answer the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton, if that hon. Gentleman wished to know the views of the Government upon this subject. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Waddy) who started this discussion stated that this was only the ordinary way of edging in an expenditure which was initiated by one Party and borne by another. He (Mr. Goschen) thought that if there was ever an occasion upon which that method of proceeding had been carefully avoided it was the present, for though the expenditure might be right or wrong, the Government had taken special pains that no burdens whatever should be thrown upon their Successors.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that the Successors of the Government would have to pay the interest on the money.

MR. GOSCHEN: The interest will be more than covered by the contribution received from the Colonies.

MR. LABOUCHERE: For the 10 years?

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, for the 10 years. The interest will be more than paid, and also the loan itself will be more than paid off out of the interest we receive out of the Suez Canal Shares.

MR. LABOUCHERE: That interest is ours already, and is applicable for other things.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he saw the hon. Gentleman's idea of discussion—which he himself had invited—was that he should keep up a running fire of comment upon every statement he (Mr. Goschen) made. The hon. and learned Member for the Brigg Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Waddy) had endeavoured to give some Party colour to this debate by referring to Tory tactics; but, as a matter of fact, the Government had endeavoured to keep everything like Party out of the question; and, notwithstanding the provocation which was given to them, they would not allow themselves to be led into the discussion of how far they had now to touch the revenues of the year in order to meet the defects in the system of defences of the Empire, which had been left to them by their Predecessors. The Government would not enter upon that field of discussion, and desired to prevent such a disturbing element from being imported into it, and to discuss the question simply on its merits. In the present case, as he had said, they threw no burden upon their Successors; and, if they had raised this money by loan, it was simply because it was an entirely separate operation, and he was glad the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite had called attention to the subject, because it enabled him to say once more, and most clearly, that the present proposal of the Government could not be drawn into a precedent for building ships by means of loans. The operation they proposed would be rather a loan of ships to the Colonies for a certain number of years. The cost of the ships was provided by loan, the interest upon which loan, together with the principal, would be defrayed in yearly instalments by the Colonies. He should himself very much deplore the fact if this were in any way turned into a precedent for meeting the needs of the year by means of a loan. He should always adhere to the principle that the needs of the year should be met out of the revenue of the year.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) said, he wished to know whether the capital as well as the interest was to be wholly repaid by the Colonies? If not, the arrangement was one which anybody would be glad to avail himself of in ordinary life, if it were within the bounds of possibility—that was to say, to supply himself with luxuries on borrowed money which he would not be called upon to repay. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had referred to the income from the Suez Canal Shares; but he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that, if the arrangement for the purchase of these ships had not been entered into, this money would have been received from the shares, and there would have been so much more in the Exchequer.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that he has anticipated a subsequent part of the discussion.

MR. PICTON said, he did not wish to do that; but he only made reference to the point in reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had stated that the money for the repayment of capital and interest would be obtained out of the interest on the Suez Canal Shares. What he (Mr. Picton) wished to insist upon was that, if this money was to be borrowed, it was also to be repaid, and, whether it was to be repaid from money derived from interest in other directions made no difference. This was merely the beginning of an objectionable system, and he was very much afraid that before long they would find other Colonies coming forward for similar assistance to that we were giving to the Australian Colonies, and the result would be the rolling up of another National Debt in addition to that with which the country was already saddled.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, that he wished to make quite distinct the objection which he had foreshadowed when they were discussing the last resolution. He objected to the method in which this grant was to be provided for, and he failed to follow the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his statement that no burden would be imposed upon those who might have the duty of managing the finances of the country during the 12 years over which the repayment of this money was spread. Whether the money was to be raised by loan, or, however else it was to be obtained, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the year during the next 12 years would have to provide means for the repayment of the principal and interest, which was covered by the amount of the terminable annuity. When they came to the Resolution dealing with the other provision to which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer alluded, he (Mr. Bradlaugh) should have something to say on the adoption of that as an asset. Whether the ships were to be paid for year by year, or, whether the interest merely was to be paid, the charge would be clearly one upon Governments hereafter, and a delusive appearance would be presented by the arrangement, inasmuch as it would seem as though future Governments were meeting the ordinary charges of the year, whereas they were merely paying the debts of a Government which had gone before.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston) said, the Resolution under consideration asked them to confirm the statement that it was expedient that to authorize the issue of such sums not exceeding £850,000 as might be required for building, arming, and completing certain vessels of war, and it was because he believed that it was not expedient that these sums should be authorized, or any other sums, that he should follow the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Brigg Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Waddy) into the Lobby to protest against it. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith) had told them that this outlay was proposed for the purposes of Imperial defence. Well, it seemed that Imperial defence implied Colonial defence, and he should have been very glad if the right hon. Gentleman had told the House where he thought attack was likely to come from, and who, he thought, were likely to be the foes we should have to meet in Colonial waters. If the right hon. Gentleman had shown who was likely to attack our Colonies, and had pointed out the danger in which we stood, hon. Members on these (the Opposition) Benches would have been much more likely to follow him into the Lobby and support him in this Resolution than they were under the existing circumstances. He (Mr. Cremer) had long since learnt to look with a great deal of suspicion upon all statements of this kind, and upon scares raised for political purposes from time to time. It was the special province of the other side of the House to manufacture scares. Unfortunately, scares of this kind had been too frequently manufactured by either Party in the State. He had ventured to take the common sense view of the matter, and had asked himself whether there was any real fear of our being attacked by any Foreign Power if we minded our own affairs. The Australian Colonies had got along very well for something like half-a-century without being placed in the predicament which hon. Members opposite seemed to dread. No one had interfered with them, and the Colonies, for their part, had not interfered with anyone. He could not help thinking, however, that these Colonies had pursued the even tenor of their way as they had done because they had not possessed the means of mischief. If the means of mischief had been given to them, there would sure to have been difference and strife between themselves and foreign countries. The late Lord Aberdeen used to make a statement to the effect that nations in possession of large Armies and Navies were like boys with new knives, they must cut sticks with them. It was because he was anxious to prevent any such thing taking place, it was because he was anxious to prevent strife between our Colonists and other people, that he should oppose this Resolution. Quite recently there had been some difficulty between our Australian Colonies and a Foreign Power on the subject of New Guinea, and it had seemed to him that at one time there was some danger of hostile feeling being exhibited by our Australian Colonies; but, fortunately, the matter was settled by amicable means, without the expenditure of blood or treasure. And why was this? Simply because the Colonies had none of the means of mischief at their disposal which the Committee was asked by this Resolution to enable them to become possessed of. Had they possessed a powerful Navy they would probably have resorted to its use to carry out their policy, for that which was characteristic of individuals when in a state of "armed defence," as it was called, was also characteristic of nations. It was because of the absence of fighting forces that the Australian Colonies were ready to settle their differences by peaceful means. He should oppose this Resolution, because it seemed to him that the nation had no guarantee that the money which it was proposed to vote would be wisely or well spent. He had said that he did not believe it would be wisely spent, but they had no guarantee that it would be well or efficiently spent either. In revolving in his mind, during the past few moments, what had occurred on former occasions, he thought he could justify the position he had taken up by reference to what had happened on those occasions. Many hon. Members in the House would remember the Palmerstonian panic prevalent some 25 years ago, which, under the influence of that bogey French invasion, was manufactured for the purpose of inducing the country to spend something like £10,000,000 on the fortifications of our naval stations. In consequence of that panic a considerable sum of money was expended at our chief naval station—Portsmouth. When a boy, he had frequently walked round the ramparts constructed out of that £10,000,000, and had thought wonderingly upon how impossible it would be for any foe to invade that fortress; but the fortifications which at that time were considered impregnable were now regarded as utterly useless, and some of them were dismantled and absolutely destroyed. Then we had magnificent forts constructed for miles around that naval station, and he had been informed by people living in the neighbourhood that these forts had never been armed with guns of sufficient calibre to do injury to an enemy making an attack upon the positions. In fact it had been said that it would be dangerous to do so, for the reason that if guns mounted there of sufficient power to carry shot at the distance at which an enemy's vessel would lie when making an attack upon Portsmouth, or to carry a sufficient distance to prevent an enemy from landing, the first gun fired off would cause the forts to crumble into pieces. He did not say that this was true, but this was the prevailing opinion in the locality, and probably some hon. and gallant Gentlemen who were familiar with these subjects would tell the House whether the account which had been stated to him was accurate or not. If these allegations were true, the enormous sums of money expended upon these fortifications might just as well have been pitched into the harbour at Portsmouth or carried out to Spithead and dropped overboard into the Ocean. Then, coming down to more recent years, there was another scare manufactured at the time of the Franco-Prussian War, £4,000,000 being voted for pressing military and naval necessities. What good had come of that expenditure? And then, coming down to a later period, a Vote of £11,000,000 was rushed through this House after two or three hours' debate in consequence of a Russian scare. He used the phrase "rushed through" advisedly, because he considered that the passage of a Vote of £11,000,000 after three hours' debate deserved to be described in such language. And why was it that this money was voted? It was because it was stated that Russia had taken a strip of land somewhere or other on the frontier of Afghanistan which somebody or other said it was not right to take. Well, it turned out ultimately that that strip of land belonged to Russia, and that, therefore, under all circumstances the scare was ill-timed and the expenditure involved absolutely unnecessary. But whether the strip of land did or did not belong to Russia everyone admitted in the end that it was not worth 2s. 6d., to say nothing of £11,000,000. No one could be found to give 5s. for it to-day, and yet we were very nearly going to war with Russia about that miserable strip of sandy desert on the frontiers of Afghanistan. It must be remembered that the Afghans whom we were supposed to be so anxious to protect, declared that we should not enter their territory with our troops in order to afford them that protection we were so anxious to render against their terrible foe, Russia. An hon. Member behind him asked what was done with the £11,000,000. He (Mr. Cremer) should very much like to know what had become of it, for the nation had never yet heard that it had received any value for it. Therefore, the nation had every proof that the money voted during the Palmerstonian craze was wasted. The nation never knew what was done with the whole £10,000,000. The same was to be said with regard to the £4,000,000 voted during the Franco-Prussian scare, and also of the £11,000,000 voted during the Afghan scare. Until they had some assurance that the nation got more value for moneys voted in this way than they had secured in the past, he for one should go into the Lobby with any one opposing such Votes, and vote with him against such an anomalous manner of spending the money of the nation. After having read the statements of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope), he had thought at last something like reason was coming to guide Her Majesty's Government. If he remembered right it was said that it was not so much money that was required as organization. There was plenty of money voted, and if the money voted were properly applied there could be no doubt that we should have one of the best and most efficient armies in the world, and he took it that it was not millions of money that were required but organization. After all these large sums had been expended in one year, it was customary for Governments to tell them the following year, or at any rate in a very short time afterwards, that the country was in an absolutely defenceless position.

Mr. Cremer

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member was not in the Committee when the distinction between the several Resolutions was pointed out. The observations he is making now would be perfectly appropriate to the 5th Resolution upon which the general discussion of questions relating to Imperial defence can be taken. His observations, therefore, have no bearing upon the particular Resolution before the Committee.

Mr. CREMER said, he thanked the hon. Gentleman for reminding him that he had wandered somewhat from the immediate subject under discussion. He was not aware that the larger sum involved in the proposal of the Government was not under consideration. He would, however, now turn to the immediate question under discussion, and that was the Vote of £850,000 for building, arming, and completing certain vessels of war for the purpose of the defence of the Australian Colonies. He had only to say in regard to that—reserving any other observations he had to make as to the larger Vote—that he opposed the grant, because he thought it was a very bad example they were setting our Colonies. He could not help contrasting the proposal now made by Her Majesty's Government with a proposal at the present moment before the United States Congress. Our own Government were preparing to arm our Colonies, in order to prevent some imaginary foe from invading them; but in the American Congress there was a much more sensible proposal under consideration, and one which had been considered and reported upon by the Foreign Relations Committee, and he thought it had a very good prospect of being accepted by the Senate and House of Representatives. The proposal was to authorize the President of the United States to appoint a Committee to consider the question of establishing a tribunal to adjudicate upon questions arising between the different autonomous Governments of the Continent of America. A sum of money was to be set apart for a Conference to consider the proposal. If Her Majesty's Government would follow the example of the Government of the United States, and make as good and serious an effort to keep the peace as they were now making for the means of breaking it, he would have been very glad to have supported them in their proposal. It was because he believed the example they were setting to other Colonies was a bad one, and one which was sure to be taken up by other Colonies; and it was because he did not wish to see the evils which existed in other parts of the globe introduced amongst our Colonies, that he thought it his duty to oppose this Resolution. The Parliament of this country ought to set a good rather than a bad example, and it was because he believed in the force of the words used by Shakespeare, that—

“The sight of means to do ill deeds Too oft make ill deeds done,” —that he should vote with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Brigg Division of Lincolnshire.

Mr. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.) said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not in the House when he (Mr. Childers) had spoken on the first Resolution, and when he had endeavoured to make a distinction between the arrangement made by this country and the Australian Colonies, and the internal arrangement between the two Departments of the Government—namely, the Treasury and the Admiralty. As to the first point, he had supported Her Majesty's Government in their Resolution; but, as to the second, he ventured to point out that it was of a very different character, and authorized a proceeding which might be very dangerous. He had admitted that with the distinct pledge of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the effect that this proposal for purchasing ships out of a loan would not be used as a precedent by the present Government, the danger would not be so great as would otherwise have been the case; but, at the same time, he must repeat to the House the statement that we had never yet borrowed money for the purpose of building ships. The only purpose for which we had borrowed money had been for the carrying out of permanent works; but for perishable things such as ships we had never followed that course, and he was bound to say—having regard to the smallness of the amount in question—that it was a great pity we should have such an example set. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had a surplus considerably larger than this amount, which went towards the remission of 1d. in the Income Tax, and it seemed to him (Mr. Childers) that even if the whole charge fell on one financial year, which he doubted, it would have been much better if this money had been expended on the shipbuilding declared to be necessary, so that it would have been taken out of the annual revenue of the country.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 92; Noes 48: Majority 44.—(Div. List, No. 112.)

(2.) Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the issue out of the Consolidated Fund of such sums, not exceeding £850,000, as may be required for building, arming, and completing the vessels mentioned in the Agreement.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the sums so issued shall be repaid to the Consolidated Fund, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament for Naval Services, by an annuity of such amount as will repay the same, with interest at three per cent per annum, within twelve years."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.) asked, whether there would be any objection to substitute 10 years for 12 years?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing) said, that the right hon. Gentleman would see at once what the objection was. The arrangement was for 10 years, and the arrangement did not come into operation until the ships were in commission, and probably two years would elapse between the passing of the Bill on which was founded these results and the commissioning of the ships.

MR. CHILDERS said, he did not think that the statement of the noble Lord coincided with that made by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, that he hoped he would be allowed to explain. The ships would take 18 or 20 months to build. They would be put in hand immediately, and there was every reason to hope that they would be completed by the end of next year, or, at all events, by the end of the next financial year.

MR. CHILDERS said, that if it was quite understood that the two arrangements ran together—that the arrangement with the Colonies and the loan were concurrent—he had nothing further to say.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, that if he and his hon. Friends did not challenge a Division upon this and the next Resolution, it would be because they had already asserted a principle by challenging a Division upon the 2nd Resolution.

Question put, and agreed to,

(3.) Resolved, That the sums so issued shall be repaid to the Consolidated Fund, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament for Naval Services, by an annuity of such amount as will repay the same, with interest at three per centum per annum, within twelve years.

(4.) Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the Treasury to raise such sums by means of terminable annuities charged on the Consolidated Fund.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is expedient to authorise the issue, out of the Consolidated Fund, of such sums not exceeding £2,600,000, as may be required for the defence of certain Ports and Coaling Stations, and making further provisions for Imperial Defence."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.) said, that no one would deny the grave and the great importance of the present Resolution. He also did not think that anyone would deny that his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) had made a most clear and most lucid statement to the House in introducing his Resolutions. His right hon. Friend put several propositions before the House. Almost the first statement that he made was that existing deficiencies must be supplied in the interest of the nation. Now, he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) desired to ask whether his right hon. Friend had taken into account all those deficiencies, as that was absolutely necessary in forming an opinion of what ought to be done? Another statement his right hon. Friend made was that Malta and Gibraltar, two fortresses of absolute necessity to this country, must be properly not only fortified, but properly garrisoned, as quickly as possible. He did not think that his right hon. Friend would deny that neither of those fortresses or stations were properly armed, and, perhaps, he might say in regard to one of them, not properly garrisoned. Those places were on our main highway, not only to India, but also to our great Colonies, and no stone must be left unturned in making them absolutely efficient for defensive purposes against whatever force might be brought against them. His right hon. Friend referred to the difficulty of getting guns, and he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) would have a word or two to say upon that point presently; but the First Lord of the Treasury said that although guns had been ordered in the year 1885 they had not yet been delivered. To that also he would refer presently. Another question which his right hon. Friend raised had regard to the new rifles, and he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) would in the course of his speech make a few observations upon that as well. But, before he went into those questions, he thought it would be right to ask his right hon. Friend exactly what he intended to do with regard to the Royal Commission which was promised to them, and in regard to which he did not quite understand how they stood. He had had a good deal of conversation with his right hon. Friend, and he was bound to say, and he said it with all sincerity, that he had received from the right hon. Gentleman the greatest courtesy and the greatest consideration in regard to all the statements which he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had had to make upon this question. It would be in the recollection of the House that, on the 5th of March, the question raised was that there should be appointed a Royal Commission to inquire into and to report upon the question, whether the Army and Navy were, in fact, in such a condition as to be absolutely efficient for the protection of the Empire? That, no doubt, was very wide; it raised a great question, because it raised what should be the number of men that we ought to have, whether we had got that number, whether our Army was, in fact, efficient and sufficient, and especially whether our Navy was efficient and sufficient for our protection. The Government said they could not possibly go into that question; that they were absolutely responsible for the condition of the Army and Navy; and then they proposed to give another inquiry, and that inquiry was as to what extent our present naval and military system was adapted to the national wants. He and his hon. and gallant Friends accepted that in all good faith; it was given in good faith, and they accepted it in good faith. On a subsequent occasion the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) was appointed Chairman of the Royal Commission; and there was no one in the House who would contradict him (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) when he said that there was no man in the country they would rather see at the head of a Royal Commission than the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale. But he thought he should not be committing any breach of confidence—for the noble Marquess told him so himself—when he said that the noble Marquess thought that even the inquiry which had been promised was too wide, and one into which he did not think he would like himself to go. It was, therefore, arranged that an inquiry of a less wide nature should be granted, and that it should be an inquiry into the civil and professional administration of the Naval and Military Departments, and the relation of those Departments to each other and to the Treasury, and that a Report should be made as to what changes in the existing system would tend to the efficiency and economy of the Public Service. Now, what he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) wanted to ask was, first of all, whether the Commission and the two Committees which were now sitting on the Army and Navy Estimates would not extract all the information that the proposed Royal Commission would extract? He put that strongly to his right hon. Friend, who, this evening, had gone the length of stating that he would be prepared to grant another Royal Commission or a Committee which should have the effect of carrying out the views he expressed so strongly in the House so short a time ago. The right hon. Gentleman indicated the proposal he would make to the House, upon the condition that he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) withdrew the Resolution which he had then proposed. Suppose his right hon. Friend carried out the proposal he made, what did it involve? In the first place, everyone would admit—no one would admit it more readily than his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope)—that organization was the one thing which we required, and that in regard to certain affairs we had not got organization. He would not go into the question from a naval point of view, because around him were naval officers who would state exactly the case of the Navy; but the Navy was our first line of defence, and it, as he was told, required organization just as much as the Army did. He left the Navy to be dealt with by his naval Friends who would follow him, simply asserting that if there was one thing that the country would vote money for, it was that our Navy should be more effective and more efficient than any combination of Navies which could possibly be brought against it. Now, were we to have any difference made between the Home Army and the Army in India; was the Army in India to be enlisted for a longer time, and was it in future to rely on drawing the best men out of the Army at home for the purpose of filling up its ranks? The Army at home was depleted by having its men over 20 years of age, and who had been in the Service some time, taken away to fill up the ranks of the Army in India. Of course, there ought to be a wide difference in the length of service in India and the length of service at home. If we had shorter service at home, we would get a larger Reserve, and we should have more men at home to defend our interests. The next question which ought to come under the notice of the Royal Commission would be the strength of our Cavalry regiments; and was there a man who would say that our Cavalry regiments were fit to be sent abroad at a moment's notice? He did not believe they were, though he believed his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War had been doing a great deal to improve the condition of the Cavalry. Surely, that was a question which deserved their most serious attention. Next came the question of the Artillery. He would not go into the question further to-night than to say that, having listened most attentively and read most carefully afterwards the answer that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War gave to his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Wirral Division of Cheshire (Captain Cotton), he could only gather that, after the first two Army Corps had been made complete and efficient, the number of guns which would be left for the Home Force was only 56. What would be left behind? There would be something like 400,000 men, who would require to have guns found for them. Perhaps he ought not to say 400,000 men, because they knew perfectly well that many of the men, in case of great necessity, would have to go into the different fortresses in the country; we should, however, want a very large number of guns in addition to those we had at the present time. And here he might mention the Magazine rifle, absolutely necessary at the present moment. In what position were we with regard to it? After all the Committees and experiments, no rifle was yet approved. The next question which arose, and which his right hon. Friend said it would be perfectly competent for the Royal Commission to inquire into, was the question of the Militia. Could anything be more important than to inquire into the condition of the Militia, from which we now got 30,000 men in the Reserve? If, however, the Militia was recruited to its full strength, and the conditions of service somewhat altered, we might get the whole of the Militia willing to volunteer. If we paid the Militia £1 extra per annum per man—the same as the Militia Reserve—he had no doubt that we should find the whole of the men would be prepared to serve in any part of the world, and they would be organized in reality, and not in name, as the 3rd and 4th Battalions of the Line Regiments to which they belong. Then let them take the case of the Volunteers. Surely, we ought to make the organization of the Volunteers in every way effective and efficient, because we should have to depend in case of need—God grant that it might never occur—very largely indeed upon the Volunteers of the country. Then there was the question of the Reserve Force. Were we going to call our Reserve Force out every year to see what we had got? Surely, there was no nation in the world but the English nation who slept and believed they could get men out whenever they wanted them, without even knowing where they were, or whether they were or were not fit to do duty. That was another question which the Royal Commission might inquire into. A further question was, and it was a great question—namely, that of the garrisons for the Coaling Stations. His right hon. Friend spoke of that to-night as a question which might be inquired into by the Royal Commission in the same way as the other questions which he had specified. But, turning to the next point, the illustrious Duke at the head of the Army had said distinctly that 11,900 more men were wanted. It had been said over and over again since short service had come in, that we wanted an increase of men in our Army. What we wanted was that men should never go into the ranks who had not been one year in the Service, and if we had an extra number of recruits we should always be able to fill up the ranks with men who had been a year in the Service. But there was still another point deserving of attention. [Opposition ironical cheers.] Yes; hon. Gentlemen might think that these were questions for which they should have no care; but they might find some-day or other that they would require to have a great deal of care for these things, and if we were ever found unprepared in case of necessity, the very Gentlemen who now sneered would be the first to cry out against the Government, whichever Government might be in Office, for having neglected its duty. He was about to say that there was one thing he was very much struck with, arising out of the inquiries made by the Committee sitting upon the Army Estimates, and it had reference to the barracks. The estimate for the repair of barracks was nearly £1,000,000.

Sir Walter B. Bartlett

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I rise to Order. The evidence given before that Committee is not at present before the House, and it cannot be quoted with the least approach to accuracy from what has appeared in the newspapers. The evidence is at present before the Committee, and not before the House of Commons.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he would say nothing more upon that point; but he was very glad that he had called the right hon. Gentleman's attention to it, because his right hon. Friend might make a statement with regard to the reports which had gone the round of all the newspapers. If those statements were inaccurate, they ought to be contradicted; because they were statements so startling that he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) could hardly have believed it possible they could have been made, unless they were true and correct. [Opposition ironical cheers.] Some hon. Gentlemen opposite tried very hard to make this a Party question, but it was a non-Party question, and he hoped that the question of the defences which were absolutely necessary for the safety of the Empire would never be made a Party question. Now, he was exceedingly surprised to read the statement of Lord Brassey with regard to guns. Lord Brassey distinctly stated that we had not thought it right to employ our large manufacturers of guns at home, but that we had allowed France to precede us; for he said, speaking of Messrs. Whitworth, that they had a contract to make guns for France, and that, therefore, we were unable to get any guns from that firm.

MR. E. STANHOPE: Allow me at once to offer the same explanation that I offered to this House yesterday, through my hon. Friend the Member for Wigtonshire (Sir Herbert E. Maxwell). When that statement was made by Lord Brassey, I made inquiry personally of Messrs. Whitworth, and they assured me that they were making no guns whatever for the French Government, and that they had no intention or anticipation of doing so.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he was very glad to hear that; but the noble Lord (Lord Brassey) wrote emphatically that he had made himself acquainted with the fact, and he gave full particulars which were printed in the newspapers. He (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) should regard it as a most extraordinary thing—indeed, as a most intolerable thing—if he were to make a statement in writing in the newspapers without one word of foundation for it. Lord Brassey was a man of high position, and a man who had been in Office. The only thing which struck him (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) as very odd was that while Lord Brassey was in Office they never heard one word from him in regard to these questions; but since he had been out of Office, since he had had nothing to do with the Government, they found repeated notices not only of the coaling stations, but also of the guns and other matters by the noble Lord. His right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War must not be too sensitive upon these things. He could get up and contradict them, and, if he did, they would be quite ready to believe his contradiction. Certainly, his right hon. Friend ought to thank him for placing this question before him, and thus giving him an opportunity which he would not have otherwise been given of contradicting statements which, as his right hon. Friend had said, were absolutely without foundation. Surely, there was nothing more important to the country than that it should have a proper supply of guns. There had been many statements made in the newspapers in regard to the supply of guns, and they were told that from Portland Bill up to the Tweed there was not a gun of new pattern in any one of our ports at the present time. They were also told that there was only one gun in Gibraltar that could cope with the iron-clads of the present day. These were questions which ought to be considered, and what he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) and his hon. Friends were asking was that there should be placed on record the number of guns we absolutely required, and that the supply should be kept up so that all our ports could be properly armed, and all our ships properly supplied with the guns requisite for them. But there was another question connected with the guns, and that was the question of the condition of the Royal Artillery. If there was one matter of importance in the present days of fighting, it was that our Artillery should be armed with the very best guns which could be found. He knew the Secretary of State for War was doing all he could to arm the batteries of Artillery with the best and newest guns; but how many of these batteries were still armed with the old weapons which had been declared by competent authorities to be the very worst weapons with which any Artillery in Europe were armed? It was impossible that we could be prepared for war, unless we had a sufficient number of the very best guns, and a sufficient number of artillerymen understanding those guns to work them. No doubt our men would fight well—our Volunteers would fight well—but he had endeavoured to point out that it was the organization which it was so absolutely necessary and essential should be perfect. Unless it was perfect, we should be able to do nothing whatever, and it was because the Royal Commission which he thought they were to have was to inquire carefully into the organization both of the Army and of the Navy that he was so anxious that the Royal Commission should be appointed. He could not refrain for one moment from going into one or two other questions with regard to statements which had been made. He said nothing about what had occurred in "another place," but would take the statements which had appeared in the newspapers, and he recollected that the illustrious Duke had made a statement with regard to our present defences—not very different in its details from that made both in "another place" last night, as well as at a celebrated dinner, by the noble and gallant Viscount (Viscount Wolseley). His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Birkenhead (General Sir Edward Hamley), than whom no one was better able to describe the condition of affairs, and who had done so much good not only in the House, but out of it, and had written so ably on the defence of London, had made similar statements; and, besides that of his noble and gallant Friend the Member for Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford) with regard to the Navy, they had the declarations of the hon. and gallant Admiral (Sir John Commerell), whom they all congratulated on his appointment, and of Sir Geoffrey Hornby. He knew the Government did not repudiate these statements, and that they felt there was a great deal of force in what had been said; and he admitted that they were striving to the full to carry out, as best they might, the views which had been expressed. But there was still something more to be done. If they had such a man as the noble Marquess at the head of the Royal Commission; if his right hon. Friend would extend the Commission and its inquiry as far as they were anxious to see it extended—namely, to ascertain what was required both for the Army and Navy, and to enable this to be known by the House and the country, the Government might feel certain that they would be backed up by the people in carrying out those proposals which were essential to their welfare. He thought no one would deny that the first duty of a State was self-preservation; and notwithstanding what had been said about non-interference with the affairs of others, he asked what would be their position as a nation if they ceased to hold their place amongst other powers? If, when they were prepared to speak, they were not prepared to act, what would be their position amongst those nations who knew exactly how they stood with regard to armaments? Hem aintained that there was man in that House who would get up and declare that for the want of sufficient armament he was willing that the country should decline from the high position which it now held in this 19th century amongst the nations of the world.

Sir Walter B. Barttelot

MR. E. STANHOPE: There have been so many questions raised in the speech of my hon. and gallant Friend who has just spoken that I think it desirable that I should offer a few observations in reply before the debate goes any further. In the first place, with regard to the Royal Commission, I think that anybody who has listened to the speech of my hon. and gallant Friend will have observed the enormous number of questions which he desires to see decided by that Commission. The scope of the inquiry which he desires would be absolutely enormous—the period of inquiry would extend over years. I venture to say that we should have no Report of any sensible value, until, at any rate, one or two years had passed over our heads. The object of the Government is not to have Blue Books and hold exhaustive inquiries, but to take action, and our belief is that the best means of attaining that object is to split up the subjects of inquiry. We have told the House in the course of the debate on the Army Estimates the subjects which we think are proper for inquiry. We thoroughly adhere to—we do not withdraw from—that statement; but when we came to examine the details of the proposals as to what should be the Reference to the Royal Commission we found it would be impossible to ask the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) to undertake such an inquiry. If we wish to obtain useful results, the inquiry over which the noble Marquess is to preside must be so limited that he will be able to exhaust it, and present a Report before many months are over which will be of real value to us in the position in which we are placed. The noble Marquess has kindly undertaken that inquiry; we believe it will produce valuable results, and we think it would be most ill-advised on the part of the Government if we were to attempt to place additional work upon it which would prevent the noble Marquess discharging the duty which he has undertaken. But we do not shrink from inquiring into the remainder of the subject, and, after carefully considering the best method of procedure, we came to the conclusion that it is not by taking volumes of evidence that we can arrive shortly at a determination on the great subjects which are of such enormous importance to the future interests of the country. We shall, therefore, proceed with all the speed possible under the circumstances, determined to take a full view of all the important questions relating to the Empire as a whole, and determined also that any action we may take shall be based on full consideration of all the facts of the case. I now pass from that subject to the basis of my hon. and gallant Friend's speech. He complains of certain deficiencies that he says ought to be supplied. I should like to be allowed, in a spirit of explanation, not of controversy, to follow him into each of the complaints he has made. My hon. and gallant Friend, in the first place, complained of the want of organization. So far from differing from him, I have most publicly stated that organization, and not the expenditure of enormous sums of money, was the remedy we had to seek. We are undertaking that organization with the fullest determination to carry it out. I hope I am not saying anything too favourable of my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury or of myself when I say that, during the time that this Government has held Office, we have applied ourselves to the question of organization without delay and without cessation. We have in that time done a good deal, and laid the basis for a good deal more, and I am strongly impressed with the belief that the new system of administration which we have introduced at the War Office is a step which will enable us to carry out our intention with the least possible delay. I am sure the Committee will not wish me to follow this matter into further details at the present moment; but I shall be very glad to explain in detail how I think our plan will be worked out, if an opportunity is given me hereafter. I pass, then, from this subject to that of the state of our defences, which my hon. and gallant Friend says is one which demands inquiry. We are perfectly well aware of the state of our defences, and I have told the country as plainly as I possibly can in the Memorandum, only excluding those details which my Military Advisers think ought not to be communicated, that the state of our defences is eminently unsatisfactory. I have told in general terms what is the nature of the improvements required in those defences; and we have asked Parliament to give us this large sum of money, amounting to £3,500,000, for the purpose of meeting the most urgent of our deficiencies. First of all, we have dealt with our Colonial stations. We do not want to lie under the reproach, which no honourable Government could endure, that we have made a bargain with the Colonies and not carried it out. We have come, at the earliest possible moment, to Parliament and said—"Give us the money necessary for completing our part of the bargain." And here I may state that every one of the guns necessary to complete that bargain is in hand, and not only that, but the greater part of them are very far advanced. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford) will be glad to hear that although the defence of Table Bay—probably the most important in the whole of the defences we have undertaken—was only undertaken last year, yet I am going to send out in the next few weeks the first big gun for the works at Table Bay, which I hope will be ready for its reception; and so we shall go on, with the expectation that as the works are ready for the guns the guns will be ready for the works. As regards Malta and Gibraltar, there, again, is a case which demands no further inquiry. We know perfectly well that the defences at those places are not of a satisfactory character, and in the Bill now before Parliament we have taken a very large sum for adding to the defences of those stations. I am not quite sure of the exact sum, but I am aware that it is considerably more than £300,000 that we are going to expend on improving the defences of Gibraltar and Malta. And so with all the other military ports at home and abroad. Every gun that is contemplated in the Report of the Committee, over which I had the honour to preside, has already been ordered; and although my right hon. Friend told the Committee that he would not be justified in saying that all that work can be completed very much before the period we have ventured to fix, I myself feel somewhat more sanguine, every effort having been made during the last two months to expedite the completion of the guns. We have been somewhat successful in our endeavours, and at the end of the year we trust we shall be able to place in position the lighter guns necessary for the defence of our ports; but the completion of the larger guns of 10 and 12 inches must, as everyone knows, take a longer time. I can, however, assure the Committee that nothing will be omitted on our part to secure their early completion. We have put a large part of what we propose to do on the Estimates, and I hope we shall be able to keep the pledges given in my Memorandum; but if the Estimates for the year should not be sufficient for the ammunition required for the guns, we must ask the House for a Supplementary Estimate to enable the guns to be supplied with it. With regard to our mercantile ports, these stand in a different position, and we have in their case to provide against different kinds of danger; but we are pushing forward all the defences. We have ordered all the light armaments; and I hope before many months have passed to be able to say that the submarine defences are complete and in good order, and that the light armament is on its way to the ports. My hon. and gallant Friend has asked that inquiry should take place into the matter of the garrisons at coaling stations. But there, again, we have had the most careful inquiry, and I am sure that the House will understand that the Government has done a good deal towards making the garrisons effective. We have added all the Garrison Artillery necessary for the defence of our ports at home and abroad; we have added a force of Engineers, and increased the Estimates by a sum for Submarine Miners necessary at the coaling stations. It is, therefore, impossible to say that we have not paid considerable attention to the question of the garrisoning of our coaling stations and ports abroad, although, as I stated to the deputation that waited on me, when the defences of certain coaling stations approach completion some moderate additions to the Infantry garrisons will be absolutely necessary. And this is most essential, because we ask, in the Bill about to be presented, for powers to complete the barracks at the coaling stations at which the troops are to be placed. I do not want to deal with the evidence that is being taken by the Committee upstairs. I do not dispute that it is exceedingly probable that very great improvements might take place in the barrack accommodation of the country; but is it contended for a moment that it is possible for the Government or for Parliament to do everything that is needful in a single year, or that when a Secretary of State is brought face to face with an enormous question of national defence it is to be said that he must at once make provision for every need in the shape of barrack accommodation in every part of the world? Is he not rather to be trusted when he says that the matter can wait, but that the armament of the coaling stations cannot be allowed to remain over? Now, as to the question of guns, there, again, I thought I had explained to the House that we had taken all the steps we can to remedy what I fully admit to be a grievous state of things—namely, the delay in the supply of the necessary guns. We hope we have reached thoroughly the causes of that delay, and that we have remedied it. My hon. and gallant Friend also dwelt upon this subject, and I may say here, as I am responsible with regard to guns not only for the Land Service, but also for the Naval Service, that we have not only ordered the guns which are necessary for the Naval Service, but have taken every step we possibly can to expedite their production, and we believe we have reason for the statement that instances of ships waiting for their guns will not occur in future. First of all, we determined to lay down the principle that the guns for the ships and the Army shall be absolutely, so far as is possible, interchangeable; we intend, further, to consider that the Navy has the first claim upon us; and we have laid down the principle that if guns are short in number and are required by the Navy, the Navy shall have them, and the Army shall give way. Then I come to the question of lighter guns. My hon. and gallant Friend spoke in very strong terms indeed upon this subject; but I think if he will look at my Memorandum on the Army Estimates, and which I am afraid I made a mistake in circulating, for it does not appear to have been read, he will see that in the Estimates of the year we provide for 12-pounder guns for two Army Corps batteries. We intend to push on that work, and to complete the armament for the whole Field Artillery. But when my hon. and gallant Friend says that the guns they now have are inferior, I beg to say, upon the authority of my most skilful advisers, that he is entirely mistaken, and that a great portion of the Field Artillery is armed with a gun which, although inferior to the 12-pounder, is, nevertheless, a better one than any Army on the Continent possesses. As regards the strength of the Royal Artillery, the Government, in the course they have taken, have acted solely and entirely upon military advice. If the Committee will allow me to say so in these terms, I decline altogether to accept responsibility in reference to matters which are of a purely military nature—I decline to accept responsibility, for instance, for the proportion which either arm of the Service shall bear to the other. That is a question for Military Advisers, and a Secretary of State would be mad if he were to deal with them without reference to those Military Advisers. The Artillery Force asked for, then, is one which has been recommended to the Secretary of State by the best military advice, and I hope and believe that, in addition to the Force of Artillery which we now possess, we shall be able before long to put into the field a number of batteries of Volunteer Artillery—not necessarily to move about as the Regular Artillery can, but able to take up the position assigned to them if they should be called out. Looking on the capacity of the Royal Artillery for home defence, I can say that, acting as any foreign Government must—strengthening the cadres of our Artillery by calling out the Reserve and getting the horses necessary—we have, at the present time, Artillery not only for two Army Corps, but for a third Army Corps, and behind this we should have the Volunteer Artillery, which, if a little time were given them, would prove exceedingly useful. I trust the Committee will forgive me for entering at greater length than I intended into this subject; but the speech of my hon. and gallant Friend has rendered a somewhat detailed reply on my part necessary. I feel very deeply the responsibility of the position in which I am placed. It is only after the most careful consideration of the evidence placed before us, that we have laid before the country the programme contained in the Bill before the Committee, which, I believe, will advance the best interests and add enormously to the safety of the Empire. I do not, for a moment, expect that the term of our official life will enable us to see the fulfilment of the whole of the programme now initiated; but it is proposed by the Government, on my initiative, with a firm belief that what we are doing is necessary for the best interests of the country.

Mr. E. Stanhope

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.) said, he desired to preface the observations which he had to address to the Committee by expressing to the First Lord of the Treasury his thanks for the clearness of his statement, which had been ably supplemented by that of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. Nothing was further from his intention, nor from the intention of those on either side of the House with whom he had the honour of acting in asking for further inquiry, than to interfere with the responsibility of the Government in their measures for the defence of the country. They had no desire to weaken that responsibility, or to share it; their only desire was to accentuate, and, if possible, to make it clearer—to bring it home not only to the mind of Her Majesty's Government, but to the mind of every elector in the country. He might be permitted to say that, so far from desiring in any way unfairly to criticize the proposals of the Secretary of State for War, he admitted that since the reforms initiated by Lord Cardwell in 1871, some of which were of very questionable utility, no measures had been more valuable than those initiated by the right hon. Gentleman during the short time he had been in Office. If the right hon. Gentleman thought that it was his (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan's) desire, or the desire of those who asked for further inquiry, to delay the work in hand, he was justified in saying that they had no such intention, and that they had every wish to strengthen his hands, with the firm hope that his term of Office might be fruitful of great and beneficial changes in the administration of the Service. When he had the honour of addressing the House on the 8th of March last, he and his hon. Friends had asked simply that certain inquiries might be made as to whether the military and naval resources then at the disposal of the country were sufficient for its requirements, and whether they required to be supplemented in any degree, and if so to what degree, and from what source. That inquiry, to their great regret, was narrowed by the First Lord of the Treasury to the inquiry which they understood was to be presided over by the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale. There was no man in the House in whom the country had greater confidence than in the noble Marquess; but the inquiry which had been granted had resolved itself into an inquiry into administration—as between one Department and another. They had had many inquiries of that nature during the last 40 years, which had resulted in nothing at all. It was because they were now brought face to face with a crisis which the military resources of the country were unable to meet that they desired to have an inquiry which should extend over as few weeks as possible, which he believed might be finished in six weeks from the present time, reported in eight weeks, and upon which Report the Government might take action before the end of the Session. If he might be allowed to detain the House one or two minutes longer, he would point out that there were only three or four military contingencies to which this country was exposed. Providence had provided us with a wet ditch all round us, and we had a very good Fleet. He might say that he had observed with some regret, during the time the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) was speaking, the flippant way in which his remarks were received by hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Opposition side of the House—hon. Gentlemen who, in the event of any serious emergency arising, would be the first to cry out that the defences of the country had been neglected. It was of the utmost importance, having regard to our insular position, that our Navy should be kept in a thorough state of efficiency. The electors of this country were marvellously ignorant on the subject of naval and military reform and efficiency—the subject being naturally uncongenial

Mr. E. Stanhope

to minds which had not been obliged to deal with it — and he had often wondered whether they ever contemplated the position we should be in, drawing, as we did, half our food supplies from abroad, if we lost command of the sea for even a week. If we lost command of the sea for a week it would be one or perhaps two years before we could regain it, because we should not lose it without some serious disaster to our Navy. During the time we were regaining our supremacy he wondered what would be the condition of our people? Speaking as a distressed agriculturist, he could say that wheat was now 28s. a-quarter. Well, it would go up at once to 80s. or 100s., and no doubt the electors would then think that that was a rather high price to pay for a paltry and petty economy, and an enormous penalty for present want of courage in voting necessary strength to our Navy. The right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary of State for War and the noble Lord the present First Lord of the Admiralty had done their best; but he maintained that if any great improvement was to be effected in our naval and military position it must be by making a totally new departure and taking the electors of the country into their entire confidence. That was a thing he declared recent Administrations had not done. Numerous Reports had been presented by Royal Commissions and Committees, but nobody ever read them; and numerous Blue Books had been circulated with the same result. The popular mind was still impressed with the belief that naval and military experts were only engaged in pushing their own individual interests. With regard to the inquiry which military men had expected, but as to which they had been disappointed, he must say he was glad the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington) had refused to increase its scope, seeing that they now had of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that inquiry to be made would be of great scope, and would be presented to the Prime Minister — who, he remembered, was also First Lord of the Admiralty — himself. The inquiry committed to better hands, considering the condition of our defences was so the question of foreign policy that it was impossible to separate the one from the other. If there was anything in which we had shown a want of moral courage, it was in not facing what the possibilities of our foreign policy might be — like the ostrich, which hid its head in the sand, and had the idea that its other and more ignoble parts were likewise concealed from view. He had heard the Prime Minister declare not long ago that it would be insane to proclaim to other countries what our real necessities were. But did the Government think that they were deceiving foreign nations? They might throw dust in the eyes of their own people; they need not think that they were throwing dust in the eyes of foreign nations. There was scarcely a capital in Europe in which you might not buy for an expenditure of 5s. a more accurate description of our military and naval wants and deficiencies than were at the disposal of any hon. Member of that House. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was aware that in the Library of the House, month by month, there were placed confidential Returns as to the condition of the Army. Those Papers were at the disposal of every hon. Member of the House. If anyone wanted to see the confidential Reports about the British Army, or wished to write a treatise about our military and naval resources, he had only to go into the Library of the House and satisfy himself upon all the details as to the disposition of every man, gun, and horse available for the defence of the country both at home and abroad. Within the past month there had been a Blue Book published giving full details as to the strength and character of our forces in India, and as to our military administration of that country, and all the information circulated in this way was in the possession of every European Power. We admitted foreigners into our arsenals, our ship-building yards, and into our Government had so long wished for—and which it was so satisfactory to hear was to be now presided over by the noble Marquess at the head of Foreign Affairs—need not last longer than six weeks; and in two months Her Majesty's Government might be in possession of full facts, and in a position to come to the House and ask for the Supplies which they wanted. We had to prepare ourselves against but three contingencies—the invasion of this country by a Foreign Power—against which the splendid force of Volunteers which we possessed, together with the Militia and the Regular Army at home, rendered us tolerably secure—the invasion of India—or a war in the East of Europe, which might involve the necessity of sending two or three Army Corps abroad. Had we not the courage of our opinions? It was a mere absurdity and sentimentality to talk as if these things were not possible. It was quite possible that within 15 or 18 months one of these contingencies might happen, and it was not wise, for the sake of false sentiment, to hide from the people of the country, who could give the Government power to act, facts which were as well known to every Foreign Power as everything connected with our organization had for years been known to them. He was exceedingly glad to hear that Her Majesty's Government had changed their mind with regard to this inquiry, and that they had increased the scope of it. Let him ask them humbly but earnestly to stick to these three points indicated just now. He would ask them to appoint a Commission with the noble Marquess at the head of the Government as Chief—who should be supported by three experts from the Army and three from the Navy—say, His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, Lord Wolseley, and Sir Donald Stewart (for the Indian Service), as representing the Army, and Sir Geoffrey Hornby and two other Admirals—of whom there were plenty in that House—as representing the Navy. Let the Government consult those authorities, and put before them the three contingencies he had mentioned, and let them ask those Gentlemen what would be our condition to cope with each contingency, and to say frankly what provision should be made in the shape of guns, stores, and men under either of those circumstances. He would undertake to say that within two months the Commission would have presented its Report, and the Government would be in a position to act upon it. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had told the House something about our guns, great and small, but he had said nothing about our small arms, and he (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan) had noticed the omission with great regret. What were the facts with regard to the adoption of the Magazine rifle by the Armies of Europe? Why, the German Army, numbering 16 corps, was supplied with a Magazine rifle, containing eight rounds in its stock, for every one of 600,000 men. It was true that Germany was seeking for a better weapon; but, at the same time, they were now in possession of a Magazine rifle possessing the fullest requirements of a serviceable weapon in war. France had three corps of 120,000 men armed with the Magazine rifle; Austria had 200,000 men; and Russia, with a detachable Magazine gun, had 300,000 men so armed; whilst the British Army absolutely possessed not a single Magazine rifle in use. Three hundred and fifty of these rifles had been manufactured for the purposes of experiment only. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had stated, in introducing his Army Estimates, that he hoped by the end of the year to have 80,000 of the new rifles manufactured; but in answer to a Question put by himself (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan) the right hon. Gentleman admitted that there was not one of these guns yet manufactured, except 350, as he had said, for experimental purposes, and that even the pattern was not yet decided. He imagined that it would be fortunate if by the end of the year we had as many as 20,000 of these weapons in the hands of our soldiers. With regard to field guns, our supply in India was totally inadequate. Only three weeks ago he had asked what field guns there were in India, and he was told—

MR. E. STANHOPE (interrupting) said, that the Question was answered by the Under Secretary of State for India, and not by himself.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN said, that the right hon. Gentleman was the person who did—or, rather, did not—supply the guns to the Indian Army.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that if the Indian Government gave orders for guns they might be manufactured in our arsenals, but that he had no responsibility in regard to ordering them.

Sir Henry Havelock-Allan

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN said, that with regard to Field Artillery at home, it was a fact that there were not three complete batteries in the country of the 13-pounder gun, or of the 12-pounder gun, of which they had heard so much. It was said that a number of batteries were to be armed with the 16-pounder guns; but it would take some time to do that, the bulk of the 13 and 12-pounder guns not having yet been served out. He (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan) was very much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War for the courtesy and completeness with which he had answered him; but if the facts revealed were satisfactory to the electors of the country it would be a matter of great surprise. He wished to give the right hon. Gentleman the greatest credit for what he had done; but he desired to point out that while we were deliberating how best to lock the stable door the steed might be stolen. The Government were making preparations to complete the armaments of the country and of its foreign Dependencies in the course of two and a-half years or three years; but could they guarantee that these men and guns would not be wanted in 15 months from the present time? He, at all events, should be sorry to make any definite promise upon that point. He would claim for military Members of the House of Commons that they were only endeavouring—and they probably succeeded only more or less indifferently—to discharge their duty to the country in a conscientious way in pressing these matters upon the attention of the Government. In the last resort it would not be a question of the expenditure of thousands or even of millions of pounds, but when an emergency of war arose they would have to spend money like water. They might also have to spend something far dearer—the lives of brave men wantonly and foolishly thrown away. The military critics wished, therefore, to fix responsibility upon the Government, and not to share it themselves. They had done their duty when they had brought the deficiencies of the Services publicly before the notice of the country. He had received with great pleasure and gratitude the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman opposite that the Government intended to take action in this matter shortly, and that the inquiry, so long promised and so earnestly asked for, was now actually to take place. He would urge upon the Government not to lose a single moment in carrying their intentions into effect. In any case, if emergency arose, it would not be the military Members of the House who would have failed in their duty, nor would they share in the responsibility if disaster occurred. They knew that British soldiers would, as they had ever done in the past, stand in the field and die at their post; and he repeated that if any emergency arose, and if disaster came, he, along with other military Members of the House, would have the satisfaction of knowing that they, at all events, had delivered their souls, and that not on them, but on Her Majesty's Government, would rest the sole responsibility—he hoped he might not have to say the crime.

SIR EDWARD HAMLEY (Birkenhead) said, he wished to express his satisfaction—satisfaction which was now felt generally throughout the country—that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) had seen his way to ask for a loan which was to be especially devoted to the national defences. He was so well satisfied that he could not even suggest any way by which it could have been disposed of better than as the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) had proposed. He hoped that this was an instalment only, and that when the right hon. Gentleman who guarded the public purse had taken his first plunge in these unaccustomed waters he would be less chary of repeating it, and would even grow fond of the exercise, and go on plunging again and again, amid the plaudits of delighted taxpayers. He would endeavour, in a few sentences, to show how far the requirements of defence rendered this measure necessary. He had been always ready to avow that, when the national defences were in question, the Navy must hold the first place. He would go a great deal further than that, and say that, considering the geographical conditions of the Kingdom and the Empire—the Kingdom in the midst of the sea, and the Empire composed of Dependencies which we could only reach by the highways of the ocean—considering, too, that every sea was covered with our merchantmen, and that they brought us, not only the general prosperity that flowed from commerce, but the very food on which we depended for existence, so that the interruption of these lines meant national starvation—under these peculiar circumstances, he maintained, it would be a wise thing to make maritime supremacy the very basis of our policy; to encourage by legislation, and in every other way, all whose business was on the waters that surrounded us; to foster the growth of a seafaring population; to rear and train ample supplies of seamen for our Merchant Navy and our Fleet; and to render that Fleet adequate beyond all doubt for all its purposes. That was to say, the Fleet should have sufficient line of battle ships to dominate the Home waters after detaching the necessary Squadrons, sufficient swift cruisers to protect our trade lines, and sufficient floating defences of other kinds to place our commercial ports, our coal-ing stations, and our Colonial harbours in security. And it might, perhaps, be permissible to think that such a policy, founded on our national conditions, would be an eminently national policy not less worthy of the people, not less suited to our circumstances, than that other policy that now guided us, which it was almost sacrilege to touch. It might be said, and had been said, not without show of reason, that if our defences by sea were thus complete we needed no defences by land. But he would endeavour to show that we should still need them. For ships were, by their nature, precarious defences. They were peculiarly liable to unforeseen disaster. He spoke with extreme deference of such matters; but, perhaps, naval officers would agree with him that naval tactics were still very much in the clouds; that with ships and guns of which they knew the qualities rather by computation—he might almost say by guess—than by proof, and that with the new element of the torpedo entering into the problem as an unknown quantity, there must be great uncertainty as to the naval actions of the future. It was to be noted, too, that in the days of our most undisputed supremacy on the ocean naval strategy demanded that our Fleet should seek its enemies in distant waters; and only some strokes of good fortune prevented that concentration of foreign fleets in the Channel, which was all that Napoleon was waiting for to cross with his army. Here was a case where efficient land defences would have rendered the project of a would-be invader vain, and where, consequently, our Admirals would have been free to act with a light heart on any point where they could best protect the country by seeking out and destroying the enemy. He thought that naval Members might agree that it would double the value of the Fleet to have its action thus left free. Again, supposing the temporary absence of the Fleet, it might be well worth the risk of an enemy's force to make a dash on London, careless of its communications, if it could reach its object; but it would be quite a different thing to find, on landing, that it was confronted with a strong defensive line, while the Fleet might return and cut off its retreat by sea. If a considerable augmentation of the Fleet were necessary to raise it to a proper strength, time would be required to build the ships and train the seamen; whereas our Land Forces were already in existence, and only wanted the finishing touches. Therefore, he hailed with satisfaction the recent declaration of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War of his projects for our defence by land. He (Mr. Stanhope) had announced, in terms that must give general satisfaction, that plans were in progress for facilitating defensive operations, and for so organizing our forces as to supply us with an Army for the defence of England, and other troops for the defence of London. These plans and organizations were indispensable as preliminaries, and they were what everybody could conscientiously approve, since they were attended by no expense. But it was with regard to these matters that he would once more point out how a certain expenditure was indispensable in other directions. We had an immense body of defenders in the Volunteers, but they were still, in great measure, without field equipment. This national Army now represented the progressive growth of a whole generation. It was full of the most earnest spirit, but it had been doomed to inefficiency by being left incomplete. It was as if after money and skill had reared some splendid building a sudden access of thrift had left it without a roof. This was not economy—it must be called by some other name. He should, therefore, be well content to see steps taken at once for the equipment of the National Forces. And along with this there was another item entailing expenditure—namely, the supply of arms—both rifles and guns. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had most judiciously arranged for the immediate issue to the Volunteers of all the guns, suitable for positions in the field, which we now possessed. But these were old and short of the present mark of efficiency, and not only should the Volunteers as soon as possible receive a new and better class of such guns, but a certain proportion should be also supplied to our Field Army in aid of the lighter Field Artillery. It was of the nature of modern tactics that the attack of Infantry in a battle should be preceded by a duel of Artillery; the assailant endeavoured to overpower the defender's Artillery in order that his troops might not be fatally devastated by it in their advance. Therefore, as an Army operating in its own country could make use of heavier Artillery than one which crossed the sea to attack it, and which, by the nature of the case, would only be accompanied by more portable Field Batteries, it was to be hoped that we might always overpower the assailant's guns, who might thus be unable to launch his Infantry to the attack at all, except under desperate conditions, and a possible inferiority of force on our part might thus receive an immense compensation. Consequently, besides the superior field gun now in preparation, we should want an adequate supply of guns of position, and, further, of effective guns for our coast batteries. He said nothing of ships' guns, a question that was best left to naval Members of the House. He had also been glad to learn that the great Armstrong firm was prepared, on due notice, to turn out guns of all the kinds needed at the most rapid rate practicable. He had often mentioned before these items of necessary expenditure; but he did so again because the ears of the people were opening, and also because he would endeavour to accustomize, so to speak, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) to these new atmospheric conditions which he might have to live in. There was one other point he would touch on, because it had excited some interest of late—he meant the expected Royal Commission. The original proposal, as embodied in the Resolution of the hon. and gallant Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), was that the Commission should inquire into the strength of the Forces by sea and land and the amount of war material necessary for the public security throughout the Empire. He did not profess himself an ardent admirer of Royal Commissions—they sometimes spent much time to small purpose, and accumulated evidence which few read and fewer profited by; but this one would have had a distinct purpose. It would have been of great value both to the Ministers concerned by providing them with a standard of efficiency to which they could at all times refer, and to the nation by assuring it that, so long as that standard was conformed to, it would be impossible to take the country by surprise. Now, they knew that in “another place” an opinion adverse to this inquiry had been expressed by a personage whose views all Conservatives were bound to respect; and the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) had again told them that night that though he did grant a Commission the inquiry would be one very different from what was asked for, and which some hon. Members did not see a sufficient object in pursuing. The objection was that the Government considered that in some way such a Commission would deprive Ministers of due responsibility. But he (Sir Edward Hamley) confessed he was unable to understand the difficulty thus raised. For it was not to be supposed that Ministers, individually or collectively, would take on themselves the task of prescribing what the strength of the Navy should be, what the number and organization of the troops, and the quantity of war material which were requisite for the service of the nation. They must apply to somebody of whose calculations they must assume the responsibility; and to whom could they apply with such confidence and safety as to a body of men selected by themselves, publicly appointed, and empowered to bring full inquiry to the aid of their own experience? The responsibility of accepting their recommendations must still rest, as in any case, with the Ministry, and the responsibility also of departing from the standard in case of need, either by diminishing or increasing the Forces. It had been made a strong point that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell Bannerman) supported the Government in deprecating the inquiry asked for; it was said that when politicians so opposed in general to a Conservative Ministry happened to agree with it their conclusions must be reasonable. It did not seem to occur to those who used that argument that those former Secretaries of State for War might have other reasons, besides an ardent desire to support the Government, for wishing to avert a too profound scrutiny into the administration of the War Office. But such apprehensions would be groundless. Nobody, as far as he knew, wanted to rake up the past; all they wanted was to fix a standard for the future. If he still ventured to submit that to the attention of the Government, it was from a conviction that it would be for the best interest of the Government to comply. He did not presume to offer the Government advice; he only offered his own view with deference as a military Member and a supporter who wished to see the Government as strong as possible in all ways. In venturing to urge that, and also in representing that more expenditure was still needed for the defence of the country, he was only pointing to a course which would be in unison with the popular desire. Why, it was not so long ago that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) came down to the House and, for reasons far less cogent than existed now, demanded £11,000,000, and got it for the asking. He believed, therefore, that the notion that the people of this country were unwilling to provide funds for a due purpose had been allowed exaggerated influence. Certainly, if any Government were to demand large sums, and to keep the country in the dark as to the disposal of them, it would run a risk which it could not be expected to face. But it would be a very different thing to convince the country that certain measures were necessary to its safety, and ask its sanction of them. He believed that the action of the Government, in taking a hearty lead in the present movement, would be widely approved. He should like to see its plan so completely carried out that little would be left to add; so completely that the people might repose in confidence that all had been done that could be done for the public safety. And if this would be good for the people, it would be good also for the Government that fulfilled the wish of the people.

Sir Edward Hamley

"There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune."

On that tide the Conservative Government now floated, and with it floated the destinies of England. Many popular waves were bearing it onward in its course; some raised by itself at home; the great Irish wave, setting in the new direction so bravely given to it; and now that flood of popular feeling daily swelling and surging; and if our navigators did but continue to take due advantage of those, the ship of the State would be borne into that haven where alone it could rest in security—in the heart of the country.

MR. R. W. DUFF (Banffshire) said, he would not follow the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Birkenhead (Sir Edward Hamley) into the many and interesting subjects he had raised. He desired to refer to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope). To that speech he had listened with a great deal of satisfaction, and was glad indeed to hear the plans for putting our forces in an efficient condition; but there were one or two questions he desired to ask in reference to guns. He did not for a moment question the good faith of the right hon. Gentleman; but what he did question was, the possibility of carrying out his programme in regard to the large guns. He had heard something about Supplementary Estimates, and, certainly, in regard to a large part of the naval guns, the Estimates before the House would be insufficient to supply the Navy.

MR. E. STANHOPE: None of the naval guns are among these at all.

Sir Edward Hamley

MR. R. W. DUFF said, the right hon. Gentleman told the House that in future no ships would have to wait for guns.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he was dealing generally with guns when he said the recurrence of delay would be prevented.

MR. R. W. DUFF said, the right hon. Gentleman spoke generally, but he wanted to speak specifically. The weak point in the Navy and in the national defence was the scandalous time ships were kept waiting for their guns. The noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton), when the Naval Estimates were introduced, was questioned whether a sufficient sum was set down for guns, and the answer at once was—"If we take more money we cannot spend it," and it was said more than £450,000 could not be spent on naval guns. But the noble Lord had had to admit that ships had to wait a long time for their guns, and obviously this was a great source of national weakness. If the Fleet were to be equipped as it ought to be equipped, at least 30 more heavy guns would be required. He would not have touched upon this had it not been for the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that, in future, no ships would have to wait for their guns, that they were all ordered. Could the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that, with the Estimates taken, he could provide an efficient armament for the Fleet? Why, half the Mediterranean Fleet was armed with obsolete guns. At least 30 more guns above nine inches diameter would be required. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) had expressed a decided opinion as to the arming of the Fleet, and said we ought not to rely on one or two firms, but ought to go into the open market. But, at the present moment, where could we get guns? Woolwich was utilized, and there were only the two firms of Whitworth and Armstrong; but those two firms would not be able to complete the orders as they were required. Would it not be wiser, instead of relying on these sources, to utilize the whole resources of the country? We had in the country great manufacturing power, plenty of material and great mechanical science, and there should be no difficulty in producing heavy guns. And yet we continued to rely entirely on two firms, though it took two years to produce a 110-ton gun, 18 months for a 60-ton, 15 months for a 12-ton gun, and for a 10-inch gun 13 months. It was quite impossible to rely on Woolwich, the Armstrong and the Whitworth Companies, to make up the deficiency in our naval ordnance. Considering the number of ships waiting for guns and the large additions required for fortifications, would it not be a wise policy to give large orders to other private firms? It could not be expected that firms would go to the expense of setting up a costly plant if they only received small orders. Seeing our large deficiencies in naval ordnance, and the requirements for land fortifications, there ought to be some assurance that the Government programme had some prospect of being carried out. The right hon. Gentleman, when in Opposition, said he had a strong desire to see competition in gun manufacture carried on between the Royal Factory and any one capable of producing guns. Those words were used by the First Lord of the Treasury in 1882, and now he was in Office and had the opportunity of carrying out the view he then entertained. He (Mr. Duff) was satisfied that, unless some energetic effort was made, we should continue to be in no better position than we were in regard to the Collingwood, which vessel was still waiting for her guns ordered two years ago. Other vessels were in the same condition, and there could be no more reckless waste than to have ships lying useless for want of guns. This was the weakest spot in regard to our national defence, of which the Navy was the first line. He called on the Government, while appointing all these Committees, to take some energetic steps at once, and, if necessary, bring in a Supplementary Estimate to provide for the deficiency in our naval ordnance.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, as the hon. Member had referred to the scandalous fact that some ships were waiting for their guns, he should like to make the position clear to the Committee. For every ship now building or laid down, the required number of guns had been ordered.

MR. R. W. DUFF: Ordered!

MR. E. STANHOPE: Yes; ordered for every ship building or laid down and some in addition had been ordered for reserve. But this had not always been the case. He should be sorry to pursue the historical inquiry, but he thought he would be able to show that one of the main reasons for delay in providing guns was that during one Administration ships were ordered, but guns were not ordered at the same time. He had no desire to press that inquiry at the present moment further. When the hon. Gentleman went on to say that reliance should be placed on the resources of the country, and the Government should get anybody to supply guns, of course the Government would welcome any competition in that direction, and it should be remembered that his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury was the first to give full encouragement to the trade to supply the requirements of the Service. But it must be recognized that there were very few firms in the country who could undertake to supply guns; a costly plant had to be laid down.

MR. R. W. DUFF: Yes. I said so.

MR. E. STANHOPE: But the hon. Gentleman spoke of supplying present need of ships now waiting. But what was the use of relying upon private traders, when no private firms—with the exception of the Armstrong and Whitworth Companies—had the necessary plant to execute orders? As a means of supplying present deficiencies there were no other resources. As a matter of fact, the Government were determined that every step should be taken to procure a supply of guns as quickly as they could be made, and any assistance the trade could offer would be welcomed.

MR. R. W. DUFF said, if the reference of the right hon. Gentleman was to the Administration with which he was connected, he might explain that they found so many ships in course of construction, that Lord Ripon's Board of Admiralty determined to meet their liabilities, and to lay down no more vessels requiring heavy ordnance—on the other hand, they ordered 22 guns, over nine inches, for vessels in course of construction, and reserve guns.

MR. C. H. WILSON (Hull, W.) said, it was with the greatest diffidence he interposed in a discussion mainly carried on by naval and military authorities. He had noticed that whenever questions of expenditure of this kind came before the House they were very liable to receive assent from both Front Benches, whether in Opposition or in the Cabinet. But he wished to make a protest on behalf of the mercantile community and the taxpayers of the country. There was an expenditure of over £32,000,000 a-year on Naval and Military Services, and hon. Members who had sat in the House for some time, as he had, were accustomed almost annually to hearing naval and military Members tell very much the same story. He had also lived long enough to form some judgment as to the result of the wars in which the country had been engaged. Beginning with the Crimean War, and going on through the long list of those which had occurred during his own memory, he, as a civilian, wished to ask what benefit the country had derived from any one of them? His own feeling—and he believed it was the feeling of a large majority of his countrymen—was that every one of those wars was unnecessary. They had been, he might almost say, crimes, so far as this country was concerned. In the Russian War we bombarded defenceless towns; in the Baltic we burnt a large amount of produce belonging to English merchants, and we produced a bitterness of feeling that existed at the present day.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to report Progress.

Resolutions to be reported upon Thursday.

Committee to sit again upon Thursday.

INDIA—IMMORAL PRACTICES.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY (Devon, Honiton) said, the subject to which the Motion of which he had given Notice referred was brought forward in "another place" last Session by the Bishop of Lichfield in regard to certain practices which were said to prevail in India with the sanction of the Military Authorities there. Those practices were very justly obnoxious to the moral sense of this country, and when brought to the knowledge of the public at home no Government of any sort could defend them. But the full facts were not arrived at; and as time was going on, and believing that Her Majesty's Government were thoroughly honest in their intention to thrift had left it without a roof. This was not economy—it must be called by some other name. He should, therefore, be well content to see steps taken at once for the equipment of the National Forces. And along with this there was another item entailing expenditure—namely, the supply of arms—both rifles and guns. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had most judiciously arranged for the immediate issue to the Volunteers of all the guns, suitable for positions in the field, which we now possessed. But these were old and short of the present mark of efficiency, and not only should the Volunteers as soon as possible receive a new and better class of such guns, but a certain proportion should be also supplied to our Field Army in aid of the lighter Field Artillery. It was of the nature of modern tactics that the attack of Infantry in a battle should be preceded by a duel of Artillery; the assailant endeavoured to overpower the defender's Artillery in order that his troops might not be fatally devastated by it in their advance. Therefore, as an Army operating in its own country could make use of heavier Artillery than one which crossed the sea to attack it, and which, by the nature of the case, would only be accompanied by more portable Field Batteries, it was to be hoped that we might always overpower the assailant's guns, who might thus be unable to launch his Infantry to the attack at all, except under desperate conditions, and a possible inferiority of force on our part might thus receive an immense compensation. Consequently, besides the superior field gun now in preparation, we should want an adequate supply of guns of position, and, further, of effective guns for our coast batteries. He said nothing of ships' guns, a question that was best left to naval Members of the House. He had also been glad to learn that the great Armstrong firm was prepared, on due notice, to turn out guns of all the kinds needed at the most rapid rate practicable. He had often mentioned before these items of necessary expenditure; but he did so again because the ears of the people were opening, and also because he would endeavour to acclimatize, so to speak, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) to these new atmospheric conditions which he might have to live in. There was one other point he would touch on, because it had excited some interest of late—he meant the expected Royal Commission. The original proposal, as embodied in the Resolution of the hon. and gallant Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), was that the Commission should inquire into the strength of the Forces by sea and land and the amount of war material necessary for the public security throughout the Empire. He did not profess himself an ardent admirer of Royal Commissions—they sometimes spent much time to small purpose, and accumulated evidence which few read and fewer profited by; but this one would have had a distinct purpose. It would have been of great value both to the Ministers concerned by providing them with a standard of efficiency to which they could at all times refer, and to the nation by assuring it that, so long as that standard was conformed to, it would be impossible to take the country by surprise. Now, they knew that in “another place” an opinion adverse to this inquiry had been expressed by a personage whose views all Conservatives were bound to respect; and the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) had again told them that night that though he did grant a Commission the inquiry would be one very different from what was asked for, and which some hon. Members did not see a sufficient object in pursuing. The objection was that the Government considered that in some way such a Commission would deprive Ministers of due responsibility. But he (Sir Edward Hamley) confessed he was unable to understand the difficulty thus raised. For it was not to be supposed that Ministers, individually or collectively, would take on themselves the task of prescribing what the strength of the Navy should be, what the number and organization of the troops, and the quantity of war material which were requisite for the service of the nation. They must apply to somebody of whose calculations they must assume the responsibility; and to whom could they apply with such confidence and safety as to a body of men selected by themselves, publicly appointed, and empowered to bring full inquiry to the aid of their own experience? The responsibility of accepting their Second Reading—Small Holdings [9], debate adjourned; Habitual Drunkards Act (1879) Amendment (No. 2) * [203].

Mr. E. Stanhope

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Local Government (No. 5) * [265]; Local Government (No. 6) * [266]; Local Government (No. 7) * [267].

Second Reading—Local Government (No. 4) * [250].

Considered as amended—Metropolitan Commons (Chislehurst and St. Paul's Cray) * [193].

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, owing to the continuance of his indisposition:—

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

SMALL HOLDINGS BILL.—[BILL 9.]

(Mr. Jesse Collings, Mr. Robert Reid, Mr. Burt, Mr. Winterbotham, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Cobb, Mr. Newnes, Mr. Flowers, Mr. Pitt Lewis.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley), in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said: I think that all hon. Members of this House will admit the importance of the subject with which it deals. It will not, therefore, be necessary for me to delay the House for any lengthened period in order to put forward the case for the Bill; and it is further unnecessary because this question, either in the form of a Bill or of a Resolution, has been before the House every year since I had the honour of a seat in Parliament. For the last three or four years the Bill has been before the House under the head of Allotments and Small Holdings Bill; this year it is brought forward as a Small Holdings Bill with the allotments portion dropped in consequence of the Act which was passed last year by Her Majesty's Government. That Act, I am happy to know, in spite of its defects, is producing a considerable effect in supplying allotments in various parts of England. Now, Sir, small holdings differ from allotments in this respect—that allotments are for labourers and others who have regular occupations, and are intended to supplement the earnings of the labourer and to occupy his spare time; whereas small holdings have for their object, according to their size, either the full occupation of the labourer or whoever holds them, or the partial occupation of any person who has another business to attend to which occupies only a portion of his time. The question I desire to bring before the House is very important, both in its social and economic aspects; and I hope, looking at the aim of the Bill, to hear no extravagant talk about cutting up the country into small lots, destroying all the large farms, and causing the country to be covered over with small patches. I trust that I may hear no arguments of that kind against this proposal. The fact is that the number of men who would be in the position to avail themselves of the facilities contemplated by this Bill will be limited. Besides the pick of our agricultural labourers who would be in a position to avail themselves of it, there is a certain class in our village population who have business of another character, but whose time is not fully occupied, and to them such facilities as the Bill proposes to afford would be a great boon. Some of these small tradesmen in the villages have little or nothing to do except on market days—I refer to persons in the position of hucksters, dealers, masons, cattle dealers, hay-tyers, blacksmiths, wheelwrights, pig dealers, and others whom I need not enumerate to hon. Members who are acquainted with rural life. All these men would make a very good class of cultivators, and would be able to get possession of a plot of land or a small holding of such a size as he might require for the purpose of cultivating it in connection with the business with which his time would be otherwise occupied. I think I cannot illustrate my argument better than by referring to the estate of Lord Tolle-mache, who has 40 small farms averaging 32 acres each, 50 averaging nine acres each, and 32 holdings averaging three acres each. There are more than 300 labourers holding about 300 acres of land, and, of course, the occupiers of these small holdings have other occupations such as I have enumerated.

should have led the large landed proprietors of the country to have endeavoured to cultivate in the minds of the rural population a desire to become the possessors of small holdings, and should have led them to give facilities for the acquisition by the peasantry of such holdings. The system of large holdings had failed to some extent. At any rate, it had almost brought ruin upon many of the great houses and many of the great positions in the country. If large holdings had failed, instances had been pointed out, and could be pointed out in still greater numbers, where small holdings had succeeded. They had an evidence of it at their doors. There was not one of them, in whatever direction he might live, who would let his land in allments at the same price as he would let it in larger quantities to large farmers.

COLONEL HAMBRO (Dorset, South): No, no!

MR. BROADHURST: The whole of the evidence, the whole of our experience show it.

COLONEL HAMBRO: What evidence?

MR. BROADHURST said, the evidence that Mr. Deputy Speaker had very properly intimated to him (Mr. Broadhurst) he must not refer to again. They would find evidence enough, if they would go to the Report of the Royal Commission, to bear out what he was saying. And he could speak furthermore from his own personal experience of this matter, because he happened to know something of this matter, having, as his hon. Friend the Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham had pointed out, been early associated with the land, and he trusted he might live to see the day when he might again have an opportunity of spending much of his time in a pleasurable and intellectual and in one of the most healthy avocations that anyone could undertake [Laughter.] Yes, he knew that many hon. Members laughed at anything intellectual. [Renewed laughter.] These gentlemen treated their labourers as though there were no intellect required in their work.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG) (Wilts, Devizes): No, no!

MR. BROADHURST said, he did not for a moment accuse the hon. Member opposite of being neglectful of his labourers, or of being wanting in thought for them; but his point was that they were treated, in far too many instances, as though no intellect were required in the work they had to do, whereas there was no industry so susceptible of intellectual treatment as that of agriculture. In every advance that was made, in every move that was attempted, in every hour's work that they did in connection with agriculture, the work was always the better for the application of the man's whole intellect to it. He was glad that, seemingly, the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Long), who knew something about these matters, approved of what he was saying, whilst some hon. Members took delight in laughing. He hoped that the Bill would not only be read a second time that day, but that the Committee stage would be fixed for an early period. He also trusted that the Government would not listen to his hon. Friend who moved the second reading, and believe that the subject was not so pressing as to require to be taken up during the present Session. He trusted that even at a moment's notice the House would be ready to read the Bill a second time, and that they would apply themselves with all their energy to carrying it successfully through Parliament during the present Session, subject, of course, to some Amendments in matters of detail in Committee. He had very great pleasure in seconding the Motion for the second reading of this most important Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Jesse Collings.)

MR. GRAY (Essex, Maldon) said, he thought there had been a marked difference noticeable between the two speeches which had so interested the House. The one speech had been without a shadow of Party spirit, whereas the other had evidenced a great deal of that spirit. He greatly preferred the speech of the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham. [Ironical Cheers from the Opposition Benches.] Yes, and he not only preferred that speech, but he could give his reasons for doing so. He believed that there was thorough earnestness and conviction from the beginning to the end of that speech, and he hoped that whenever they talked about subjects of such interest to the

England and Wales, being larger than any other decade since 1831-1841, when it was 14½ per cent. But if we turn to the rural districts, we find an absolute decrease of 15·9 per cent, instead of an increase of 14½ per cent. If we take the 20 years from 1861 to 1881, there has been a decrease among the agricultural classes of no less than 31·2 per cent, or nearly one third of the entire agricultural population. If we go further, and take particulars, we shall find that there is not a single county in which there has not been a decrease, except in those parts of the country which happen to possess a large town. Take Wiltshire for instance. Out of 17 registrars' districts, all have decreased considerably with the exception of three. In Dorsetshire, every district has decreased except two, those two being Poole and Weymouth, the decrease having been up to 11 per cent. In Devonshire, out of 20 registrars' districts, everyone has decreased with the exception of eight, those eight being large towns such as Torquay, Exeter, and Plymouth, or the neighbourhood of large towns. The decrease there has been up to 11 per cent. The sub-district of Honiton decreased nine per cent, and one in 11½ per cent were paupers. In Cornwall the decrease was as high as 14 per cent, but it arose from other causes besides agricultural depression. Every district declined with the exception of Falmouth. In Somersetshire, every district declined except in five, including Taunton, Bath and neighbourhood, and Bedminster. In Herefordshire, every district with the exception of Hereford itself. In Buckinghamshire every district decreased with the exception of Eton and Wycombe. In Huntingdonshire every district decreased. In Bedfordshire every district decreased, with the exception of Bedford and Luton. In Brecknockshire and in Radnorshire, in Wales, every district decreased, and in Suffolk every district decreased except five; some as much as 12½ per cent. It is only a question of physique, of keeping up the power of animal endurance, of health; in other words, of the actual fibre of the human being. This is a most important measure that such a state of things should incite such a feeling of alarm, and when these men go away, according to the census returns, they do not emigrate. The emigration is so small that it is not worth taking into account. They go into the larger towns, the centre of manufacturing industry. Years ago, when the manufacturing industry was advancing by leaps and bounds, all these men were absorbed, but the powers of absorption of the large towns have reached their limits, if, indeed, they have not overstepped dangerously the limit to which they can go with safety. What we have to consider is where this is to stop. Every 10 years shows an enormous increase in our large towns. To take London, for instance. Every few years there is an addition to London of a town with a population as large as that of Birmingham, and it is dangerous to put a population the size of Birmingham into London every few years, nearly all of them coming from the country, unless we can find the means of subsistence for them. We all know that there is a social question being raised that will tax the ingenuity of the cleverest statesman. It is said that these men do better in the towns—that each individual goes from 9s. or 10s. into the towns where he earns 15s. or 20s., but in his turn he displaces another, and at the bottom of the list we shall find a broken man or a pauper. As to the condition of our streets, it is distinctly connected with the influx of rural paupers into the towns. I think, therefore, it will be granted that there is a great social question connected with the subject. Coming next to the economical question, I maintain that it is one which affects the working classes of our towns, and factories and mines and quarries more than any other. The workmen may have their rules and regulations, their strikes and Trade Unions, but as long as there is a steady influx of competing labourers, so long will employment be comparatively secured, and wages kept down. The operation is two-fold—the labourer who leaves the land ceases to produce wealth to be spread over the industrial centres, and he transfers himself to those industrial centres, increasing the supply, while, at the same time, he is lessening the demand. Every scheme for finding work for the unemployed—such as the laying out of pleasure gardens, and so forth—although deserving of the highest praise, are a mere scratch on the surface, so long as we have ready to our hands a great thing. He had but little experience in the drawing of Bills; but, in his humble opinion, there were several weak points in the drafting of the present measure, and the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham, he believed, himself admitted that perhaps some points in his Bill could be improved by alterations. Well, it appeared to him (Mr. Gray) that one of the weak points was this. He thought there was something unfair in it—and he was very much inclined to think that the hon. Member opposite would agree with him that unfairness, wherever they found it, was weakness. The Bill said that the Local Authorities should purchase land, if they thought proper, at such a price as would be taken if the owners were willing sellers. Now, he did not think that was fair. He wished everything to be tried which was reasonable and just on behalf of the agricultural labourer; but he certainly did not think it would be fair to pounce down upon the landlord and to say to him, "You shall part with a portion of your property, whether you like it or not, at such price as you would take if you were a willing seller." Supposing one of our manufacturers were told that he must dispose of his great business, however he liked it and wished to go on with it—that he must sell up in the interest of those whom he had been in the habit of employing, at such a price as he would have asked if he had been anxious to part with his business. What an outcry would there be if such a proposal as that were made, and yet there was not much difference between the two cases. He was sure the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham did not wish to be unfair. At the present time, if the Bill had become an Act of Parliament and it had been possible to find any authority willing to take upon itself the powers and responsibilities of the provisions of this measure—and he did not think such Local Authorities would be plentiful, at any rate during the next few years to come—and supposing that authority went to the landlord and said that he should sell his land at the price he would receive for it if he were a willing seller, he would get about £12 an acre for that which some few years ago was probably worth £40 an acre; and in saying that he had in his mind land in the locality with which he was best acquainted. Was this common justice to the landlord? The door would be open to a great deal of jobbery. In the Bill it was provided that nothing should be set up in small holdings which should depreciate the value of property adjoining, but he was not quite sure whether in some cases it would not be the other way round. [An hon. MEMBER: How?] He was not sure that in case where there was only a very limited quantity of land of a certain description, the fact of its being taken up in small holdings would not increase the price of that which was left. The Bill in these respects would not work well, and it might lead to jobbery. The hon. Member who moved the second reading of the Bill said he would not take up the time of the House about the prices of agricultural produce. Well, he (Mr. Gray) was rather inclined to think that the prices of produce was the gist of the whole question.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I am sure the hon. Member does not wish to misrepresent me. What I said was, that I would not take up the time of the House by quoting the prices of grain and cereals, but I went fully into the prices of other produce.

MR. GRAY said, that undoubtedly was the case. He, however, was not afraid to go into the prices of cereals, because, after all, it was the price of corn which had been, and still would be a check upon agricultural operations over a great part of the country. When England ceased to grow her own corn, England would be in a state of great danger. They might talk about their—

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners;—

The House went;—and being returned;—

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to several Bills.

SMALL HOLDINGS BILL.

Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. GRAY said, he had been speaking of a question relating to corn growing, which seemed to him to be one of the most important questions of the day. He did not think it would be well for about the work now. We know that the large farmers are in a bad way; but men with a few acres of land, who are growing wheat and cereals, and tilling their holdings in the fashion of large farmers, find they, also, do not succeed. The fact is that the peasant proprietors of England are—as was described not long ago by Lavelaye, one of the Belgian economists—pursuing a lost art in England. In fact, close personal care and labour are rarely bestowed upon the cultivation of the land by anybody unless he has a piece of land which he can call his own. The great Mr. Jenkins, in his valuable Reports, was generally opposed to small holdings; but there was enough in the information contained in the Reports of that Gentleman to show that he was obliged to give unwilling testimony to the character of the small holders abroad. I remember that he startled the large farmers of England by telling them that in Denmark, which is competing so strongly with us in regard to butter, the most successful dairy farms were without a single acre of permanent pasture around them. The later evidence of the Royal Commission goes in strongly for education in the smaller branches of industry. Remarks have been made as to the poverty of the small proprietors abroad. No doubt, they appear to be wretchedly poor when labouring in the fields; but follow them into their own homes, and a very different state of things will be found. They have good furniture, ornaments, and clothes; and altogether there is an indescribable sense of property, position, and comfort about them which must be witnessed in order to be appreciated. Probably there may be among them, as there are among every other class, failures; but it may be taken that, as a rule, the state of things I have described exists. We are told that the remedy is to be found alone in free trade in land. My opinion is hardly in favour of reforms which are likely to aggravate in some cases the existing state of things and prevent the bringing about of a new and better state of things. There is no use in creating more land-holders. What we want is to create new cultivators. If we are to have landlords I would rather that they should be rich than impecunious persons who would wring all the rent out of a man they could. We must raise a new class of cultivators from the class of people I have been describing. We have the finest material any nation could wish for this purpose. We have industrious and law-abiding men, who under fair circumstances would be enterprising and successful, but they have no money. That is the great drawback, and one that it is of national and certainly of great social interest for us to overcome. We should not be doing anything remarkable in setting about that task. As I said before, there is not a nation in Europe that has not been obliged to help this class of its population on some principle or other, although it may be different in form from that for which I am contending. We have ourselves done it in Ireland, perhaps to an extent beyond that of any other country. We have the material, and the whole question is whether we will turn it to account. It is useless to preach to a farmer about wearing a black coat. He must go into minute cultivation personally. We have heard a great deal of noise on this subject, and many theories have been put forward. Platforms have rung again about the pick of the land, but the pick of the land means men who are ready to undergo hard work and privation to persevere. It also means home interests, something to the good and the pleasure and satisfaction which attends the cultivation of the soil, and which does not belong to any other industry. Now, in order to remedy this state of things I venture to bring forward again the present measure. Its object is, and I have no doubt whatever its effect may be, that it will raise the question I have referred to, and seeing that the Unionist Government have made one right step last year in this direction, and have shown that in this and other matters they are capable of appreciating the importance of the subject, I hope they will support the Bill.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford) was understood to say that the Government had already dealt with one branch of the subject.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: The subject with which this Bill deals is another subject altogether.

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE: We classify the two subjects.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I do not accept the classification. What I say is

Mr. Jesse Collings

than those men who had bought their own land years ago and mortgaged it. He hoped there were no hon. Members of the class to which he was about to allude now present, but some hon. Members opposite seemed to think that a landlord was a man who ought to be jumped on whenever there was an opportunity of performing that process. ["No, no!"] He was glad to hear the hon. Member opposite dissent, but his statement was that not infrequently some of the Benches opposite were occupied by Gentlemen who seemed to hold that view. In answer to those hon. Members, he would say, as he had frequently said before, that there were landlords who were good and landlords who were bad. There were such landlords all the world over, and until the Millenium that would perhaps continue to be the case. But it was hardly just that because a man happened to be a landlord they should take up the position of saying—"Never mind what you do with him—he is only a landlord, shy a stone at him whenever you can." He could assure hon. Members that many landlords during the last 8 or 10 years of agricultural ruin, had tried all they could to keep their tenants on the farms, and not altogether for generosity. Generosity, no doubt, had been one motive, but that motive had also been mixed up with another—namely, that of self-interest. Still, the fact remained, that the tenant farmers of England during the past 8 or 10 years, speaking generally, had been in a better position than the men who had bought their farms 8 or 10 years ago, and had considerably mortgaged them on purchase. Supposing a man had land under the provisions of this Bill. If things went on well, he would be able to pay the interest on his mortgage, but as soon as agricultural prosperity waned, the position of the man who owned his own small holding would be most miserable, and whatever they did to get these small purchasers to occupy land, and no one was more anxious than he was that the land should be occupied and cultivated, they must bear in mind that the point he had been dealing with was a most serious one. By all means let them work together in the solution of this problem, and let them work free from all Party bias. The thing to be done was to endeavour to get the land occupied. He would willingly work with those who wished, where the land was suitable for it, to get it cut into smaller portions, rather than have it continued in farms of 200 or 300 acres; but whatever they did, do let them try to put men on these small plots of land with a reasonable prospect of their being able to hold on. They might take his opinion for what it was worth, and he offered it very humbly and with great diffidence; but he was convinced of this, that the men whom they would put in possession of small holdings, by the machinery of the Bill, the men whom they would induce to invest their £200 and their labour and their time in agriculture, instead of many another business—would have a very small chance indeed of prospering. So long as a man had a chance of investing his £200 outside a farm and outside the offer made to him in this Bill, he (Mr. Gray) was sure he would go in for a shop, for a higgler's cart, or for a public-house, or something of that kind. He was very much obliged to the House for the attention it had given to him while he had been speaking at such length, but he was extremely anxious that the question of the condition of the rural labourer should be thoroughly looked into. He did not feel that he could give any hearty support to the Bill; but he heartily supported the endeavour which the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham was making to remedy the condition of the agricultural labourer throughout the country. Within 50 miles of the spot he (Mr. Gray) was standing upon that day, within 50 miles of that great City and centre of the industry of all the world, he could point to a place where agricultural labourers were only getting nominally 9s. per week. He did not see the hon. Gentleman the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Gardner) in his place; but on more than one occasion that hon. Member had told them that he represented the agricultural labourer. The hon. Member certainly represented the agricultural labourers in his own Division, and it was to that Division that he (Mr. Gray) was now alluding. Well it was a very sad state of things that 9s. a week should be all the money earned by an agricultural labourer within such a short distance of a great City like that. Something must or four or half-a-dozen able to pay one-fourth, and still retain sufficient to enable them to stock and work it. Besides this, there is a greater reason than all. The inquiries I made in France and on the Continent generally with respect of peasant proprietors, resulted in this—that there is one great cause of failure, and that is the excessive mortgages on plot divisions of the land. In bad times, when there may be a temporary pinch, it is easy to be tempted to borrow on the security of the land, and these poor peasants having commenced the practice at once place themselves under the tyranny compared with which the practices of the harshest landlord are simply mercy. I therefore take it for granted that means will be taken to prevent the money-lender, who will be lying in wait to take advantage of these peasant proprietors on the first opportunity, in order to advance money to the small holder, from taking advantage of the necessity of these poor men. Unless something of that kind were done, we might as well give up at once all idea of benefiting the agricultural labourer, because he would simply have to go through a slow and painful process of extinction. Under the provisions of the Bill the proprietor would offer no temptation to the money-lender, inasmuch as he would not have the power to part with the land. He is to advance one-fourth of the purchase money. Suppose the value of the holding is £100, he advances £25, and the Local Authority advances the remaining £75, on which, say, he pays 4 per cent. In that case, he is of no use to the money-lender, and offers no temptation to him. He could only lend up to the value of the £25, and in no case could he fall in any way on the man to whom he lent it, and he would have no legal means of recovering the money. I received evidence in support of my proposals from persons with whom I am acquainted which shows clearly that a large number of people would remain on the land, and that others would go back to it if facilities of this kind were offered. I would ask hon. Members to look at the Consular Reports which have been lately issued, and which contain most interesting information on this subject. I quite grant that agricultural depression has been general; but in every one of these Reports there is sufficient evidence to show the comparatively prosperous condition of the cultivators of the kind I am speaking of. If I am not wearying the House, I should like to read a passage or two from these Consular Reports. I will take, first, Consular Report No. 220, 1887, for the year 1886, on the trade and agriculture of Wurttemberg—

“As matters now stand, the normal, natural, and equal development of agriculture is at a standstill. Abundant harvests have been unable to effect any appreciable improvement. Tenants and encumbered proprietors find the situation even more distressing. The condition of the small farmer, on the other hand, is proportionately better. He tills his fields with the aid of his family, and is but little affected by the depreciation of the price of the crops, as he supplies the wants of his household from his own hand, and makes good his need in cash by the sale of a pig or a beast. On estates of larger dimensions, both the sale-value and rental of land has fallen; in the case of the latter, in many instances, as much as 25 per cent. In the matter of small allotments, on the other hand, with the exception of those situated at an inconvenient distance, or otherwise hampered, the fall in value has not been experienced, many such small lots fetching extraordinary prices.”

Our Consular Agent in Sweden says—

“The butter import trade has been steadily on the decline for several years. This has been caused by the marked progress made in Swedish dairy farming, which has increased the home supply and opened up a considerable and rising export with foreign countries.”

A Report from the Consular General of Havre, in France, for 1886, says—

“The crops, on the whole, throughout the district were not good, and farmers are complaining, like our own, of the hardness of the times; but I would again, as I did last year, draw attention to the fact that Mr. Vice Consul Lethbridge shows in his Report that from the port of Honfleur, eggs, butter, poultry, fruit, and cheese were exported to England last year to a total value of £1,152,140. This astonishing fact induces two reflections—first, wonder that our own agriculturists do not supply much of this themselves; and, secondly, what would become of the farming interests in a district of which Honfleur is the outlet were this trade, by any circumstances, put a stop to?”

Thus, according to this Report, we are keeping the people of these districts instead of keeping our people at home. I will not detain the House much longer. I have been contending for a principle—that is, that we should give facilities to persons who without facilities cannot get upon the land, and that we should give them facilities for acquiring holdings by means of which they might produce these articles. There would then be more capital, recognizing labour as capital, expended upon the land. It must be remembered that labour is the most valuable part of capital; that the small holder and his family, by their work, put what is probably equivalent to £2 per week upon the land, and that, though there may be failure if the labour has been employed and paid for by the farmer, it makes all the difference if it is supplied without payment by the man and his family, who will be content with small results when those results are brought about by the efforts of himself and his family. I maintain, further, that there would be more people employed on the land, for, although next to Belgium, we are the most thickly-populated country in Europe, yet, if we take the rural districts alone, we shall find that they are very thinly-populated. In the next case, the larger the amount of cultivation and of production, the greater the increase in the demand for our manufactures; and not only so, but the consequential saving in the amount of poor rates, charities, and so forth. The time is very favourable for trying an experiment in the direction I have indicated. The social and political value of land in this country has largely diminished; and, what is more important still, the profits upon it have largely disappeared, and its marketable value greatly deteriorated. There is a large quantity of vacant land in the country. Almost in every district there is a good deal in the hands of the landowner, who is cultivating the land at a loss, as he finds out to his cost at the end of the year. I am, therefore, surprised that the landlords, and everybody else, did not see the advantage of increasing the usefulness of the class in whose interests I have brought forward this Bill. Have hon. Members—knowing that the marketable value of land has much deteriorated in this country—seen the prices at which land is selling in France and Belgium, notwithstanding the depressed times in which we are living? The price in the countries I have mentioned is enormous compared with what landed property goes begging for here. It is absurd to cry out for Fair Trade, and all such nonsense, when we are, by our simple neglect, allowing from £25,000,000 to £30,000,000 of produce to be sent over here by foreigners which we could easily produce for ourselves. If we made greater use of the land, prices would go up legitimately; and if we can do that by legislative action, no one will be more thankful than myself. I thank the House for the patient manner in which it has listened to me. I know that the work of the Session is very heavy, and that the time of the Government is so fully occupied that it would be almost impossible for them to get through Parliament a Bill of this national importance—for I am not going to minimize its importance—during the present Session. But what I ask them to do is that they should take the matter into their own hands. It is too large a question to be undertaken by any private Member, and I have no desire that it should be made merely the subject of platform speeches. I want something done by anybody—I do not care who it may be—in this direction. I hold that it is sound political economy, and will tend to secure the safety of the nation, to make proper provision for the welfare of the country population. We have a duty to discharge to that population, setting aside altogether any question of political economy, or the realization of wealth. Above all, I trust that Her Majesty's Government will not meet this proposal with a mere non possumus, but that they will state that they recognize its importance, and that, as soon as possible, it will receive at their hands a fair and serious consideration. I beg to move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. Jesse Collings

Mr. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.) said, he desired to say a few words on this Bill, having been associated with his hon. Friend the Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham (Mr. Jesse Collings) in the consideration of the subject from the very inception of the Bill. He must say he was disappointed with the concluding part of the remarks of the hon. Member, as the hon. Member had seemed to make some apology for his measure, offering an invitation to the Government to say generally that they agreed with the principle of the proposal without pledging themselves to a period of time or course of action to give effect to it. His hon. Friend had declared that that was the most urgent question that existed in connection with agriculture. Surely then, when agriculture—when labour and industry—was so depressed in our great towns and rural districts, this of all times was the time which should be chosen for pressing the matter home, and for declaring that it was absolutely urgent, and for demanding of the Government that they should, if necessary, suspend proceedings with regard to some of their measures not of such national importance as that now before the House, in order to give place to the consideration of this subject. He (Mr. Broadhurst) rose to second the proposal for the second reading of the Bill, and to recommend that it should be proceeded with at once and passed this Session, and should not be postponed to some time more convenient to the Government—that it should not be put off to suit any political exigency of the time. He should like to point out to the House that for the first time in its history, the Bill to-day appeared upon the Order Paper without a single Notice of opposition to it. He must congratulate his hon. Friend the Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham on having so speedily converted hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. Time was, and not very long back, when the Notice Paper was almost crowded with Notices from hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House to the effect that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) used to know something about the position of the Bill. He was a leader in the denunciation of what he used to call the fallacies of the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham, who, he (Mr. Chaplin) declared, proposed a measure upon a subject of which he was entirely ignorant. He (Mr. Broadhurst) was glad that a closer association between the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division and his hon. Friend the Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham had taught the right hon. Gentleman that the hon. Member was not so ignorant on these subjects, but that he knew some little about them.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Will the hon. Member permit me to say that I never made any such assertion as that the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham was ignorant upon this question. On the contrary, I should think he knows as much or more about it than anyone in the House.

MR. BROADHURST: Yes; but the right hon. Gentleman, as they all knew, was a master in the art of phrases. The scathing the right hon. Gentleman used to employ against the hon. Member was even stronger and much more effective in the direction indicated than the words he (Mr. Broadhurst) had actually made use of, and meant the same thing. He thought the Government might very well shorten the debate on this subject this evening, if some one representing them would rise early and give the House their opinion upon the measure under discussion. He thought he might say, if he was not taking too great a liberty with hon. and right hon. Gentlemen near him, that they on that (the Opposition) side of the House, accepted the Bill unanimously. Of course, they did not pledge themselves to any of the details of the measure. His hon. Friend would never expect that. But they pledged themselves to the main principle of the Bill, and were prepared to vote it an urgent measure, and one which should be proceeded with at once. He apprehended that there was no hon. Member on the opposite side prepared to give strong opposition to the measure.

MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): Certainly there is.

MR. BROADHURST: The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, one would think, would almost come within the category in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire regarded his hon. Friend the Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham as having a place—that is, as hardly renowned for his knowledge of this subject. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, he was not aware that the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Ambrose) was renowned for his knowledge of the subject of small holdings and the condition of the agricultural labourers of the country.

MR. AMBROSE: I did not profess to have any practical knowledge on the subject. I simply answered the challenge of the hon. Member as to there being no one on this side of the House prepared to offer a strenuous opposition to the Bill. It may be that I have no practical knowledge of the subject, and yet I may be quite capable of giving a strenuous opposition to the measure.

MR. BROADHURST said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman had always suffered more from ignorance than want of knowledge. Now, he apprehended that the Government was prepared, like the Opposition, to accept the principles of the Bill without pledging themselves to all the details of it. If that were so, he saw no reason why the debate should not be very short, and that they might proceed with one or two measures of great importance that immediately followed this on the Order Paper. Might he, for one moment, say that one of the details—or rather, as it was not in the Bill now, he would put it in this way—one of the omissions from the Bill this year was a very striking one. The hon. Member had omitted the allotments part of the original scheme, and he (Mr. Broadhurst) thought his hon. Friend was scarcely well advised in making that omission. The allotment question was one which was as important and necessary to deal with to-day as it was almost before the Act of last Session. The Act of last Session did not meet the requirements of the rural population with regard to allotments, and he had been rather surprised to hear the hon. Member, in moving the second reading of the present Bill, say that he had evidence that the Act of last year was a great success.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Abundant evidence.

MR. BROADHURST: Yes, the hon. Member said "abundant evidence"; but he (Mr. Broadhurst) thought they could, on the other side, produce abundant evidence to show that the Act had very essentially failed in attaining the object which the allotments scheme originally had in view. The hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham, he knew, had passed through a time of great excitement this last year or two, and had been pressed most severely in political matters with political difficulties and problems. ["No, no!"] Yes; that was so, unquestionably. The hon. Member who interrupted him was very energetic in his spirit of criticism; but might he (Mr. Broadhurst) remind him of the fact that the Royal Commission on the Housing of the Poor had spent a great deal of time on the consideration of this very subject. That Commission, at the instance of his hon. Friend the Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham, had stated that what was necessary in regard to allotments was that allotments up to half an acre should be attached to each cottage. It was perfectly well known that an allotment of a quarter of an acre in area so situated was of more value to a labourer than half an acre a mile away from his cottage.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that he is very much enlarging on the subject of the Small Holdings Bill by entering upon the subject he is now discussing.

MR. BROADHURST said, he was obliged to Mr. Deputy Speaker for reminding him of the fact; but he had been led into this, very unwisely no doubt, by the omission of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham to include allotments in his proposal. That was one of the misfortunes of the present Bill; but under the kind reminder of Mr. Deputy Speaker, he would not further pursue that part of the subject. On the subject of small holdings, however, he was not quite in accord with his hon. Friend. If he had understood the hon. Member correctly, he had declared that he was not looking forward to the complete ownership of these small holdings by the occupiers as much as to the cultivator having a constant and perpetual tendency—

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: To absolute ownership.

MR. BROADHURST: Yes, to absolute ownership. He was bound to say that he thought if they went to the root of the evil of the present system, they would find the best remedy in making the cultivator the absolute owner of the allotment which he cultivated.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: The Bill would do so.

MR. BROADHURST said, the best means of obtaining satisfactory results from the cultivation of the soil was by the soil being in the absolute possession of the cultivator. The cultivator should have the whole interest in the property, and there was no reason why the occupiers of small holdings should not become owners of the fee simple. He thought they must direct their attention when they got into Committee upon this Bill—if they got into Committee on it this Session—to that part of the subject. Many hon. Members thought that means might be found to help small cultivators to secure the ownership of their land on the same principle that labourers and artizans were enabled to obtain the ownership of their cottages—that was to say, through the assistance of Building Societies. That was the system proposed by the late Mr. Fergus O'Connor, and though there were great faults and errors of judgment in the scheme of Mr. Fergus O'Connor 50 years back, yet it had in it the elements of a successful and desirable scheme. There were not wanting to-day evidences—and the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham knew that very well—that good fruit had resulted from the effort of Mr. Fergus O'Connor 50 years ago. They had it in evidence, and his hon. Friend would remember that evidence perfectly well, that in one or two cases the small owners of to-day had been helped to their property under the system proposed and partly carried through by Mr. Fergus O'Connor; and where they saw the ownership going with the cultivation there they saw the very best results in agriculture. [“No, no!”] Yes; where the small holders owned their land, there they saw the most it was possible to obtain got from the land. Well, he had a letter which he had received from one of the great agricultural branches, a letter sent to him to refresh his memory as to a case of a very small holder indeed. The case was that of a man in possession as owner of one acre of land; out of that one acre of land this man and his family extracted a profit of £30 a-year.

An hon. MEMBER: Where is that?

MR. BROADHURST said, it was within 18 miles of the nearest market town, and within five miles of the nearest railway station.

An hon. MEMBER: Where?

MR. BROADHURST: In Norfolk. He knew the labourer perfectly well. He was a Norfolk man who had migrated North, and worked in the mines with the hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt) and another hon. Member.

An hon. MEMBER: Might I ask the hon. Member what this man cultivates?

MR. BROADHURST said, the man cultivated fruit and vegetables. He also grew pigs and a few poultry. It was perfectly well known, and hon.

Members would admit it in the House as they did out of it, that the growth of pigs was one of the most fruitful sources of profit to agriculturists. There was an evidence of some little want of information on these subjects on the part of the hon. Member opposite. Here was a man the absolute owner of a piece of land an acre in extent, 18 miles from a town, and four or five miles away from any railway station, earning £30 a-year out of his land, and performing skilful work for the farmers in the neighbourhood which added, perhaps, another £30 a-year to his earnings. There was this man, a most desirable citizen, maintaining himself in independence and respectability, bringing up his family independent of all parish relief, he and his being considerable customers, indeed, the best class of customers which manufacturers could have at their doors. This man had told him (Mr. Broadhurst) that if he could obtain an additional acre—that was to say, to make his holding two acres in extent, he could make the land bring him in from £65 to £70 a-year, but that he could not obtain that additional acre except at such a ruinous rent that it was impossible for him to enter into the contract, and here came in the secret of the want of success in some quarters of the whole system of small holdings. The holders were considerably handicapped, because the rent, rates, and other charges imposed upon them were in such enormous disproportion to the charges imposed upon owners of 300, 400, or 500 acres of land. If the friends of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire were as wise as it was sometimes thought they were, they would long since have made such arrangements as would have rendered a Bill of the kind unnecessary. If the landowners of this country were only wise enough to foresee what must be the inevitable outcome of the present system, it would not be necessary for his hon. Friend to plead as eloquently as he had done that evening that Parliament should do by compulsion that which people ought voluntarily to have done from self interest and for self protection, to say nothing of the patriotic motive of a desire to see the people increase in prosperity all round the large estates of the country. Those sentiments, and these reasons, one would have thought, should have led the large landed proprietors of the country to have endeavoured to cultivate in the minds of the rural population a desire to become the possessors of small holdings, and should have led them to give facilities for the acquisition by the peasantry of such holdings. The system of large holdings had failed to some extent. At any rate, it had almost brought ruin upon many of the great houses and many of the great positions in the country. If large holdings had failed, instances had been pointed out, and could be pointed out in still greater numbers, where small holdings had succeeded. They had an evidence of it at their doors. There was not one of them, in whatever direction he might live, who would let his land in allments at the same price as he would let it in larger quantities to large farmers.

Mr. Broadhurst

COLONEL HAMBRO (Dorset, South): No, no!

MR. BROADHURST: The whole of the evidence, the whole of our experience show it.

COLONEL HAMBRO: What evidence?

MR. BROADHURST said, the evidence that Mr. Deputy Speaker had very properly intimated to him (Mr. Broadhurst) he must not refer to again. They would find evidence enough, if they would go to the Report of the Royal Commission, to bear out what he was saying. And he could speak furthermore from his own personal experience of this matter, because he happened to know something of this matter, having, as his hon. Friend the Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham had pointed out, been early associated with the land, and he trusted he might live to see the day when he might again have an opportunity of spending much of his time in a pleasurable and intellectual and in one of the most healthy avocations that anyone could undertake [Laughter.] Yes, he knew that many hon. Members laughed at anything intellectual. [Renewed laughter.] These gentlemen treated their labourers as though there were no intellect required in their work.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG) (Wilts, Devizes): No, no!

MR. BROADHURST said, he did not for a moment accuse the hon. Member opposite of being neglectful of his labourers, or of being wanting in thought for them; but his point was that they were treated, in far too many instances, as though no intellect were required in the work they had to do, whereas there was no industry so susceptible of intellectual treatment as that of agriculture. In every advance that was made, in every move that was attempted, in every hour's work that they did in connection with agriculture, the work was always the better for the application of the man's whole intellect to it. He was glad that, seemingly, the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Long), who knew something about these matters, approved of what he was saying, whilst some hon. Members took delight in laughing. He hoped that the Bill would not only be read a second time that day, but that the Committee stage would be fixed for an early period. He also trusted that the Government would not listen to his hon. Friend who moved the second reading, and believe that the subject was not so pressing as to require to be taken up during the present Session. He trusted that even at a moment's notice the House would be ready to read the Bill a second time, and that they would apply themselves with all their energy to carrying it successfully through Parliament during the present Session, subject, of course, to some Amendments in matters of detail in Committee. He had very great pleasure in seconding the Motion for the second reading of this most important Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Jesse Collings.)

MR. GRAY (Essex, Maldon) said, he thought there had been a marked difference noticeable between the two speeches which had so interested the House. The one speech had been without a shadow of Party spirit, whereas the other had evidenced a great deal of that spirit. He greatly preferred the speech of the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham. [Ironical Cheers from the Opposition Benches.] Yes, and he not only preferred that speech, but he could give his reasons for doing so. He believed that there was thorough earnestness and conviction from the beginning to the end of that speech, and he hoped that whenever they talked about subjects of such interest to the rural population as the question before the House, they would as much as possible always drop Party feeling, and try to thrash the question out in a business-like way. But although he (Mr. Gray) was as much interested in this question as the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham, he did not altogether agree with some of the views which the hon. Member had given expression to this afternoon. He was afraid the hon. Member would find if his Bill were passed into law, that there would not be the supply of labourers willing to take 10 or 20 acres of land which he seemed to imagine. It must be remembered that in order to enable a labourer to cultivate successfully 10 or 20 acres of land—in the Bill the limit was fixed at 40 acres; he would therefore take the mean and apply his argument to the case of a man desiring to cultivate 20 acres—he must have something like £200 of capital in hand for the purpose. Now, had they in this country labourers walking about in their thousands, each with £200 in his pocket to invest in that way? He was sorry to say that labourers of that kind were not to be found in Essex; but, supposing in other counties labourers were more fortunate than in Essex, his experience was that they would much rather, under existing circumstances, and in view of the present condition of agriculture, spend their money in taking small businesses, a small shop, and so on, than they would risk their capital on small holdings. The hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) had said something which he evidently seemed to think would be quite crushing to them on that (the Ministerial) side of the House as to what a certain Mr. Fergus O'Connor had done in connection with small holdings. Now, 20 years ago, he (Mr. Gray) happened to know the small holdings in the neighbourhood of Red Marley and Staunton, in Worcestershire, which Mr. Fergus O'Connor started, and though, 20 years ago, the present great agricultural depression had not set in, these small holdings to which he referred were failures, and the hon. Member for the Evesham Division of Worcestershire (Sir Richard Temple) informed him that they were very much the same now as they were 20 years ago. He was afraid that when prices were as bad as they were to-day, they would always find these small holdings getting into as bad a condition as these small farms at Red Marley and Staunton. Nearly everybody seemed to think that they knew something about agriculture—with the exception, perhaps, of his hon. and learned Friend on his right (Mr. Ambrose). Travelling in a railway train, for instance, they invariably saw people looking out of the window, regarding the condition of the country, and heard them advise the agriculturists as to what should be done with the land. They heard people say—“Oh, the wheat should be carted,” or “The wheat should not be carted;” and not infrequently did it happen that the wheat referred to was barley. They, the agriculturists, were told that the reason they did not get on in agricultural business was that they had no enterprize—that they had not the same amount of enterprize as manufacturers. They were told that they should get rid of their old Conservative ideas of doing as their forefathers had done before them, and that if they adopted that spirit, they would get on, as the great woollen spinners and iron-masters had got on. Then, again, they were told that the possibility of succeeding in agriculture, whatever enterprize might actuate their movements, had gone. They were told that they must break up their machinery, stop their engines, and sell off, and let small capitalists and agricultural labourers cultivate the land. Well, before he could believe in the expediency of following that course, he thought they ought to have some practical experience as to the likelihood of the new system proving successful. The allotments question was a very different one to that of the small holdings. An allotment might be worked most successfully by a man who had a few spare hours in the evening; and no better employment could be found for the British villager than an hour or two per day spent in that way, or in the contemplation of his pigs, if the hon. Member opposite liked, but to ask a man to spend a few hours on an allotment in the evening was one thing, and to ask him to invest a capital of £200 upon a holding, and to endeavour to cultivate it with profit, at the present prices of agricultural produce, was another and a totally different thing. He had but little experience in the drawing of Bills; but, in his humble opinion, there were several weak points in the drafting of the present measure, and the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham, he believed, himself admitted that perhaps some points in his Bill could be improved by alterations. Well, it appeared to him (Mr. Gray) that one of the weak points was this. He thought there was something unfair in it—and he was very much inclined to think that the hon. Member opposite would agree with him that unfairness, wherever they found it, was weakness. The Bill said that the Local Authorities should purchase land, if they thought proper, at such a price as would be taken if the owners were willing sellers. Now, he did not think that was fair. He wished everything to be tried which was reasonable and just on behalf of the agricultural labourer; but he certainly did not think it would be fair to pounce down upon the landlord and to say to him, “You shall part with a portion of your property, whether you like it or not, at such price as you would take if you were a willing seller.” Supposing one of our manufacturers were told that he must dispose of his great business, however he liked it and wished to go on with it—that he must sell up in the interest of those whom he had been in the habit of employing, at such a price as he would have asked if he had been anxious to part with his business. What an outcry would there be if such a proposal as that were made, and yet there was not much difference between the two cases. He was sure the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham did not wish to be unfair. At the present time, if the Bill had become an Act of Parliament and it had been possible to find any authority willing to take upon itself the powers and responsibilities of the provisions of this measure—and he did not think such Local Authorities would be plentiful, at any rate during the next few years to come—and supposing that authority went to the landlord and said that he should sell his land at the price he would receive for it if he were a willing seller, he would get about £12 an acre for that which some few years ago was probably worth £40 an acre; and in saying that he had in his mind land in the locality with which he was best acquainted. Was this common justice to the landlord? The door would be open to a great deal of jobbery. In the Bill it was provided that nothing should be set up in small holdings which should depreciate the value of property adjoining, but he was not quite sure whether in some cases it would not be the other way round. [An hon. MEMBER: How?] He was not sure that in case where there was only a very limited quantity of land of a certain description, the fact of its being taken up in small holdings would not increase the price of that which was left. The Bill in these respects would not work well, and it might lead to jobbery. The hon. Member who moved the second reading of the Bill said he would not take up the time of the House about the prices of agricultural produce. Well, he (Mr. Gray) was rather inclined to think that the prices of produce was the gist of the whole question.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I am sure the hon. Member does not wish to misrepresent me. What I said was, that I would not take up the time of the House by quoting the prices of grain and cereals, but I went fully into the prices of other produce.

MR. GRAY said, that undoubtedly was the case. He, however, was not afraid to go into the prices of cereals, because, after all, it was the price of corn which had been, and still would be a check upon agricultural operations over a great part of the country. When England ceased to grow her own corn, England would be in a state of great danger. They might talk about their—

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners;—

The House went;—and being returned;—

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to several Bills.

SMALL HOLDINGS BILL.

Question again proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”

MR. GRAY said, he had been speaking of a question relating to corn growing, which seemed to him to be one of the most important questions of the day. He did not think it would be well for this country to change its system of agriculture in such a way as to make us more dependent on the foreigner for the necessities of life than we were at the present time. The hon. Member for West Nottingham seemed to think that it was entirely the fault of the British farmer that he was not able to compete with the foreigner in the production of cheese, eggs, and butter. Perhaps, if they followed up that question very closely, they might find sufficient reasons for that being the case; but it would necessitate his trespassing for too long a time upon the patience of the House that afternoon to go closely into that part of the subject. He would merely say that it was quite possible that foreigners who send that class of agricultural production were able to get a certain amount of profit out of their other agricultural productions. If he could make a profit out of wheat growing or out of barley, he could afford to sell cheese, butter, and eggs at a cheaper price than he could if he were not getting a profit out of these articles. A great deal of wheat growing land in England was entirely unsuitable to the production of either cheese or butter. Here was an error in which people who knew very little about the practical work of agriculture very often fell into. Many hon. Members thought that all agriculturists had to do—if wheat growing did not pay—was to just lay down the barren land in grass. Now, it would not always be possible to do anything of that kind. There were tracts of land under the plough which would do very well under grass no doubt; but, speaking generally, much of the wheat growing land of England would only produce—farm it how they might—a poor description of grass. Therefore, in a large portion of the grain-growing parts of England it was not practicable for labourers to undertake the cultivation of the soil in the expectation of making a profit out of cheese and butter. Again, everyone who knew anything about the matter knew very well that grass land hardly employed one labourer per acre, where arable land used to employ three. He would put it roughly in that proportion that arable land well farmed would employ at least three times as many labourers as grass land. Some hon. Members complained—and he thought, complained with very good grounds indeed—of the immense number of the inhabitants of our rural districts who were invading our large towns, and competing with our artisans and operatives there. Well, but if we laid down the land in grass, and followed out the recommendations of the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham—whom he was sorry to see was not in his place just now, for he did not wish to refer to anything he had said unfairly—he was certain that a far less number of labourers would be employed in agricultural work than was at present the case. A large number of labourers would be displaced, and they would come up to London and to other large towns, and the grievance which had been complained of, of having too many labourers competing with the operatives of the towns, would be exaggerated in the future until it became much more serious than it was that day. To go back for a moment to the Bill, he had said that the provisions which forced a landlord to part with his land at a price which he would take, providing he were a willing seller, was unfair, and he would contrast that provision with the provision which pointed out the way in which the small holder was to be treated if he wished to get rid of his land, or if the Local Authority wished to dispossess him of it. The small holder was to be treated in this way. The price he would get would be the value of the land held as a small holding, together with all unexhausted improvements made thereon, 10 per cent for compulsory repurchase and a proper allowance for disturbance, cost of removal, loss of fixtures, and so on. That appeared to him to be a very different way of treating one man to the way in which it was proposed to treat the other, and he could not but fancy that the proverb that what was sauce for the goose was sauce for the gander was applicable in connection with this clause. Then, as to the idea of not allowing a man ever to become the actual possessor of the property. He could not see that it was advisable to leave such a millstone always around the neck of a holder, as that three-fourths of the value of his holding should remain for ever on mortgage. His own experience taught him that there was no class of agriculturists who had suffered more during the last 8 or 10 years of agricultural depression, than those men who had bought their own land years ago and mortgaged it. He hoped there were no hon. Members of the class to which he was about to allude now present, but some hon. Members opposite seemed to think that a landlord was a man who ought to be jumped on whenever there was an opportunity of performing that process. ["No, no!"] He was glad to hear the hon. Member opposite dissent, but his statement was that not infrequently some of the Benches opposite were occupied by Gentlemen who seemed to hold that view. In answer to those hon. Members, he would say, as he had frequently said before, that there were landlords who were good and landlords who were bad. There were such landlords all the world over, and until the Millenium that would perhaps continue to be the case. But it was hardly just that because a man happened to be a landlord they should take up the position of saying—"Never mind what you do with him—he is only a landlord, shy a stone at him whenever you can." He could assure hon. Members that many landlords during the last 8 or 10 years of agricultural ruin, had tried all they could to keep their tenants on the farms, and not altogether for generosity. Generosity, no doubt, had been one motive, but that motive had also been mixed up with another—namely, that of self-interest. Still, the fact remained, that the tenant farmers of England during the past 8 or 10 years, speaking generally, had been in a better position than the men who had bought their farms 8 or 10 years ago, and had considerably mortgaged them on purchase. Supposing a man had land under the provisions of this Bill. If things went on well, he would be able to pay the interest on his mortgage, but as soon as agricultural prosperity waned, the position of the man who owned his own small holding would be most miserable, and whatever they did to get these small purchasers to occupy land, and no one was more anxious than he was that the land should be occupied and cultivated, they must bear in mind that the point he had been dealing with was a most serious one. By all means let them work together in the solution of this problem, and let them work free from all Party bias. The thing to be done was to endeavour to get the land occupied. He would willingly work with those who wished, where the land was suitable for it, to get it cut into smaller portions, rather than have it continued in farms of 200 or 300 acres; but whatever they did, do let them try to put men on these small plots of land with a reasonable prospect of their being able to hold on. They might take his opinion for what it was worth, and he offered it very humbly and with great diffidence; but he was convinced of this, that the men whom they would put in possession of small holdings, by the machinery of the Bill, the men whom they would induce to invest their £200 and their labour and their time in agriculture, instead of many another business—would have a very small chance indeed of prospering. So long as a man had a chance of investing his £200 outside a farm and outside the offer made to him in this Bill, he (Mr. Gray) was sure he would go in for a shop, for a higgler's cart, or for a public-house, or something of that kind. He was very much obliged to the House for the attention it had given to him while he had been speaking at such length, but he was extremely anxious that the question of the condition of the rural labourer should be thoroughly looked into. He did not feel that he could give any hearty support to the Bill; but he heartily supported the endeavour which the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham was making to remedy the condition of the agricultural labourer throughout the country. Within 50 miles of the spot he (Mr. Gray) was standing upon that day, within 50 miles of that great City and centre of the industry of all the world, he could point to a place where agricultural labourers were only getting nominally 9s. per week. He did not see the hon. Gentleman the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Gardner) in his place; but on more than one occasion that hon. Member had told them that he represented the agricultural labourer. The hon. Member certainly represented the agricultural labourers in his own Division, and it was to that Division that he (Mr. Gray) was now alluding. Well it was a very sad state of things that 9s. a week should be all the money earned by an agricultural labourer within such a short distance of a great City like that. Something must be done to meet these cases, and he was delighted that the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham had alluded to the question. He was delighted that the hon. Member was working upon it. He wished the Association of which the hon. Member had been the other day made President—an association called, he thought, The Rural Labourers' League—every success, and he believed that when that Rural Labourers' League had gained experience, and had been in working order for a year or so, the hon. Member would be able to bring before the House some proposition to remedy the condition which so many unfortunate villagers of this country found themselves in—some proposition which would be more likely to work well than the provisions of the present Bill. Looking forward rather to the information and experience which would be gained by that League of which the hon. Member was the worthy President, and similar associations, and looking forward rather to the experience they would have from these associations than to the provisions of this Bill, thanking the House for having heard him at such length, he must decline to vote for the second reading of the Bill.

VISCOUNT WOLMER (Hants, Petersfield) said, he was sure every Member of the House, on whichever side he sat, would agree with the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down in his estimation of the importance of the question. His hon. Friend the Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham (Mr. Jesse Collings) had dealt with great ability on the national importance of the question; and the hon. Member's judgment had been endorsed by the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst), and though there were one or two portions of the speech of the latter hon. Member, as well as of the speech of the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham to which he (Viscount Wolmer) thought it his duty to take a little exception, yet he thought that those who had spoken on the subject were so far united that they could bear testimony to the importance of the question and in desiring to see it dealt with as quickly as possible on true lines. He thought the hon. Member who had last spoken (Mr. Gray) could not, in his concluding remarks, have intended to imply that the hon.

Member for the Saffron Walden Division of Essex (Mr. Gardner) would not join with him in deploring the fact that 9s. per week was the average wages of agricultural labourers in his part of the country. He (Viscount Wolmer) felt certain that the hon. Member for Saffron Walden would deplore that as much as the hon. Member (Mr. Gray) himself; and he thought that the hon. Gentleman would not find fault with him for having cleared up that point. It seemed to him to have rather escaped the attention of some hon. Members who had spoken in this debate, and especially of the hon. Member for West Nottingham and of the hon. Member who had just sat down, that it was not a subject upon which they could lay down general principles as if all land could be dealt with in small holdings, or that no land was suitable for small holdings. The hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham took particular pains to point out, and he (Viscount Wolmer) believed with absolute accuracy, the kinds of cultivation that were suitable for peasant proprietorship in this country, and it had been too much the habit of hon. Gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House in the past to endeavour to ride off on the question of cultivation, and to ignore those points upon which the small farmer could undoubtedly make the cultivation of land pay. The other night the hon. Member for West Nottingham spoke in a strain which would lead one to suppose that small holdings might be suitably introduced in almost every part of this country. Now, from that view he—with, he might venture to say, really some personal experience on the matter—certainly dissented. As things stood at this moment bad land, or land in out-of-the-way places, was, and must remain, the luxury of the rich; but good land, or land near a convenient situation, near a railway and good markets, could be brought into cultivation for the purposes contemplated by the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham. Now, he should like to give an instance which had come to his knowledge from his own experience. About 20 years ago, there was some land lying about eight miles from Gosport of a blue clay, mixed here and there with a light sandy peat. The land was let at a very low rent, and grew very bad crops of cereals.

Mr. Gray

One enterprising man, however, near the neighbourhood, exactly of the class which the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham had in view, tried the growing of strawberries. The land proved peculiarly suitable for the cultivation of strawberries, and the consequence was that there had grown up within the last generation a new industry, strawberries being grown over the whole district, immense quantities being sent to London and other large cities of consumption by small men—none of them farmers in the ordinary acceptance of the term. Now, if he might take a point which the hon. Member for West Nottingham intended to raise—namely, that the holdings could really be introduced under almost all circumstances by willing landlords, he ventured strongly to differ from that hon. Member, and he would take as an example the case of Sweden and Norway, which had already been alluded to by the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham. He (Viscount Wolmer) had had the advantage of living for some time in a very remote valley of Norway, where exactly that method of the cultivation of cereals was carried on, and he had no hesitation in saying that, although that valley was cultivated, and although the result was very creditable to the inhabitants, yet the conditions under which the cultivation was carried on were not such as an English labourer would submit to for a moment. For instance, it involved the expatriation of all the children of every family except one. Every year, from that valley, the surplus population went off to certain States in America. That was the recognized effect without which that cultivation could not be carried on; and, beyond that, the cultivation involved such hard labour and such bad fare that every English labourer in England would find himself much better off with a wage of 10s. or 12s. a-week, which, unfortunately, was what prevailed in some of our Southern counties. But he wished to be understood as drawing a line between the kinds of cultivation that could be profitably introduced and the kinds of cultivation that were unsuitable for small holdings. Now, when they came to the Bill which was under discussion, the point that struck his mind first was the machinery by which this excellent intention was proposed to be carried into effect. The hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham had explained the reasons of his not allowing the full purchase money to be paid, and for insisting that a small holder should always remain indebted to the extent of three-fourths of the purchase money. There was no doubt that the object he had in view was a very important one. No doubt, the money-lender and the money-lender's debt had always been the curse of the small farmers and proprietors in every country; therefore, every effort to deal with that must receive most careful consideration from the House. But in flying from one difficulty, at the same time the hon. Member fell into another, which was serious, and with the permission of the House he (Viscount Wolmer) would like to point it out. It amounted to this—that instead of making the Local Bodies really the means of conveyance, the instruments by which the peasant proprietor was created, the Local Body was turned into a general and perpetual land agency, and it was the total unfitness of any such Body, according to his experience, for any such duties which made him quite unable to endorse this part of the Bill. Now, anyone who had any practical experience in the management of property in land, or of farming, knew that practically at that moment no such operations could be made to pay except with the closest personal attention. It was also a notorious fact that all Corporations, whether charitable or elected, were the worst Bodies to manage land which this country ever knew, and when they came to consider the endless details which such management involved at this moment, he did not think that anyone could wonder that the result had not been better. With the permission of the House, he would mention two cases which had come within his own experience where exactly such holdings as were now under consideration had been built by a private owner, who could give the whole of his personal attention to the business, and the House could judge how far the same results would probably be brought about if the management of small holdings was in the hands of District Councils, whoever the men were, and however zealous they might be in the performance of their duties. He would take first the case of a small farm which was purchased some years ago. [An hon. MEMBER: Of how many acres?] A small holding of 152 acres. It was purchased when times were better—and it was obvious that in dealing with measures of this nature the House must contemplate changes taking place in the value of land one way or the other. Supposing this Bill had passed 20 years ago, and the land he was referring to had been purchased at that time, those 152 acres would have brought £30 an acre. The land was fair grass land, not of the best, but still of a very useful quality. No doubt, it ought to fetch more, but it was not easily accessible to railways. Now, £30 per acre for 152 acres would, roughly, make the purchase money £4,560. Well, on the holding, the cottages and other necessary buildings had cost not less than £1,000, and besides that there had been considerable drainage, and considerable fencing, and matters of that kind—of which he had not got the particulars—carried out. He wished the House to remember, although he had not got the particulars of all these expenses, that they were things that would have to be taken into account in making a proper balance-sheet—and this only went to make his point stronger. Now, this farm was part of a larger farm, and two years ago was turned into small holdings, and if any hon. Member should imagine that the original expenditure of £1,000 was larger than was necessary for such a holding, he would explain that that was not the case; because before the tenant could be found for the holding, extra expenditure on the building—whether in the shape of repairs, or of re-adaptation and enlargement—was £104. Therefore, with the drainage, with the fencing, and with the clearing in certain places, the total value, with expenditure, was £5,664. The rent paid for the farm at that moment was £114, which, upon the total of £5,664, was almost exactly 2 per cent. Now, when they considered the rate at which District Councils would be able to borrow money, they would agree, he thought, that they would not be able to get it at 2 or 2½ per cent. At the outside, the best price they would be able to obtain would be 3 per cent, and to that it would be necessary to add the expenses of management, and the loss which might be occasioned by the farm being vacant for a short time now and then. Then, again, the tenant would require some repairs occasionally and some additional accommodation. Taking all those things into account, it was obvious that such a farm could not be otherwise than a burden on the rates. And now he would take the case of another farm bought at the present moment. This was a farm of 50 acres, having extremely convenient buildings upon it, and which, considering the state of the markets, with buildings, could be bought for £20 per acre. That would make £1,000. The repairs required when the small holder first took possession amounted to £45, making a total of £1,045. The rent of that 50 acres was £40 a-year, coming almost exactly to 4 per cent on the purchase money. Now, that was buying land under the most favourable conditions, and yet that left for the District Council, or whatever the Body might be called which would have the management of the land, absolutely no margin with which to protect the rates from loss.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Three-fourths of the value would remain.

VISCOUNT WOLMER: That would not be paid by the person for whom the money was borrowed. The District Council would have to find the interest, as well as to provide the sinking fund. Taking all the circumstances into consideration, he did not see how District Councils could possibly have done what landowners had been obliged to do. Now, he did not wish the House to understand this as an argument attempting to deal with this question. The argument was only against making a Body like a District Council, which, at the best, would not be more than an improved Board of Guardians, a perpetual land agency for carrying on one of the most difficult businesses it was possible to conceive—that was the management of farm and landed property. Therefore, without desiring to ride that horse too far, or to be understood as endeavouring to prove that this question could not be dealt with in any shape by Public Bodies, yet he wished to provide against a Body like a District Council being converted into a land agency. In the general treatment of the subject, he sincerely hoped that they would hear no more of what was contained in one portion of the speech of the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst), to which he, with a great many Members of the House, must take exception; because, while making a very useful contribution to the discussion, the hon. Member could not resist, when he was acting like a revolving signboard, from stopping from time to time, at the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham, giving him a dig in the ribs which he utterly and entirely undeserved; because, whatever might be that hon. Gentleman's political opinions on other subjects, he was perfectly certain that he, more than any other man, had brought this matter to the front, and that he, more than any other man, was responsible for the fact that it had now been taken up by almost every man on the Opposition side of the House, and by a large number of Members on the other side of the House, and that public attention had been directed towards it, having previously regarded the question of the provision of allotments and small holdings as an impossible proposal. It used to be the custom of hon. Gentlemen opposite to snap up those who moved in this matter with the question—When large farmers could not make the land pay, how was it to be expected the small farmers could make it pay? The hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham had proved beyond all denial that there were in this country those farms which not only the small farmer could make pay where the big farmer could not, but for which the small farmer was fitted, as was illustrated by the industries which were carried on in foreign nations. When small farmers would be able profitably to exercise those facilities for dealing with land, he thought it was the duty of Parliament to give them such facilities.

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.) said, that the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) appealed to Members upon the Ministerial side of the House, and especially to those sitting upon the Front Bench, to state what their views were with regard to this Bill. He (Mr. Llewellyn) did not know at all what course the Government were going to take; but he knew that there were a very large number of Gentlemen sitting on those Benches who were in thorough sympathy with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Jesse Collings) in moving the second reading of the measure. But, while they all, he thought, heartily sympathized with the object the hon. Gentleman had in view as shown by this Bill, and also with the object he had had in view in doing the great and useful work he had for some time done in the country, it was a matter of serious regret to many of them that the Bill, as it stood, was one which could not be supported. There was no doubt about it that the object of the Bill was to assist labourers—and not only labourers, but those a little above the position of labourers—to become the possessors of small holdings or farms. With the principle of that they heartily agreed; but the question was, whether the Bill before the House would effect such an object, whether it would be a boon to small agriculturists or small people in the country, or be the reverse. Personally, he was inclined to think there were two provisions in the Bill which would turn out to be anything but a boon to the people. In the first place, the chief objection to the Bill was the great responsibility which it entailed upon the ratepayers by the purchase powers. If any Bill could be introduced, or any scheme put forward, or any present Act enlarged or amended by which the small holders could become possessors of small plots of land, he, for one, would heartily support it, and he need hardly say that he would not consider for a moment who it was that introduced it or supported it in the House. He was afraid that in that matter they must not lose sight not only of those who would be benefited by the Bill, but of those who would be injured by the Bill. His first objection to the Bill was founded on the ground of the expense which would be entailed to the ratepayers. His next objection was, that the Bill would offer a direct encouragement to a great number of these people to get into debt. He was afraid they could not do any more unkind act than to encourage small holders to embark upon undertakings which they would be unable to fulfil. There was not only the difficulty as to finding the money to start with, but he was inclined to doubt the ability of the people in view to make the holdings pay in many cases. Now, what were the expenses which the Local Authority must look forward to before it undertook to provide small holdings in any place. The expenses were enumerated in the Bill by one of the clauses. Roughly speaking, they were chiefly these, and he thought it must occur to anyone who had noticed the difficulties with which Local Authorities had to deal in carrying out the Allotments Act, that they would be considerable—the expenses of the valuation of land, and of the examination of titles—he said titles, and not title, because he saw the Bill provided that where possible land should be taken in small amounts from a number of owners of property in preference to being taken from one large owner—expenses with regard to conveyance and the preparation of deeds, and those they knew were great expenses, though he did not lose sight of the fact that in the Bill means were provided by which land could be registered, and so a great deal of the unnecessary expense connected with the transfer of land obviated; and then with regard to the purchase of property, there was the difficulty which had been pointed out by his hon. Friend (Mr. Gray.) His hon. Friend pointed out what was likely to be a willing seller and what was likely to be an unwilling seller. Take the case of the unwilling seller, and there would be a great number of men who would only part with their land on compulsion. A question of arbitration would arise, and anyone who had had anything to do with dealings with public Bodies when they came to arbitration knew what a very expensive method arbitration was. Arbitration proceedings had been sometimes rendered of no avail, because notice had not been served, and dates had been allowed to pass owing to a want of sufficient knowledge, and the arbitration had had to be commenced over again. He had in his mind a case of laying down pipes through a field. In that case, owing to unnecessary delay, the expenses of the arbitration were something very great indeed, something represented by about £70 or £100, when the cost ought not to have been more than about £10. Then there were the expenses attending the borrowing of money from the Public Works Loan Commissioners. He did not mean to say that was considerable, but it must be considered. Then there was the expense of getting much of this land into a fit state for the small holders; they had to provide for water courses and drainage; the matter of rates would not be inconsiderable either, and regard would also have to be had for the expenses of fencing, and so forth. He noticed that in the Bill there were powers granted to Local Authorities to erect buildings. Thus they were at once brought face to face with architects and clerks of works, and so on. All these expenses were possibilities under the Bill, and must be provided for. In the rent the Local Authorities would have to charge the small holders for these expenses, in order to free themselves from the responsibility of incurring debt in the matter. Then there was the question of the expense of the insurance and of the repair of the buildings. All these were questions which must be considered. There was also the question of the collection of rents. The hon. Gentleman the Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) spoke of the collection of rents as being nothing more than the assistant overseer could do. The assistant overseer had power in the case of rates unpaid to summon the ratepayer; but it was a very different matter to collect rent, say, from a man who had left the place, or who was ill, or incapacitated from paying the rent, or had nothing on the place to distrain upon. The difficulties were very different in the case of the collection of rent and in that of the collection of rates in arrear. Then, again, in addition to all this, there was the power pointed out by his hon. Friend (Mr. Gray) with regard to the money to be refunded to a small holder when he was deprived of his holding. A small holder might be deprived of his holding after he had improved it, after he had got his buildings up, and got the land in good condition. The Local Authorities under such circumstances were to pay him 10 per cent for the compulsory repurchase of the land. That, in addition to the amount which would have to be paid for the land, would represent a considerable sum in addition to what he had already mentioned. Again, if the Bill was to be carried out to any extent, and it might be in the neighbourhood of towns, the Local Authorities would have to increase their clerical staff, and have to employ professional assistants—solicitors, and others. All these were expenses which would mount up to a very large sum indeed. Having got together all these possible or probable charges, it would be the duty of the District Council to see at what rent they could afford to let the land. They would have to borrow the money in the first place, and they would not borrow it much below 3 per cent; and in the Bill they had to let the land at 1 per cent more than 3 per cent, that was 4 per cent. In addition to that, they had to put down all the expenses he had spoken of; and he doubted whether they would not add considerably more than 1 per cent, and that would bring the charge up to 5 per cent—5 per cent before they could let the land. The rates and taxes must fall on someone. Take the case of a piece of ground outside a town or village valued, say, at £100 an acre. He had heard it said that land could be purchased at from £15 to £30 an acre; but, still, there was land outside many towns the selling price of which would be as high as £100 an acre. The Local Authorities must let that land at £5 an acre to the small holder, and that would represent a sum which he thought very few of the agricultural labourers would agree to pay for their holdings. He would like to point out, too, the position in which a holder would be under this Bill as compared with the position he would be in if he rented under a landlord. They had heard a great deal of late about bad landlords; but he thought that the worst landlord to be found was the landlord who did not know his own business. The landlord who did not know the value of his land, but who was entirely in the hands of his agent, was the worst of all landlords. In his (Mr. Llewellyn's) opinion, it would be an inestimable boon if men who were born to inherit large incomes would in their early days attend a little more to the business of farming and to the management of their own estates instead of leaving it to agents. They would be on better terms with their tenants, and their tenants would be able, instead of having to approach their landlord through an agent, to go direct to a man who knew something about what they asked, and whether their demands were reasonable or not. He maintained that Local Authorities must of necessity be hard landlords. The rent must be paid to the day; the money was borrowed, the interest had to be paid, and there was no question in such a case of a man being able to ask the landlord to wait until the coming fair next month, when he would be able to sell his beasts. A man would not be able to plead to his landlord that he had had bad luck in one way or another, and he would have no opportunity of working out his rent. If a man rented under a landlord, the produce of his farm, his hay, or grass, or whatever it might be, was often sold to the landlord; his poultry and fruit might be bought by the landlord, or he could give labour to the landlord. In many cases small holders worked out the whole of their rent by their labour. Men acquiring holdings under this Bill would have no opportunities of this kind; their rents must be paid in full to the day, and the consequences would be that at times they would be sorely pressed. It would be very often found that these men had no one to help them. At present, in the part of the country in which he lived there were a great number of small holders of land, holders of from 20 to 30 and 40 acres of land. He did not know how long they held them for; but some of them had held their land for a great many years; but he knew that during times of depression, during the last seven years, for instance, no one had been worse off than these small farmers. They had no landlord to go to to ask for a remission of rent, no landlord to go to to make their position easier in any possible way. They were their own landlords, and their own tenants, and they were the men who suffered most cruelly, because when the money was to be forthcoming the men who had lent them money proved to be harder than landlords, and required their money to the very day. He believed that the tenants under this Bill would be very much in the position of the small holders he had referred to, and he should very much regret that anybody whom he knew at all should embark in this line of farming. With regard to failure again. Suppose a man had a holding of 10 acres, he was very little more than a labourer; he had been a labourer; he had got some money by some means or other, and he was led on by the prospect of getting a little more. Well, he failed from no cause of his own; possibly his failure was to be attributed to sickness, or to having had to pay debts on behalf of someone else, or to a variety of causes. He failed, and perhaps he ran away. It was the commonest thing when a man in such a position got into trouble to go to America for good, or to disappear for a time. What would be the position of the family of such a man? That family would be called upon to meet the payments upon the farm. How was the assistant overseer to get the money? It would be absolutely impossible for him to do so; and as a result of the impossibility of getting the rent, the Local Authorities would have to suffer, and more money would have to be taken up, or else the position of the Local Authority would be a very unfortunate one indeed. The consequence of it all would be that the great number of those who had been successful, and who had managed their farms well, and who had, perhaps, been paying for others, would have to pay over again through the rates, because of the failure of this one man, which might have been brought about by his own mistakes or not. There was another point to be taken into account; how was the Local Authority to interfere in the case of a man who was clearly damaging his property? There was nothing commoner than for an allotment holder to injure his allotment. The allotment might be an acre, or half an acre, or a quarter of an acre in extent, but if it was let to go on badly looked after, and robbed of its goodness, not manured and so on, it would be no longer of the value it was originally; then came a year when such an allotment would have to be taken by some one simply for the sake of getting it into condition again. This was another expense against the Local Authority which must be provided for—they had no power whatever to interfere with bad farming. He did not intend to allude to another Bill now before the House; but, in his opinion, the greatest objection to that Bill was the facilities it afforded to Local Authorities for the borrowing of money. If, in addition to that, there was direct encouragement to Local Authorities to borrow money, they would be placed in a much more serious position than ever. There was another point worthy of consideration in regard to the Bill now under discussion, and that was that direct encouragement was given to people to get into debt. He believed that of all classes in the community there was no class which felt the curse of being in debt more than the agricultural labourer or the cottager. He knew very well that if a doctor's bill or some other bill was owing, it made many of these men thoroughly miserable. There was nothing a cottager disliked so much as being in debt. Now, the Bill spoke of these small holders as owners; but they could in no instance be owners. These men were encouraged to become possessors of the land and were called owners; but this weight of debt was not only put round their necks, but it was made impossible for them to clear themselves of it. However willing a man was to obtain the freehold, he would not be able to do it, but to the end of his days he would be burdened with debt. That in itself to his (Mr. Llewellyn's) mind was a great objection to the Bill, because many a young man, say, of the age of 20 or 25, would work hard and exert himself in every way to clear himself of debt, and to acquire a little property, but no matter how hard he worked, he would not be able to rid himself of debt. He (Mr. Llewellyn) saw also that in the Bill borrowing powers were provided in regard to building. It was provided that the repayment might be spread over a period of 31 years; but that in itself was most objectionable; because if a man who might have put up good buildings met with misfortune, there was the additional charge for buildings laid upon his family for 31 years—his family would be answerable, on account of the payment year after year of the interest upon the money spent upon buildings. If a man lived and made the repayments regularly, he would be upwards of 50 years of age before he found himself clear of debt upon the head of buildings alone. Therefore, he thought he was right in pointing out that in this Bill there was direct encouragement to small holders to get into debt, and the result of that was that the position of those holders would be by no means a rosy one, and in many cases the men would be made unfit for work owing to the weight of debt. The hon. Gentleman the Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) said that under this Bill there would be no possibility of the occupier incurring any responsibility as to the borrowing of money. He (Mr. Llewellyn) did not think that was at all impossible, but that it was very probable. As sure as fate, as long as there were in all country districts men ready and willing to lend money to these poor people, so long would there be people foolish enough to borrow. If a small farmer once got into the hands of the village attorney or money lender, he was worse off than any of the Irish farmers of whom they had heard so much.

Mr. Llewellyn

Mr. BROADHURST said, he never referred to the borrowing powers of the holders themselves.

Mr. LLEWELLYN begged the hon. Gentleman's pardon. He thought that many of these small holders would be ready to get into debt in respect to the stocking of their farms. Many of them would ask money lenders to advance them, say, £100 for the purpose of purchasing cows and ploughs and farming implements generally, and the money lenders were the men of all others who would be the first to get everything they could out of the tenants; they would be at the farm doors almost before the collector of taxes. If a man farmed land with his own money, he might make farming pay; but, if he had money to pay to the money lender, and rent to pay to the landlord, and had in addition to pay rates and taxes, he (Mr. Llewellyn) said, God help the tenant under such circumstances. Now, he had stated his objection to the Bill, and had said with great regret that he could not vote for the second reading of it as it stood. He heartily wished the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham (Mr. Jesse Collings), or some other Member would introduce a Bill by which it would be possible to increase the number of small holdings safely; because he believed that an increase of these holdings would be beneficial to the agricultural population of the country itself; he believed it would be for the good of the land, and for the benefit of a great number of landlords. If it could be done safely, let them do it with all speed; but if they did it, as the Bill proposed, at the expense of the rate-payers, and, in addition to that, at the risk of incurring the responsibility of encouraging these people to take up land that they could not pay for, they would do no good by passing the Bill. There were others he knew who desired to speak, and he would only say that he was reminded of an authority who spoke some time ago upon this subject. Shakespeare said—

"Neither a borrower nor a lender be;
For loan oft loses both itself and friend;
And borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry."

He thought Shakespeare must have had this very Bill in view when he wrote those lines. He (Llewellyn) would also remind the House of one other authority, although perhaps not quite so great as the last quoted authority, an authority with whom he did not at all agree. Artemus Ward said—"Never get into debt, borrow sooner than do that."

Mr. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden) said, that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Llewellyn) had taken up a very strange position. He had told them that he sympathized with the Bill, that he sympathized with the agricultural population, and then he proceeded to show his sympathy with the Bill and with the agricultural labourers by stating that he would vote against the measure. He (Mr. Gardner) would not have ventured to trouble the House at all had it not been for the, he might almost call it, ungenerous attack which was made upon him in his absence by his hon. Friend the Member for the Maldon Division of Essex (Mr. Gray). The hon. Gentleman, who was a Colleague of his own, and his neighbour in Essex, took a somewhat unworthy advantage of his (Mr. Gardner's) temporary absence on Committee business to attack him on account of his absence from the House. [Cries of "No, no!"] The hon. Gentleman opposite said that he (Mr. Gardner) posed as a friend of the agricultural labourer, and yet he was not present on that very important occasion. He supposed that the hon. Gentleman wished people to draw the inference that he (Mr. Gray) was a better friend of the agricultural labourer than himself (Mr. Gardner).

Mr. GRAY said, he was sorry to interrupt the hon. Member, who had taken an entirely erroneous view at second hand of his remarks. He merely referred to the hon. Member for the Saffron Walden Division (Mr. Gardner) as being able to, had he been in his place, corroborate the statement he (Mr. Gray) had made, that within 50 miles of that spot there were agricultural labourers who were unfortunately in receipt of only 9s. a-week, and he gave the hon. Member credit for regretting that such a state of things should be in existence, as he (Mr. Gray) regretted it.

Mr. H. GARDNER said, the hon. Gentleman certainly accused him of posing as a friend of the agricultural labourer, meaning by implication that he (Mr. Gray) was more a friend of the agricultural labourer by being present on this occasion than himself (Mr. Gardner). However, he did not wish to detain the House, but had only to say that he came down from the Committee Room as soon as he could in order to vote for the Bill of the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham (Mr. Jesse Collings), and he did not think he could show himself a better friend of the agricultural labourer than by doing that. He certainly thought that his hon. Friend (Mr. Gray) would have shown his friendship to the agricultural population far better by staying away than by his presence, because he had announced his intention of voting against the Bill.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) said, that everyone would acknowledge that they had had an interesting debate, and had listened to some interesting and important speeches. The second reading of the Bill was moved by the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham (Mr. Jesse Collings) in a speech of much ability, and was seconded in a remarkable oration by the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst). The hon. Member for West Nottingham, after taunting him, turned on the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division, and, with that lofty and imposing air which was such a distinguishing feature of his rhetoric, said that the hon. Member always suffered from ignorance rather than from want of knowledge. What was the difference between the two? He did not altogether follow the hon. Gentleman, but in the course of his remarks he came to the conclusion that in his own person, in connection with this subject, he had been successful in proving that sometimes ignorance and want of knowledge were identical. The hon. Member for West Nottingham proceeded further; he taunted the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division with apologizing for the introduction of his own Bill. How the hon. Member could found such an observation on the speech of the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division he was at a loss to imagine. Then the hon. Member for West Nottingham went on to lecture the Government as to the enormous—the overwhelming importance of this subject. He told the Government they ought to postpone their other measures for the purpose of legislating at once on this subject, so great was its urgency. Why did not the hon. Member practice a little more what he preached? Why did he not impress those views on his former Colleagues on the Front Opposition Bench? When the former Conservative Government was turned out of Office by the Motion of the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division, if ever there was a Party or a Government which was called upon by Parliamentary practice and precedent to deal without delay with this question, it was the Party and the Government of which the hon. Gentleman was himself a Member. So far from following the usual precedents and practice, neither from the hon. Member nor from his Colleagues had one word been ever heard about that subject till that day, when the hon. Member found it convenient to make it a Party weapon. As regarded the Bill, it was by no means a new one. It was an old friend, as it was formerly introduced by the hon. Member for Cheshire, and he had an opportunity of making some observations upon that occasion. He did not know, as regarded the machinery of the Bill, which always appeared to be of a remarkable and peculiar character, he could express his sentiments more accurately than he did on that occasion. But there was this difference between the Bill introduced then and now. The former Bill dealt with the question of allotments as well as the question of small holdings. The Bill now before the House dealt with the question of small holdings alone, the question of allotments having been, as he hoped, successfully dealt with in the past Session. [Cries of "No!"] He did not say that the question of allotments had been finally disposed of. On the contrary, from large and varied sources of information, he believed it to be a fact that although that Bill had given a great stimulus to the provision of allotments by voluntary means, yet where it had been attempted to provide allotments under the operation of the Bill, there it had frequently, he believed, failed altogether. It had failed because the Local Authority constituted under the Bill, the Guardians, had been slack and backward in fulfilling their duty. He was not surprised at that, and he pointed out in the debates on the Bill that the Guardians were not the best Local Authority to whom to hand the responsibility, and he was exceedingly anxious to place the power in the hands of the magistrates instead. The course of experience had proved that he was right in one case, and at least he might be pardoned for supposing, until the contrary was proved, that he might have been right in the other. The time was approaching when that question would be solved by the passing of the Bill now introduced by the President of the Local Government Board. When that Act was passed the new District Councils, which were to be absolutely elective, were to take the place of the rural authority so far as allotments were concerned, and if they failed in the performance of their duty, the voters would have the means of finding a remedy. Assuming the passing of that Bill, the question of allotments would be disposed of, and, therefore, they had nothing but small holdings now to consider. What was the object of the promoters of the Bill? The hon. Member for Bordesley, in his able speech, drew attention to the deplorable diminution in the number of labourers in rural districts; he spoke of the great excellence of the labouring population, and he dwelt upon the necessity of keeping up what he described as the rural stock of the country. He proposed to accomplish his object by bringing about in some way a much wider diffusion of land among the people of this country. In that object he need hardly say that he sympathized. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] He was not the least afraid of expressing his sympathy in spite of the sneers indulged in by hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. He should be disposed to support any reasonable means of obtaining that end, and he could safely say that no measure could be more Conservative in its effects than one leading to a larger distribution of land. More than that, speaking as a landowner—and an owner of a great deal more land than he cared to possess, he was most sorely tempted by the proposition of the hon. Member. The references of the hon. Member to the high price that land fetched in France quite made his mouth water. His virtue was tried in the severest manner, as, for the sake of his personal interest and advantage, he could not but wish the hon. Member's proposals accepted without unnecessary delay. There was no denying the fact that land at the present moment was exceedingly difficult to let, and almost impossible to sell. For the moment, though he hoped it would only be for the moment, in thousands of cases land was an unmarketable commodity. A greater boon could not possibly be offered landowners than legislation of this kind, whatever might be said on its merits, for it provided them with a first-rate market for an article which many were most anxious to dispose of. Although that was the case, and although he was most desirous of accepting the views of hon. Members on the other side of the House, he was bound to remember that he had a duty to perform to those he represented, and he represented in a special degree the rural ratepayers of this country. He should be able to show the House that, however tempting these proposals might be, it was their bounden duty to those they represented to resist them. He did not intend to say much on the question of compulsion. It was a strong thing for any Government to propose to give power to Public Bodies to take land by compulsion; but, at the same time, the principle of taking land by compulsion had been embodied in our legislation, though subject to a condition which he maintained had not been fulfilled in this case—namely, the condition that it should be shown that the compulsory acquisition of the land would confer a great public advantage. He contended that in the propositions which had been submitted to the House an enormous change was involved. They were embarking on an entirely new and, as far as the extent of land was concerned, an unprecedented course. The clearest proof ought to be given that it was for the benefit of the community at large. He contended, moreover, that almost everything we knew of this subject pointed in a directly opposite direction. It was no matter whether we looked at home or abroad. There were masses of evidence on the subject. His hon. Friend spoke of the French peasantry, pointed out their condition, and made what for him was a remarkable admission. The hon. Member admitted that if a judgment were formed from their appearance in the fields the French peasants would be regarded as poor and miserable, but he added that he had followed them to their homes, where ample evidence as to their comfort was to be found. He had not had the advantage of following them into their homes, but he was a Member of a Commission which sat for three years, and which inquired most exhaustively into this subject. That Commission sent out two gentlemen, who also followed the French peasants into their homes, and who gave a very different description of their condition from that given by the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham that afternoon. One of the Sub-Commissioners of the Agricultural Commission, in his report on the condition of the peasants, especially in Western and Central France, said—

“The peasant proprietor exists rather than lives. He has no pride in keeping himself or his cottage clean and presentable. His food chiefly consists of bread made from buckwheat or rye, although wheaten bread is gradually coming into more general use. He very rarely tastes meat, except in the form of pork. His drink, if in a wine country, is made from water poured over the already pressed grapes, from which the juice has been extracted and sold. . . . The peasant owners, examples of industry and thrift carried to excess, slave to get as much out of the land as it can be made to yield, starving themselves and their families to add something to their hoard; their wives becoming prematurely old from field labour, and bent from carrying heavy loads of fodder to the cow at home, content if at the year's end the tale of silver pieces be increased . . . at a sacrifice of all that makes life worth living for.”

That was a description of the state of things existing among the peasantry in France which he had never heard contradicted on at all reliable authority till he heard the statement of the hon. Member that day. He was almost ashamed to refer to the condition of the freeholders in the County of Lincoln. He had himself seen a great deal of their condition. The system of peasant proprietorship had been in existence in that county for years. From his own personal knowledge he could state that it was a fact not to be disputed that during the period of agricultural depression which we had passed through, there was no class of agriculturists in the country which had suffered anything to compare with the misery and poverty of the small freeholders in Lincolnshire. If his views on that subject were doubted, he would refer hon. Members to the Reports of the Agricultural Commission, which contained the most startling evidence on the subject. Then his hon. Friend had referred to Consular Reports in vindication of his views. He had brought down with him the two latest of those Reports which had been presented to the House. One, dated in this present month, was the Report of one of our Consuls in Spain relating to the district of Corunna. That gentleman wrote—

“To give an idea of the great misery that the inhabitants of this province are passing through, it must be understood in the first place that throughout the whole of this province, since the feudal system and Mayorazgo, or entailed estate system, became extinct, the whole of the large properties became subdivided into small farms; this has been going on for years, and, with few exceptions, Galicia now possesses a peasant proprietorship, and the land is subdivided into small tenements more on the style of the market gardens system than anything else I can liken it to. This system is all very well when it is brought to bear on a small tract of land—but when the same embraces a vast province like Galicia, that consists of about 1,032 square miles, with a population of some 1,200,000 inhabitants—it tells its own tale.”

He would now call the attention of the House to a Consular Report from France, which bore directly also upon this question. It dealt with the La Rochelle district, and the Consul's name was Mr. Warburton. He said—

“The year 1887 has been a disastrous one to farmers here, who, notwithstanding the higher protective duties on corn and meat, are in a far worse position than they have ever been before. They have made no money on anything, and have lost heavily in almost everything. . . . Their losses have been enormous, and, however much we may have suffered in Great Britain, I hear of nothing there to compare with the depth of the depression which exists here at present. It is well that this should be clearly stated, because though it is now generally admitted at home that other countries are suffering as well as ourselves, many persons appear to think that it is in a less degree, and that we ought to be better off here inasmuch as we enjoy a certain amount of the ‘Fair Trade’ and ‘peasant proprietary,’ which people were told would bring everything right again. It is not so as far as this district is concerned. No advantage has yet been felt from the moderate protective duties which exist; all are far worse off than before they were put on, and none are suffering so much as those who own their holdings."

He did not think anyone could imagine there was anything in any part of the evidence he had quoted to induce them to believe that a plan such as that which was favoured by hon. Gentlemen opposite had any reasonable prospect of success in this country. If there was any such prospect, he would be glad to recognize it, for he wished to deal with the plan as honestly as he could in the interests of the people. But how was it possible for him to give his support in the face of this kind of evidence? Hon. Gentlemen opposite might laugh at the mention of Protection; yet there was no doubt it must have conferred some kind of advantage on the agricultural classes. It was impossible to believe it could do the agricultural producer harm to put an import duty on the goods which competed with those that he produced in his own country. He had no objection to offer to Protection, and he should view its adoption with great complacency himself, although he confessed that, in view of the small effect that Protection had had in increasing prices, he had been much less keen about Protection than he had been in former days. Still, he was quite certain that, sooner or later, if the proposals made were adopted, they would inevitably lead to Protection. He was confirmed in this impression by something further in this Report. It gave the reasons for the strong feeling in favour of Protection in these terms—

"The circumstances are very favourable to agricultural protection in this country just now. The principle has been fully admitted. It has been tried with corn and meat, and, while bread is no dearer than before, meat is much cheaper. At La Rochelle the loaf of 2 kilos (4lb. 6oz.) cost, in December, 1886, 6*d.*, and in 1887, 5½*d.* Meat was as follows:—In December, 1886, beef, live, 2½*d.* per pound; dead, 5½*d.*; mutton, the same; veal, 3½*d.*, live; 4½*d.*, dead. In 1887 the prices were ½*d.* per lb. lower in every case."

And further on the Consul said—

"Those who might be supposed to be most against it (Protection) are the shopkeepers and working classes in the towns, the working men engaged in public works, factory hands, and people depending on coal and iron industries, &c. All of them have reasons for not objecting. The shopkeepers are doing badly because the farmers have no more money to spend with them, and believe that if they became prosperous they would be good customers again.

The working people in the towns are suffering from competition, owing to the crowding in of farm labourers out of employment, who, they say, would go back to the country if the farm work was better paid and there was more of it."

And again the Consul said—

"Many of the working people think that even if larger duties on corn made bread dearer, they will be more than compensated by the increase in wages which would take place if they are relieved from all this competition. All these classes consider that agricultural protection would benefit them directly and indirectly, but above and beyond them there is a numerous class, who have no apparent interest in getting it, who would suffer from it by paying dearer for everything, and still who would vote for a tax on foreign food imports for no other reason than to prevent the extinction of the small peasant farmers."

If this was the view of the absolute necessity for Protection among the working classes themselves in France, how was it possible for him to hold any other opinion than that if you establish the same system in this country one of the inevitable results will be to lead to Protection? That, however, was an argument for hon. Members opposite much more than for himself to consider. It was impossible to believe from the evidence that the system which prevailed in France had any advantage over the system which prevailed in this country. Was there any reason for believing that a different system in England would result in greater production? Major Craigie, in his paper on Agricultural Holdings in England and Abroad, read before the Royal Statistical Society, showed from four different sources, one confirming the other, that in every respect the produce per acre in England is greater than it is abroad. He said—

"England holds the first place as a stock-rearing and grain-growing community. Her flocks of sheep represent just ten times those of Belgium on the same area, three times those of France on the same area, and nearer four times than three times those of Germany. As regards cattle, Holland, Belgium, and Germany have more cows than we have, but then our cows hold a different rank from the poor beasts of burden which they often are abroad. We have in England more than Austria for each square mile, more than France, and many more than Hungary or Sweden; while as regards oxen generally we head the list with ease."

Nor was our superiority in crops limited to corn alone. In England the yield of potatoes was 252 bushels to the acre; in Austria 109, in France 113, in Holland 172, and in Sweden 123. Indeed, full examination would show that in respect of the amount of produce per acre the system pursued in England beat all other systems. As to the £25,000,000 worth of butter, eggs, poultry, &c., which we imported, other countries produced them under a double advantage; the people cultivated their lands with the benefit of the duties imposed upon the same kind of articles imported into those countries; and they exported their produce to this country under the influence of what was practically a very heavy bounty upon the articles exported. An average acre of land would produce seven tons of potatoes, and the foreign producer had an advantage as against the English producer of 14s. a-ton in sending potatoes to the Birmingham market. This was equivalent to a bounty of £4 18s. per acre which the English farmer had to pay to a Railway Company before he could compete with foreign produce in the same market in this country. This was only one instance of the unfairness and injustice with which the agricultural interest in this country had been treated, and to which it was determined to submit no longer. As to the machinery of the Bill, he dwelt at length on that two years ago. To illustrate the risks and liabilities it might entail, he had made a calculation with regard to Dorchester, the account of which he happened to find in the Municipal Corporation Directory, which had a population of 6,000, with 1,000 ratepayers and a rateable value of £20,000. Suppose 20 ratepayers wanted small holdings of say 20 acres each, that would be 400 acres altogether. What would be the price that would have to be paid for the land? It must be remembered that people who wanted small holdings would never be content with the worst land. He did not wish to put an extravagant price on the land; but he did not think he would be exaggerating in putting it at £30 an acre. That would give a total cost of £12,000. Three-fourths of that, or £9,000, was under the Bill to remain unpaid, and the interest on that at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, together with a sinking fund at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, would amount to £540. Then something must be allowed for registration expenses, and he had put them at £100. Then loans were to be made to the individuals who acquired small holdings as capital for working the land, and that could not be put at less than £10 an acre, or £4,000. The interest and sinking fund at $3\frac{1}{2}$ and $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent respectively upon that sum would amount to £240. Under Clause 38 of the Bill powers were given to the Local Body to borrow money for improvements; and, putting the sum borrowed at £2,000, the interest and sinking fund with respect to that would amount to £120. Then there were the expenses of management, repairs, law charges, and a variety of other things which he estimated to come to about £145 a-year. These items in all made up an annual expenditure of £1,145. Even taking out all the items except interest and sinking fund in respect of the purchase-money and the loans to individuals, the annual outgoings would be £780. Under the Bill those who acquired holdings were to pay 1 per cent more than was paid by the Local Body for the money borrowed for the purchase of the land. Charging them, therefore, $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on the three-fourths of the purchase-money remaining unpaid, and 6 per cent on the individual loans, the total receipts would be only £645, against an absolutely necessary expenditure of £780 and a probable expenditure of £1,145, leaving a deficit as regards the latter sum of £500. To produce £500 from a rateable value of £20,000 would require a rate of 6d. in the pound. He had omitted from this any payment for damages on account of guarantee of titles, and he had assumed that the Local Authority sold as dear as it bought, had no land idle, and no arrears of any sort and no reductions. The House might take this calculation for what it was worth. He did not think any hon. Member, if he examined the figures closely, could say that he had exaggerated anything. He was quite sure that, generally speaking, these matters were conducted much more economically by individuals than by Corporations. However much he sympathized with the object of the hon. Gentleman, he was of the strongest possible opinion that the Bill was not at all calculated to give effect to it. If the Bill passed, it would throw enormous possible risks on the ratepayer, and on that ground alone, if on no other, he found it quite impossible to support it. No one could be more anxious than he was to see a wider distribution of the land among the people of the country, and he was strongly tempted by his own personal interest as a landowner to go in the direction the hon. Gentleman asked him to follow. He would be very glad if some means could be devised by which, on a small scale, some tenements of this sort could be founded; but he could not conceal from himself that it would be absolutely impossible, at all events until the Local Government Bill was carried into law. No one could deny that this was a question of the largest and most supreme importance, involving some of the greatest changes ever witnessed in this country, and it was not a question to be hastily settled and decided after a four hours' debate on a Wednesday afternoon. He hoped, therefore, that no attempt to close the mouths of hon. Members upon it would be made. If it were, he should certainly oppose it, as he should oppose the Bill in its present form itself, if it reached a Division to-night.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Long) (Wilts, Devizes): I think it will be for the convenience of the House if I now state the point of view from which Her Majesty's Government regard this Bill. It is hardly necessary for me to express the sympathy which we in common with everyone who has spoken to-day feel in the establishment, by legitimate and wise means, of peasant proprietorship in this country; but, Sir, while that sympathy is shared by us, I am not prepared to go as far as the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst), who at an earlier period of the evening seemed to infer that if we changed altogether the system of land occupation in the country, and were to terminate large and create small farms, the agricultural distress under which we have so long suffered would be entirely removed. I cannot endorse a sentiment of that nature, nor can I believe that the view of the hon. Gentleman would be endorsed by the opinion of practical agriculturists. I do not think he is right in laying so much blame on the system as he does, when he tells us that it is to the existence of large holdings throughout the country that so much distress is due, and that ruin had overtaken so many of the landed classes. I venture to point out to the House and to the hon. Member himself, that whatever may be the fault of the present system of land owning and land occupation, it is hardly in accordance with facts that his statement is made, because a great many of the holdings which are, at the present moment, large, have become so by the failure of the smaller holdings which preceded them. Not only have the large holdings been created by the absorption of the smaller holdings, but in many parts of the country, and I speak particularly of the district in which I live, there are many small holdings, and I regret to say also a long record of small holders that failed very seriously four years ago, and whose places from necessity, not from choice, have been absorbed into the larger holdings. Therefore, it is incorrect to say that the large holdings are the cause of the existing agricultural depression. I regret that the hon. Gentleman has referred to the action of the landlords in the terms he thought fit to use. Have we not heard enough abuse of landlords generally? [An hon. MEMBER: No!] I desire to introduce no Party feeling into this discussion; but those who say "No!" I trust constitute a very small minority. If there is one reason more than another why small holdings have not been set up where they might with advantage be set up, and where the owners of the soil would be as glad to see them established as those who may desire to occupy them, it is the expense of erecting the necessary buildings. That has been the reason, and I cannot help contemplating with serious apprehension an attempt on the part of some hon. Members of the House to suggest that what landlords have been unable to do owing to the great expense attendant upon it, Local Authorities should do. But while I regard a proposal of that sort with some apprehension I do feel that there is no subject to which the attention of the House in debate can be with greater purpose addressed once or twice in a Session, than a subject similar to that which we are now considering—namely, whether it is possible for Parliament, with safety and fair security, to facilitate the establishment of a system of peasant proprietaryship in this country. But I do not think that any measure which embodied the wishes of those who desire to see that system established, would be facilitated in its progress through this House by such a speech as the one delivered by the hon. Member for West Nottingham earlier in the afternoon. It was my misfortune not to hear the speech of the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham (Mr. Jesse Collings), who moved the second reading of the Bill, but I have heard many of his speeches, and have no hesitation in joining in the chorus which from all quarters of the House has acknowledged how my hon. Friend has identified himself with the cause of the agricultural labourers throughout the country. I am not making that admission for the first time; last Session, when it was my duty to offer some remarks to the House in connection with another portion of the small holdings question, I made what I considered to be but a fair and proper admission—namely, that the question had been brought to its then acute and prominent form in consequence, to a large extent, of the labours of the hon. Member for Bordesley. Sir, I regret that this Bill is one which it is impossible for the Government, or those who agree with the Government, to accept, because it is a Bill which, as has already been pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), proposes to throw upon the Local Authorities a very large and heavy responsibility. As I stated, it was my misfortune not to be present when my hon. Friend spoke; but I have not been able to hear from those who were present, that he gave to the House any evidence of there being any large or general demand for these small holdings, which, I think, he suggests should be limited to 40 acres. Now, I think that when we are asked to agree to the second reading of a Bill containing such important proposals, the House ought, first of all, to be satisfied that there is a real demand for 40-acre holdings in the country; and, in the second place, that there are no means of getting such holdings. When we were last year discussing the Allotments Bill hon. Members on both sides of the House produced evidence from all parts of the country where demands were made for land which had never been satisfied. I very much regret that the references to that Act were made in a tone which, of course, we, on this side of the House, cannot appreciate; and it does seem to us a little hard that our Act having been attacked, we are precluded from saying one word in its defence. But I have no doubt an occasion will arise when we shall be able to discuss the working of that Act, and I shall then be able to acquit the Government of the charges which hon. Members opposite have brought against us, and give our reasons for the delay which has occurred in connection with the Act in different parts of the country. If the demand for small holdings has not been proved, how is the second reading of a Bill to be justified, which puts upon Local Authorities the heavy responsibilities which have been described. The Bill would throw upon them a real risk at this time, inasmuch as it would make them practically the owners of considerable portions of land, because it is possible that when these powers are conferred on Local Authorities the first result would be a demand in certain neighbourhoods that the powers of the Bill should be enforced, and that these small holdings should be created. Supposing that a demand should grow up, and supposing that the Local Authorities, in the discharge of the duties laid upon them in the Bill, should acquire the necessary land for distribution as proposed here, is it an exaggeration to say that there would be a very heavy risk entailed on the ratepayers who would have to provide the Local Authorities with funds, that in three or four years the operation might turn out to be a failure, that the occupation of the land by those for whom it was intended might come to an end, and that the consequence would be that the Local Authorities would be charged with the maintenance of the land, which would lay upon the rates a very heavy burden? Under these circumstances, we cannot help feeling that there does exist in the Bill a principle which would involve a very great risk for the ratepayers in future. The hon. Member for West Nottingham, in the appeal which he made at the conclusion of his speech, expressed his desire that the landowners should do their duty. He said that they had not done their duty in the past, and he referred also to the burdens already borne by the rates. I cannot see that, by agreeing to the Motion for the second reading of the Bill, we should have any prospect of the burdens on the rates becoming in future less than they are now. On the contrary, I am of opinion, as I have shown, that those burdens are likely to be increased. I do not want to go into detailed criticism of the Bill of my hon. Friend, the second reading of which I understand he moved in a speech of a very moderate character. I understand also that he would be willing to consider Amendments to the Bill in Committee. But, Sir, there is in the Bill that which we cannot possibly accept—namely, the duty cast upon Local Authorities of providing holdings which cannot be acquired without the expenditure of a very large sum of money; and, further, that there are facilities for spending large sums of money which we believe would, in some cases, result in very heavy and grievous burdens being placed on the ratepayers. These are not times when risks of that kind ought unnecessarily to be undertaken. I do not think the hon. Member for West Nottingham, or the hon. Member for Bordesley himself, would for one moment contend that there would be the demand for the small holdings provided for in the Bill that there has been for small holdings in the form of gardens or allotments. The hon. Gentleman will, I believe, admit that these two questions are absolutely distinct. It may be urged that every man in the country is entitled to have sufficient land to cultivate for his wife and children in form of garden allotments, and that is a proposal I never have and never will oppose. But it is quite different here, where the principle is to invite Local Authorities to become owners of land in order that quasi-ownership should be conferred on people who it is alleged are unable to get any land. The hon. Member for West Nottingham said that building societies were doing a great deal of good in the country, and that he thought it time that agricultural labourers should have the opportunity of obtaining land just as there are now afforded to artisans opportunities of becoming owners of their houses. By all means let societies be started, and let hon. Members who believe there is a demand for these holdings, and that land can be acquired and sublet or partially sold to individuals without loss accruing to themselves, band themselves together, and I can undertake to say that landowners will be very ready to sell them land. I do not think there will be any difficulty in the way of buying land in any part of the country, except where perhaps land may have a special value from particular circumstances, and that is not of the class which my hon. Friend would wish to deal with under this Bill. Of ordinary land productive and fit for cultivation, there is abundance to be had, and if, as I have said, hon. Members believe there is a real demand for these small holdings, and if they have real confidence in the prudence of their proposals, I invite them to form themselves into a society, such as the hon. Member for West Nottingham has indicated, for the purpose of acquiring and distributing land in the manner suggested. I have read with some amazement that there is a curious difference made in the Bill with regard to the treatment of the original owner from whom the land is to be bought, and the small owner to be created by the Bill. The original owner from whom the land may be taken compulsorily is to part with it at the price which a willing buyer would give to a willing seller without any compensation for compulsory sale; but, if for some purpose the Local Authority desire to re-acquire the land they are to be compelled to give the small owner the market value, and have to pay 10 per cent for compulsory purchase. But, Sir, if it be fair that 10 per cent should be paid to the new owner whom it is proposed by the Bill to create, it is surely fair that it should be given to the original owner who has obtained his land without assistance from Parliament. It only remains for me to say that we very much regret that we should appear in any way unsympathetic with a proposal which, divested of its political associations and partisan characteristics, is one in which, in and out of the House, we, as much as hon. Gentlemen opposite, sympathize from the bottom of our hearts. We desire to advance in every way possible, either by individual or collective efforts, or by the efforts of Parliament, the position of the labouring classes of the country. We sympathize as much with a proposal of that kind as anybody on the other side of the House; we do not wish to maintain any monopoly of this sympathy, and we only ask that the same fairness shall be extended to us as we extend to others. We desire that the question of the amelioration of the condition of the working classes of the country should be approached with an open mind, and with the desire to meet and support proposals tending in that direction when they are practical and when they are safe, but we feel that we cannot, for the reasons which have been given, assent to the measure now proposed. As my right hon. Friend the Member for the Sleaford Division has said, there is now before the House a very large measure of Local Government to confer upon Local Authorities increased powers for dealing with local affairs, and, if it were proved to be our duty, we should only be too willing to consider whether any further facilities should be given under the Local Government Bill to County Authorities to assist in the establishment of this system of peasant proprietorship, but further than that it would be impossible for the Government to go, and it is with regret that we feel ourselves unable to accept the measure of the hon. Member for Bordesley.

Mr. Long

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby) said, he did not wish to import any personal feeling into this discussion; but there had been a fair issue raised on the Bill, whether it was desirable to give additional powers for creating small holdings in this country. That was a fair issue, and upon it difference of opinion might exist. He should support the Bill of his hon. Friend the Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham (Mr. Jesse Collings), as he supported a Bill exactly similar when he occupied a seat on the other side of the Table in 1886. At that time the hon. Member for Bordesley, unfortunately, was not present in the House, and the Bill was brought forward by another hon. Member. And the reasons for and against it were identical with those which had been advanced on the present occasion. At that time the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) appeared, as he had done to-day, as the opponent of the measure, and in that respect he had been entirely consistent; and there was an hon. and learned Gentleman behind him who succeeded in talking out the measure, but who, in view of the fact that the House of Commons was now considered a reformed institution, he hoped would not follow the same course to-day. He thought they had had an instructive and interesting debate, and that they might now very well take the opinion of the House upon the Bill. He did not quite understand the argument which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division had urged against the Bill when he said that if you create too many proprietors you might have Protection brought back into the country, and that argument was received with loud cheers from hon. Gentlemen who sat behind him. Now, if the right hon. Gentleman was convinced by his own argument, he would be one of the most strenuous supporters of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. Long), who spoke for the Government, had dealt with the subject of small and large holdings. He (Sir William Harcourt) was not going to say anything against the landowners of the country. He believed they had made a large expenditure for improving the land, and he did not believe that there was any class who had expended so much upon the land in which they lived as the English landlords. He believed the system of large holdings was adopted some 30 or 40 years ago under the idea that it was best for the interest of agriculture; but he thought it had been shown that this investment of capital was not wise, and that it had been found that the smaller holdings had been better able to stand the pressure of bad times than the large holdings. He knew of parts of the country where the holdings were small, and where they had stood that pressure better than the larger holdings. [Mr. CHAPLIN: Occupiers or holders?] Both occupiers and holders. He had lived in the same county as the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Long), and he was acquainted with a number of small holdings that were prosperous in that county. It was the same in Hampshire, where the occupiers had begun in a very small way. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sleaford did not know the habits of those very small holders; he had a knowledge of the great holdings of Lincolnshire, but if he would come down into Hampshire he would find men who had, from 30s. a-week, been able to farm and stock with advantage small holdings.

Mr. Long

MR. CHAPLIN: When the right hon. Gentleman says I have no knowledge of small holdings, because there are none in my county, let me remind him that in Lincolnshire there are ten times as many small holdings as there are in any other county in England, and that it is entirely from the wretched condition of those holdings that I have formed my opinion.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he accepted the right hon. Gentleman's statement, and would only say that the holders of small holdings in his county had mostly begun with less than £200 in pocket, and that the system which obtained there he should be very glad to see extended. Then he said it was not at all necessary to have those expensive buildings which had been referred to; of course, the small holders required buildings for a pig and a cow; but those calculations of Gentlemen opposite running to thousands of pounds were entirely contrary to the facts of every-day life as regarded small holdings. That, he thought, was a conclusive answer to the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Local Government Board. The Bill did not put any compulsion on the Local Authorities, who would only have to do what was required by the community electing them, and they would be men who would know the value of the holdings; they would be elected by the community who would make the demands upon them, and if no demand were made then the work would not be done. For these reasons he thought that the proposals of the Bill might fairly be left to them to carry out. The language of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Local Government Board almost led the House to believe that the Bill compelled the Local Authority to lay out this money. But they would lay out no money which they did not desire to lay out; and, that being so, he thought the power might very reasonably be given to them which was asked for in the Bill. And here he would like to mention that the Government had some responsibility in refusing the second reading of the Bill, because in dealing with the Glebe Lands Bill they had held it out as a method of supplying additional small holdings, and it was said that the landlords throughout the country had failed altogether to provide the means for acquiring land which were necessary to effect transfers. Having stated the reasons why he should vote for the second reading of the Bill, he hoped that the House would now go to a Division on the Motion of the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston) rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 135; Noes 194: Majority 59.—(Div. List, No. 113.)

Original Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. MUNTZ (Warwickshire, Tamworth) said, that, unlike some hon. Members opposite, Gentlemen on that side of the House had been waiting all day with the desire of speaking on this subject; and he thought it was somewhat hard that when a few minutes were left in which he might have expressed his views, the hon. Member for the Ilkeston Division of Derby (Sir Walter Foster) should move "That the Question be now put." He sympathized heartily with the desire and the action of the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham (Mr. Jesse Collings) on behalf of the agricultural labourer; but, while he did so, he did not sympathize with the Bill before the House. He thought that Bill contained innumerable errors, and that it was calculated to do incalculable mischief to the class intended to be benefited. For that reason he should give the Bill his most strenuous opposition. He had addressed large gatherings of agricultural labourers in various parts of the country on the subject, and should, no doubt, do so in the future; and he believed he should have no difficulty in securing their sympathy with the view he entertained on this particular question. His view was that the agricultural labourers could be benefited by allotments, but could not be benefited by small holdings such as the hon. Member for Bordesley proposed. An allotment was beneficial to the agricultural labourer because he could devote his leisure hours to its cultivation, and do so in conjunction with his ordinary labour for which he was paid wages. But a small holding was a totally different matter.

It being half-an-hour after Five of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed To-morrow.

MOTIONS.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 5) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the Boroughs of Devonport, Okehampton, Ramsgate, and Sandwich, the Local Government Districts of Crumpsall and Royton, and the Richmond Main Sewerage District, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 265.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 6) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the Borough of Brighton and Town of Hove, the Darenth Valley Main Sewerage District, and the Local Government Districts of East Barnet Valley, Friern Barnet, and Herne Bay, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 266.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 7) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the Boroughs of Blackpool and Wigan, the Rural Sanitary District of the Chesterfield Union, and the Local Government District of Tredegar, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 267.]

MUNICIPAL BOUNDARIES (DUBLIN) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Murphy, Bill to provide for the extension of the Municipal Boundaries of Dublin, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Murphy, Mr. T. D. Sullivan, Mr. Timothy Harrington, and Mr. Chance.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 268.]

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 17th May, 1888.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEES—First Report—East India (Hyderabad Deccan Mining Company) [No 177].

Mr. Munts

Special Report—Committee of Selection (Standing Committees).

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES; CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS; CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS; CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE; CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART; CLASS V.—FOREIGN AND COLONIAL SERVICES; CLASS VI.—NON-EFFECTIVE AND CHARITABLE SERVICES; CLASS VII.—MISCELLANEOUS; REVENUE DEPARTMENTS, VOTE ON ACCOUNT, No. 2.

PRIVATE BILL (by Order)—Third Reading—Folkestone, Sandgate, and Hythe Tramways, and passed.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Court of Session and Bill Chamber (Scotland) (Clerks) * [269]; Technical Instruction * [270].

Second Reading—Employers' Liability for Injuries to Workmen [145], debate adjourned; National Debt (Supplemental) [264], debate adjourned.

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL—Third Reading—Metropolitan Commons (Chislehurst and St. Paul's Cray) * [193].

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, owing to the continuance of his indisposition:—

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

EAST INDIA (HYDERABAD DECCAN MINING COMPANY) (FIRST REPORT).

SIR HENRY JAMES reported from the Select Committee on East India (Hyderabad Deccan Mining Company), That they had made progress in the matter to them referred, and had come to a Resolution, which they had directed him to report to the House, and the Resolution of the Committee is as followeth:—

That the Committee having received applications from the Nizam of Hyderabad, the Hyderabad Deccan Mining Company, the Sirdar Diler Jung, Mr. Witham Clarence Watson, Mr. Henry Parkinson Sharp, and Mr. James Graham Stewart to be represented by Counsel before the Committee, the Committee are of opinion that it will be advisable to allow Counsel to represent the said Applicants for the purpose of assisting the Committee to such extent and purposes as the Committee may from time to time direct.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 177.]

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Select Committee on East India (Hyderabad Deccan Mining Company) have leave to hear Counsel (to such extent as they shall think fit) upon the matters referred to them."—(Sir Henry James.)

SIR EDWARD WATKIN (Hythe) asked, whether it was intended by the Resolution which had been moved by the right hon. and learned Gentleman to impose any restriction upon the most searching inquiry?

SIR HENRY JAMES (Bury, Lancashire) said, there was no intention of putting any limitation upon the inquiry. It was, however, intended to impose a limit upon the action of Counsel in matters which the Committee did not think it necessary to inquire into. They thought it was necessary to assert their right to control Counsel.

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Select Committee on East India (Hyderabad Deccan Mining Company) have leave to hear Counsel (to such extent as they shall think fit) upon the matters referred to them.

QUESTIONS.

—o—

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—IRISH SUNDAY CLOSING ACT—A. E. FLEURY, DISTRICT INSPECTOR OF LISBURN.

MR. P. M'DONALD (Sligo, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether A. E. Fleury, reported in The Lisburn Standard, of April 14 last, as having been appointed incumbent's churchwarden, at a meeting of the annual Easter Vestry of the parish of Christ Church, Lisburn, held on the 4th of April last, the Rev. Arthur J. Moore, M.A., in the chair, is the Constabulary District Inspector of Lisburn; and, whether Mr. Fleury was present at said meeting, when a Resolution in favour of the continuance of the Irish Sunday Closing Act and its extension to the five cities now exempted was passed unanimously; and, if so, whether it is in conformity with the Regulations of the Service for a member of the Constabulary Force to accept or hold any such appointment, or to support, or to assist in the passing of a Resolution at any meeting condemnatory of any Act of Parliament which it is his duty to enforce?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Inspector General of Constabulary reports that it is the case that District Inspector Fleury was appointed incumbent's churchwarden at Lisburn. A meeting was held at which a Resolution in favour of the Irish Sunday Closing Act was passed. As a matter of fact, Mr. Fleury took no part in the discussion, nor was he, as far as I am aware, present. There is no Rule providing that men in the position of District Inspector should not occupy such a position as that of churchwarden; but the Inspector General recommends the Force not to join Local Bodies.

MR. P. M'DONALD: Do I understand that Mr. Fleury was not present when the Resolution was passed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He was not present, as I understand.

VENEZUELA—INSULTING NEWS-PAPER ARTICLES.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether his attention has been called to recent articles published in The Port of Spain Gazette, with reference to the articles which appeared in a Spanish paper called El Venezolano, published in Trinidad, and containing language insulting to Great Britain; whether he is aware if the paper in question is the property of General Guzman Blanco; and, whether the Government is prepared to take any steps to prevent the publication in one of Her Majesty's neighbouring Possessions of articles openly inciting the Venezuelans to attack Her Majesty's Colony of British Guiana?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (SIR JOHN GORST) (Oatham) (who replied) said: The attention of the Secretary of State has been called by a letter from the hon. Member to an article of the nature referred to. The Secretary of State has no information as to the ownership of El Venezolano; and, as this newspaper is stated to circulate in Trinidad only among a few Venezuelans, Her Majesty's Government do not think it necessary to take steps to prevent the publication in it of such articles.

SCOTLAND—ORDNANCE SURVEY.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the most highly cultivated counties of Scotland, Fife and the Lothians, are to have no better Ordnance Survey than the old 6-inch scale, since the last Report says nothing of any new survey on the larger scale?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University), in reply, said, it was intended to take up the revision of the Ordnance Survey of Scotland as soon as the re-survey of Lancashire and Yorkshire had been completed. That would be in about four years. It could not be done sooner.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked, if it could be done on a larger scale than the present?

MR. PLUNKET: Yes; when the re-survey is made.

COAL MINES REGULATION ACT, 1887
—THE BANK HALL AND OTHER COLLIERIES.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that no attempt has yet been made to comply with Section 12 of "The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887," at the Bank Hall Colliery, Burnley, the Townley Collieries, or the Cliviger Colliery, respectively; on what date, or dates, since the 1st of January last, the said collieries were respectively inspected by the District Inspector of Mines; and, whether he reported the total absence of weighing machines at each of the above-named collieries; and, if so, what steps he proposes to take in the matter?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): The reason that no attempt has been made at these collieries to comply with Section 12 of the Act of 1887 is that they have been working in accordance with exemptions granted under the Act of 1872. It is a legal question whether these exemptions are now in force; and I informed the House some days ago that steps are being taken to have this question settled by a prosecution in a Court of Law. The Bank Hall Colliery was visited on January 25 and 26; the Townley Collieries on February 11 and April 23 and 24; and the Oliviger Colliery on January 28 and March 24. The absence of weighing machines was brought to my notice shortly afterwards.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—CLERK OF PETTY SESSIONS, BALLYMENA.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) (for Mr. PINKERTON) (Galway) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Mr. James Giffin, merchant, Ballymena, on the 7th of May last, ordered a summons from the Clerk of Petty Sessions against Constable Haughny, for abusive language; whether the Clerk filled the summons, and handed it to Alexander Bell, summons server, to have it signed by a magistrate; whether Bell went to the Hon. John Young, J.P., D.L., and requested him to sign the summons; whether Mr. Young, after refusing to sign it, tore the summons into pieces, threw them at his feet, and said to the process server—"You can report me, if you like;" and, whether, under these circumstances, the attention of the Lord Chancellor will be called to the matter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): It is the case that the magistrate referred to refused to sign the document presented to him, requiring that the case should be proceeded with by civil summons. An application for a civil summons was a few days afterwards made at the Court of Petty Sessions, at the suggestion of Mr. Young, before the magistrates, who were unanimous in refusing it, thus showing that the magistrate had exercised a proper discretion. I do not think that, under these circumstances, it was necessary that the attention of the Lord Chancellor should be called to it.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON asked that he might be allowed to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to what appeared to him to be the gravamen of the matter—namely, that Mr. Young, J.P., D.L., tore up the information and threw it at his feet and said—"You can report me if you like."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, Mr. Young was not at home, and he could not answer the Question contained in the last paragraph but one.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—DEFALCATIONS IN BALLYMENA UNION.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) (for Mr. PINKERTON) (Galway) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware of defalcations in connection with Ballymena Union, through the acts of the late clerk, F. A. Mathews, to the amount of £1,700; whether, before his appointment as clerk of the Union, he had been found guilty of dishonesty in his previous clerkships; whether the auditor (Major Studdart) always certified the accounts as being correct, and bonds of relieving officers as being produced, when, in point of fact, some of the sureties were dead; whether he is aware that a section of the Board are opposed to any inquiry, while other Guardians are in favour of an inquiry being held; whether the Local Government Board have been memorialized to grant a sworn investigation, and if he can state their reason for refusing to grant it; whether he is also aware that Mr. F. A. Mathews was High Constable, and that the office has since been filled by another nominee of the Grand Jury, without due notice, and without competition; and, whether, under the circumstances, he will order the Local Government Board to grant a sworn inquiry?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The reply to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. Mr. Mathews held the office of clerk of Ballymena Union for a period of 42 years, having been elected in 1846. I have no information as to the alleged dishonesty on his part before his election. The accounts of the Union have been certified by Colonel Studdart, auditor, as correct down to the time he discovered the defalcations. At each audit of the accounts the bonds of the relieving officers were produced. Colonel Studdart is not aware that any of the sureties are dead. I have no knowledge as to a section of the Board of Guardians being opposed to any inquiry. The Guardians did adopt a Resolution asking for the holding of a sworn inquiry as to the entire business of the Union. The Local Government Board replied that if specific charges were preferred against any responsible officers they would consider the propriety of instituting an inquiry. Mr. Mathews's defalcations are under investigation by a committee of the Guardians, assisted by the Local Government Board Inspector. If charges affecting any of the remaining officers of the Union are submitted to the Local Government Board the propriety of ordering a sworn inquiry will be considered.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON asked the Chief Secretary, how it was that the Local Government Board were so reluctant to take action in a case of this kind; whereas in the case of the Listowel Union they had of their own initiative taken action and held an inquiry? He asked, whether the difference in politics made any difference in the action of the Local Government Board?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the difference in politics made no difference in the action of the Board. He saw no sign of reluctance on the part of the Board to take necessary action.

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS (IRELAND)—THOMAS SWEENEY.

MR. D. SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.) (for Mr. LEAHY) (Kildare, S.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether Thomas Sweeney, the National School teacher, of Ballyroe Leinster Lodge, County Kildare, whose health has broken down with chronic bronchitis and asthma, has been ordered by the doctors to go to a warm climate, and to enable him to do so he has applied to the Commissioners of Education for a retiring gratuity instead of a pension, which application has been backed by the Reverend James Doyle, P.P., who knows the peculiar state of the case; whether, he being over 55 years of age, a Treasury Rule operates against this course; and, if he will take into consideration the necessity of relaxing this Rule, so as to grant him a sum sufficient to enable him to follow the doctor's advice, and the only way they think of saving his life?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): I am sorry that nothing can be done by the Treasury to meet this distressing case; but the Teachers Pension Act of 1879 does not allow the grant of gratuities to male teachers retiring at 55 years of age and upwards; and the Treasury has no power to alter the Rules laid down by that Act in favour of a particular teacher.

LAW AND JUSTICE—CONFESSION OF MURDER—THE KIDBROOKE LANE MURDER (1871).

MR. BOORD (Greenwich) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a report published in the Sydney newspapers of 13th and 14th of March, to the effect that a labourer named Michael Carroll had on the previous Sunday (11th March) confessed to the murder of Jane Maria Clousen in Kidbrooke Lane on the 25th of April, 1871, giving at the same time particulars sufficient to show that he was well acquainted with the locality and the circumstances connected with the commission of the crime, and stating that he had served in the British Army, from whence he had twice deserted; whether it is true that Carroll was discharged from custody on receipt of a telegraphic message from the Police Authorities in London that there was "not the slightest ground for his confession," and that he was "not the murderer;" and, if so, whether he can say by what means the London police were enabled to arrive at so prompt and definite a conclusion without having seen the prisoner, or having received fuller particulars than could be given in a telegraphic communication; and, whether he will inquire into the circumstances of the case, considering that the late Lord Chief Justice Bovill rebuked the police for withholding important evidence which conflicted with their theory of the murder?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I have seen a newspaper report of the confession of Carroll on March 11. In reply to telegram from the Sydney police, asking whether the man should be detained, the Scotland Yard Authorities replied that they did not consider this man to be Clousen's murderer, and that he might be liberated after his statement had been recorded, and they asked that the statement might be forwarded. This statement has been since received, and in the opinion of the police is not reliable. The police were not aware of any evidence or suspicion which would have warranted the detention of Carroll. With regard to the strictures passed on the police concerned in the case by the late Lord Chief Justice Bovill, I must refer my hon. Friend to a statement made in this House by Mr. Secretary Bruce on July 31, 1871.

RIOTS AND DISTURBANCES (IRELAND)—TENT SERVICES OF THE IRISH EVANGELIZATION SOCIETY.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If tent services held at Gortnessy, County Londonderry, under the auspices of the Irish Evangelization Society, have been disturbed by Nationalists for several nights, the tent wrecked and the services stopped; whether the population in the district is chiefly Presbyterian, and if they have suffered from attacks of stone throwing by parties of Roman Catholics on their way to or from the services; and, if he will take steps to protect this community in the exercise of their religious privileges?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The local Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that the tent services in question have been on several evenings disturbed by the lower class Roman Catholics of the district, and that attempts have been made to wreck the tent. The better class Roman Catholics, however, have expressed their intention to use their influence to prevent these proceedings. The population in the district is mainly Presbyterian. It is alleged that on one evening stones were thrown at the congregation when returning home. The police have adopted full precautions to prevent a recurrence of this disgraceful behaviour.

TORQUAY IMPROVEMENT ACT—STREET PROCESSIONS.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What is the number of persons who have been imprisoned for violation of the provisions of the Torquay Improvement Act with respect to street processions?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Thirty-three persons have been committed to prison in default of sufficient distress and payment of the penalties imposed for offences under the 38th section of the Torquay Improvement Act.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER asked whether, having regard to the fact that 33 persons had been sent to prison for violation of a clause inserted in a Private Bill, against the views of the Government of the day, and without the knowledge of the House being called to it, he would introduce a Bill to repeal the clause?

MR. MATTHEWS said, he was afraid he must take time to consider that matter.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER gave Notice that if the Home Secretary did not bring in such a Bill he (Mr. Henry H. Fowler), at the earliest opportunity after Whitsuntide would ask leave to bring in a Bill with that object.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.) asked the Home Secretary, whether the Government would be prepared to bring in a short Bill to repeal the clause interpolated into the Torquay Harbour Act of last year, and so put an end to this question?

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester) asked whether, in view of the pledge given to the hon. Member for East Wolverhampton to bring in a Bill to the effect stated, the Home Secretary had the power, and would use it, to represent to the Torquay magistrates his intention to do so, and thus induce them to postpone any further action under the clause of the Torquay Act?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no intention of the kind stated by hon. Members opposite, nor could I properly interfere with any further action of the magistrates under the law they administer.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, whether he would consider the possibility of introducing into a Provisional Order Bill now before the House, by which the Local Authorities of Torquay sought fresh powers, a clause repealing the clause of the existing Act dealing with street processions?

THE FIRST LORD (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, it was obvious he could come under no such obligation without full consideration and full notice of the desire of the House.

MR. CONYBEARE gave Notice that he would move the rejection of the Provisional Order Bill.

INLAND REVENUE—LAND COMMISSION OFFICE—STAMP DISTRIBUTOR.

MR. D. SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.) (for Mr. M'CARTAN) (Down, S.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he is aware that there is no stamp distributor attached to the Land Commission Office at Dublin, and that persons requiring copies of orders or other documents there are obliged to pay the fees in stamps, and cannot obtain any stamps at the Land Commission Office; and, whether, considering the inconvenience and delay involved thereby, he will take into consideration the appointment of a stamp distributor at that Office?

THE SECRETARY (MR. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): It is the fact that there is no stamp distributor at the Land Commission Office; but the necessary stamps can be obtained at the post office about 100 yards distant. This being so, I cannot believe that any serious inconvenience can arise; and as there are serious objections to the appointment of a stamp distributor within the office, I can hold out no hope that the suggestion of the hon. Member will be adopted.

IRISH BOARD OF WORKS—ADVANCES TO THE MACGILLYCUDDY OF THE REEKS.

MR. ARTHURO'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) (for Mr. KILBRIDE) (Kerry, S.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, How much money has been advanced to The MacGillycuddy of the Reeks by the Board of Works since the year 1879; what is the Poor Law valuation of the property on which this money is chargeable; how much, if any, of this loan has been paid back into the Treasury; who inspected the works for which this money was advanced; and, what provision is made to satisfy the Board of Works that money advanced for drainage purposes is so expended?

THE SECRETARY (MR. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): A total amount of £7,625 has been advanced for the improvement of land since 1879 on this estate, the annual valuation of which is £1,353. Of this amount £150 has at present been repaid. The works were inspected by two of the Inspectors appointed for such purposes. Issues on account of such loans are only made upon certificates of the Board of Works Inspectors as to the amount expended on the works.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked, if the hon. Gentleman could state the character of the inspection in cases of this kind; and, whether the Treasury had any assurance as to the nature of the improvement effected by means of the loans?

MR. JACKSON said, he did not know whether the Treasury had any direct concern with the inspections while they were being made; but when he himself had been in Dublin at the end of last year he made some inquiry into this question, and he understood that the first inspection which was made before the loan was sanctioned was an inspection as to the value which would accrue to the property supposing the works to be carried out. He was informed also that as the works progressed, and before each instalment was paid, there was an inspection of the works which had been done up to the time. Therefore, it was clear that there was an inspection for the purpose of satisfying the requirements that the loan should be made, and also that the instalments were only paid after other inspections.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Does the Inspector see the receipt for the money expended?

MR. JACKSON said, he was afraid he could not say that. Besides, he was not sure whether the Inspector would rely upon the receipts; because he (Mr. Jackson) could conceive cases where a receipt might be produced for an amount in excess of what the Inspector deemed to be the value of the work. Therefore, he took it that the Inspector judged by his expert knowledge as to the actual value of the work performed.

SCOTLAND—CROWN LANDS OR BISHOPRIC REVENUES OF ORKNEY

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON (Wick, &c.) asked the Lord Advocate, What amount of money was received by the Government for the sale of the Crown Lands or Bishopric Revenues of Orkney; and, to what purpose was the money so received devoted?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): The amount of money received for the sale of Crown Lands or Bishopric Revenues of Orkney is £50,465 17s. 9d. It was not received by the Government, but by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, as part of the capital of the Land Revenues of the Crown, and applied in accordance with the Land Revenue Acts of Parliament to the purchase of real estate for the Crown, or to extinguish charges on other property of the Crown Land Revenues.

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON asked, whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman could state what portion of this money was devoted to the extension of public parks in London?

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD: I am quite unable to answer that Question.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS—FATAL ACCIDENT AT NEW MILFORD STATION.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the statement of Colonel Rich, one of the Inspectors of the Board, after an inquiry held in July, 1887, as to a fatal accident to a boy named Reeves while working at the fish stage at New Milford Station, that the railway and station yard were most dangerous, and had been so for many years, and to the recommendation—

“That the Company be required to fence their property at once, and the Company should be urged to build a foot-bridge across their railway for the safety of their own servants and of the numerous labourers that are employed;”

whether about 600 men and boys are employed in and about the fish traffic and similar duties at New Milford Station; whether the Board of Trade has made any subsequent representations to the Railway Company; whether the Railway Company have as yet done anything to carry out Colonel Rich's recommendations; and, whether he will include cases of this nature of defective traffic accommodation among the matters for which he will ask for extended powers for the Board of Trade in the Bill recently foreshadowed?

THE PRESIDENT (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BRACH) (Bristol, W.): Yes, Sir; Colonel Rich's Report on the accident in question has been before me, and the circumstances are practically as stated in the Question. A copy of the Report was sent to the Railway Company; but the Board of Trade have no power to compel the erection of a bridge. Negotiations, however, are pending, which the Board of Trade hope will result in the erection of a bridge; but I may add that had a bridge been in existence at the time the accident would not have been prevented. The case seems to be one of those as to which I indicated that, in my opinion, further legislation would be possible.

Mr. Jackson

LOTTERIES — THE CASTLETON-BY-ROCHDALE LIBERAL ASSOCIATION.

MR. KNOWLES (Salford, W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a lottery, promoted by the Castleton-by-Rochdale Liberal Association, to be drawn on the 7th of July, in which the value of the prizes is stated to be £50, application for tickets being invited by the Secretary, Draw Committee, Liberal Club, Castleton; and, whether, if this is the case, he will communicate with the local police, with the view to such proceedings being taken as, under the circumstances, may be necessary?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; my attention has been drawn to this lottery, and I am now in communication with the local police.

WAR OFFICE — TRANSPORT OF SUPPLIES TO NAVAL COAL DEPOTS ABROAD.

CAPTAIN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.) asked the Secretary of State for War, with reference to his reply to a Question on the 13th of September last, Whether he has found it practicable to give the House information as to the approximate total annual charges for the transport of troops, for the supply and conveyance of purely military stores, and for the maintenance of garrisons at each of the naval coal depôts abroad; and, if so, when he proposes to give that information?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR DEPARTMENT (Mr. BRODRICK) (Surrey, Guildford) (who replied) said: The time of the War Department has been so much over-occupied since the Question of my hon. Friend in September last that it has not been practicable to get together the information he asks for. I hope, however, to be able to furnish it at no distant date; but some very important questions affecting coaling stations are now under consideration by a small Inter-Departmental Committee, and it may be well to reserve the answer until their Report has been received.

ADMIRALTY—THE RUSSIAN SQUADRON IN THE PACIFIC.

CAPTAIN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the statement, that the Russian Squadron in the Pacific consists of one iron-clad and five cruisers, is founded upon authoritative information; from what source such information was obtained; and, what are the names, armaments, and speed of the vessels composing that Squadron?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The statement I made with regard to the strength of the Russian Squadron in the Pacific is correct in every detail. It is not desirable to communicate the sources from which such information was received. The Squadron in question is composed of one belted frigate, two corvettes, three clippers of small tonnage, and seven gun vessels, of which four are practically condemned. I am not prepared to give, on the authority of the Admiralty, the further particulars asked for.

METROPOLITAN STREET TRAFFIC—BLOCK AT HYDE PARK CORNER.

MR. COCHRANE-BAILLIE (St. Pancras, N.) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he will consider the desirability of having another entrance made into Hyde Park between Knightsbridge Barracks and Albert Gate owing to the continually increasing block of traffic at the latter place?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University), in reply, said, he was not quite sure that, as far as the traffic inside the Gate was concerned, the change suggested would be an improvement. He had nothing to do with the outside of the Park; but if any representations were made to him by the Local Authorities in the sense of the Question of his hon. Friend it would be very carefully considered.

COMPANIES, &c. ACT, 1862—LIQUIDATION OF COMPANIES.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he is now in a position to state anything as to the Return asked for in reference to the liquidation of Companies under the Act of 1862; and whether, if the production of the full Return asked for would be difficult or expensive, he would undertake to give a Return for two years, 1866 and 1867, as an example, showing the time occupied by and cost of liquidations under this Act?

THE PRESIDENT (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): I have ascertained that a Return can be given showing the names of Companies in liquidation since 1862, and of the solicitors and liquidators, with the dates of commencement and closing of liquidation, but not including the costs of liquidation, or the amounts realized and distributed amongst the creditors. But the Lord Chancellor has directed inquiry to be made as to the reasonable practicability of giving the complete Return for two years, as suggested by the right hon. Gentleman.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—THE COUNTY OF LONDON—DIVISION INTO TWO COUNTIES.

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, having regard to the vast population within the district of the Metropolitan Board of Works (the proposed limits of the County of London), he would object to that area being divided into two counties, one for the north side of the River Thames, and another for the south side; or whether he would consent to the business, both civil and criminal, arising on the north side of the River Thames and that on the south side of the River being transacted by separate authorities and officials?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): Her Majesty's Government would not be prepared to assent to any proposal that the Metropolis should be divided into two counties, or that the business of the County Council of London arising on the north and south sides of the Thames should be transacted by separate Authorities.

EXCISE DUTIES (LOCAL PURPOSES) BILL—THE VAN AND WHEEL TAXES—MILITARY TOLL GATES.

MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in view of the fact that Van and Wheel Taxes are about to come into force, he will consider the justice and expediency of causing the military toll gates in the neighbourhood of Rye and elsewhere to be removed?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR DEPARTMENT (Mr. BRODRICK) (Surrey, Guildford) (who replied) said: The tolls received for the military road are used in aid of the maintenance of the road. If the County Board will undertake to maintain the road there will be no objection to the abolition of the tolls.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—RATES ON GOVERNMENT PROPERTY.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN (Hythe) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, under the Local Government Bill, the Treasury will continue to contribute to Local Authorities money in lieu of rates on Government property?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The arrangement under which the Treasury make contributions to Local Authorities in lieu of rates on Government property will not be affected by the provisions of the Local Government Bill.

INDIA—ESTABLISHMENT OF WOOLLEN INDUSTRIES IN BRITISH INDIA.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether Her Majesty's Government has received any information from the Government of India relating to the import of wool into British India from Thibet, and the prospect of the profitable establishment of woollen factories within British territory in India?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Oatham): No special Reports have been received; but the Trade Report shows that last year 3,464 cwt. of wool were imported into British India from Thibet. The factories established on the Baree Doab Canal and elsewhere are said to be doing fairly well.

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—GRANT OF LAND IN RICHMOND PARK FOR VICARAGE.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether an application has recently been made to the Office of Works, or to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, to grant a piece of land in Richmond Park or in Petersham Park for the erection of a Vicarage; and, if so, whether any, and what, answer has been returned to such application?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University), in reply, said, a Memorial was presented through the Home Office last February to this effect, and the usual preliminary inquiry was made. Information, especially as to the position of the desired site for the vicarage, was requested by letter from the Vestry Clerk on the 16th of April, but no reply had yet been received; and, pending the receipt of this information, the consideration of the Memorial is necessarily postponed.

MR. BRYCE asked, whether the House might understand that no definite action would be taken in the matter until there had been an opportunity of ascertaining its opinion?

MR. PLUNKET said, he could not answer for the action which the Office of Woods might take.

MR. BRYCE gave Notice that he would address further Questions on the subject to the Secretary to the Treasury.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—SUB-COMMISSION, CO. DUBLIN.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) (for Mr. CRILLY) (Mayo, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If any date has been as yet fixed for the next sitting of the Land Sub-Commission Court in the County Dublin; and, if so, would he name the date fixed upon?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Land Commissioners inform me that no date has yet been fixed.

PRISON REGULATIONS (IRELAND)—DERRY GAOL—FATHER M'FADDEN.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a book, containing a copy of the Prison Rules, was excluded from a selection allowed in to Father M'Fadden, in Derry Gaol; and, if so, can he explain for what reason?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The General Board inform me that the Governor of the gaol declined to give the book referred to to the rev. gentleman, inasmuch as it was not one of those sanctioned by the Visiting Justices. The Visiting Justices had previously pointed out that all the Rules were hung up in his cell.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON asked, was the right hon. Gentleman aware that there was any other matter objectionable in the book except the Prison Rules; and, whether there would be any objection in the case of a first-class misdemeanant obtaining these Rules?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that was a question which lay with the Visiting Justices, and not with himself.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—THE CORK POLICE COURT—MR. J. C. GARDINER, R.M.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any, and if so what, steps will be taken to insure the attendance of a paid magistrate at the Cork Police Court in the event of Mr. J. C. Gardiner, R.M., at present Stipendiary Magistrate in Cork, being employed out of the City of Cork to assist in forming a Court under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Mr. Gardiner, while engaged in his other duties, experiences no difficulty in securing the attendance of local magistrates at the police court; and, if necessary, the attendance of another Resident Magistrate is arranged for.

DR. TANNER asked how it happened, then, that the Court had had to be adjourned altogether on last Thursday week, in consequence of the absence of Mr. Gardiner, and of any of the other friends and employés of the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked for Notice of the Question.

DR. TANNER asked if he had not last year addressed a Question to the right hon. Gentleman on the subject; and if the right hon. Gentleman was not then obliged to acknowledge that, owing to the absence of the Resident Magistrate and the inaptitude of the local magistrates, the business of the Court was completely and absolutely stopped?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he was afraid that this and many other Questions addressed to him by the hon. Gentleman had escaped his memory.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—CHAPLAIN TO THE SKIBBEREEN UNION.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is a fact that the Protestant chaplain to the Skibbereen Union receives a yearly salary of £20; and, if it is true that there are at present, and have been for a considerable time, only two Protestant inmates of the Union?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I am not able to answer the Question fully at present; I will give fuller particulars later. This salary of £20 has been given to the Protestant chaplain since his appointment in 1868. I believe there are at present three Protestant inmates in Skibbereen Workhouse; that does not, of course, include casuals.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—SENTENCE AT THE NEWMARKET PETTY SESSIONS.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to a sentence imposed at Newmarket Petty Sessions on last Friday, by Mr. O'Neill Segrave, R.M., and W. Monan, Esquire, upon a man named Daniel Pigott, of six months' imprisonment with hard labour; and, whether the statement made by Sergeant Walton, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, that the man was said to be of unsound mind, and was some time previously to have been sent to a lunatic asylum, will procure a medical investigation of the man's mental condition prior to the carrying out of the sentence?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. A. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I am afraid I cannot give the hon. Member any information on the subject at the present moment.

Dr. Tanner

DR. TANNER: When will it be convenient to the right hon. Gentleman to answer?

[No reply.]

DR. TANNER (appealing to the Deputy Speaker): Mr. Courtney, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman to be courteous enough to give me an answer?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member is the last person in the House I should desire to be discourteous to. I cannot give any answer at present, as I have not got the requisite materials by me.

Subsequently, Dr. TANNER repeated the Question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This case was heard before Captain Segrave, R.M., and a local Justice of the Peace, Mr. Langford. Pigott was charged with having committed a most dangerous assault on his wife with a spade, causing serious injuries to her head. Sergeant Walton stated that the man had once been examined by a medical man, who refused to certify that he was not of sound mind, but that he (the sergeant) thought he was not always in his right senses. There does not appear to have been any evidence that he had been in a lunatic asylum. The sentence was as stated in the Question. Should the Prison Authorities have any reason to doubt the man's sanity, they will, of course, take such steps as they may deem necessary in his case.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (IRELAND) ACT—SERVICE OF REQUISITION FORMS.

MR. D. SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.) (for Mr. H. CAMPBELL) (Fermanagh, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can now state the result of his inquiries as to the practice adopted by the Poor Law Unions in Ireland, with regard to the service of the requisition forms under the Representation of the People Act?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I find by the Report of the Union clerks that the general practice is to deliver the requisition forms by hand to the persons rated, or leave them at the rated premises. In about 50 Unions, however, some of the forms were sent by post, chiefly in cases where the persons taxed lived at a distance.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—SERVICE OF MAILS, NEWPORT, CO. TIPPERARY.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether he received a Memorial from the inhabitants of Newport, County Tipperary, praying to have a mid-day arrival and morning despatch of mails in connection with that town; and, what steps, if any, he has taken to meet the wishes of the Memorialists?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): A Memorial such as the hon. Member describes was received from Newport, County Tipperary, in October last; but as it was found that the existing service in connection with the night mail was carried on at a loss, I was unable to sanction the additional expenditure for the establishment of a second post.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—SUB-COM-MISSION AT CARLOW.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Land Sub-Commissioners are likely to sit next at Carlow for the purpose of hearing the large number of cases of which notice has been given?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Land Commissioners inform me a Sub-Commission will commence its sitting in the County Carlow on the 4th of June.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR.
J. J. THERRY, J.P.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) (for Mr. JOHN O'CONNOR) (Tipperary, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. John J. Therry, J.P., of Springvale, Kildorrery, County Cork, has been adjudicated a bankrupt; and, if so, whether he will be retained on the Commission of the Peace?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.) hesitated to rise.

DR. TANNER: Is this Question convenient to the right hon. Gentleman to answer?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed by the Lord Chancellor that Mr. Therry has been adjudicated a bankrupt, and has ceased to hold the Commission of the Peace.

POST OFFICE—PROVINCIAL POST-MASTERSHIPS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) asked the Postmaster General, On what principle vacant Postmasterships in the Provinces are filled up; whether, in the case of several recent appointments to important offices in Provincial towns, officers of the Registered Letter and Money Order Departments have been appointed; and, whether, as the filling of such vacancies by a process other than that of selection from the general body of Postmasters retards promotion in this class of public servants, he will explain the grounds of these appointments?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The Question of the hon. Member would seem to imply that promotion to the more important post offices is by right confined to those who are Postmasters already. But such is not the case. When one of these post offices becomes vacant candidates are invited from all parts of the Post Office Service; and out of these candidates the Postmaster General selects the one whom he considers the best fitted for the duties to be discharged. Out of more than 200 such appointments which have been filled during the last 10 years, I find that one has been given to an officer of the Money Order Department; while the Registered Letter Department has received none at all.

THE CROFTERS—EMIGRATION FROM STORNOWAY.

MR. A. SUTHERLAND (Sutherland) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is the fact, as stated in the newspapers of Tuesday last, that 25 crofter families, or a total of 113 souls, left Stornoway on the previous day for Manitoba; and, whether he can inform the House how much land the emigration of these 25 families or 113 souls has been made available for those who remain?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): Eighteen families have started from Lewis for Manitoba, numbering about 100 souls. Of these, two have left crofts, and 16 were cottars who had been squatters on crofts. I am unable at present to state the area of land thus vacated, or the relief to township common pasture, as I have not particulars of the distribution.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government to continue to send cottars and crofters from Lewis during the Whitsuntide Recess, the Government having refused to lay before the House the scheme under which the crofters were sent?

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD said, the assumption in the last part of the Question was incorrect. The scheme was in print, and had been laid before Parliament. It was not intended to send any further emigrants from Lewis; but he expected some would be going from the Island of Harris.

MR. HUNTER asked, when the scheme would be in the hands of Members?

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD: Tomorrow.

MR. A. SUTHERLAND asked, what arrangement had been made with regard to the tenant right of these crofters?

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD said, a letter had been sent pointing out to the factor of the landlord that an arrangement would be made by which any land that would be vacated was to be made available for the neighbouring crofters; but he could not speak in detail.

MR. HUNTER said, he would like the right hon. and learned Gentleman to explain to the House why these crofters had been sent away before any Parliamentary authority had been obtained?

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD: An opportunity will be afforded for entering into that matter?

In reply to Mr. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn),

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD said, that the selection of the crofters had been made by Mr. Malcolm M'Neill, who was a man with a great deal of experience of the Highlands.

MR. HUNTER gave Notice that on the Motion for the adjournment of the House he would call attention to the policy and action of the Government in this matter.

Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald

AGRICULTURE—THE VOTE FOR DAIRY INVESTIGATION.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.) asked the Lord Advocate, in regard to the sum of £5,000 to be voted for Dairy Investigation, How much of that sum it is proposed to allocate to Scotland, and also to whom it is proposed to entrust its distribution; and, under what conditions it will be granted?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): The proportion of the sum for which a Vote is asked as between the different parts of the Kingdom has not been fixed. The distribution will be arranged by the Privy Council. The final adjustment of the conditions under which the grant is to be given is not yet made.

EMIGRATION—ASSISTED EMIGRATION FROM SCOTLAND.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether Her Majesty has had under consideration a Memorial from Fraserburgh in regard to assisted emigration on behalf of fishermen and others; and, whether the same assistance will be given to fishermen on the East Coast as has been offered on the West Coast of Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): The Memorial referred to has received the consideration of Her Majesty's Government; but at present the colonization scheme is necessarily limited to the crofting population of the West Highlands and Islands.

LAW AND JUSTICE—SENTENCES OF FLOGGING AT LIVERPOOL ASSIZES.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether each of the prisoners who were sentenced to be flogged at Liverpool Assizes on Monday last had inflicted bodily harm upon any person; and, if so, what was the nature of the injury done in each case?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I understand that these men were found guilty of robbery with violence. According to a newspaper report of the proceedings, the Judge remarked that they might have been tried for inflicting grievous bodily harm. In one case the man attacked had two or three ribs broken; and in another the prosecutor's head was cut, and he was struck in the mouth. In each of the other three cases there was a violent assault committed, in one upon a woman, and in another cuts were inflicted with a knife.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS.

Mr. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars, &c.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether a Circular Letter has been recently addressed by the Civil Service Commissioners to Civil Service writers employed at the various outposts, informing them that they will be shortly discharged from the Customs Department, and that, if they are prepared to come to London at their "own expense, employment could probably be found for them shortly after their arrival;"

whether this will have the effect of compelling their removal to London (in many cases with their families), and subject them in consequence to much expense and hardship, or in the alternative to practically enforce their retirement from the Service, contrary to the statement of the Secretary to the Treasury, made on the 15th of July, 1887—

"That there was no desire on the part of the Government to inflict any injustice on the writers, nor to force them out of the Service;"

and, whether, having regard to the fact that most of these writers have been employed for many years in their present posts, the Board of Customs will reconsider their decision?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): A Circular Letter as described was sent by the Civil Service Commission without consultation with the Treasury. I am distinctly of opinion that if any copyists are removed for the benefit of the State from the outposts to London the Treasury should allow travelling expenses; and, further, they will be ready to consider any cases which, in the opinion of the Customs, would involve hardship.

ADMIRALTY—DEVONPORT DOCKYARD—EMPLOYMENT OF SEAMEN IN PRIVATE DUTIES.

Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is the fact that some eight seamen belonging to the Indus are continually employed by the Admiral Superintendent of the Devonport Dockyards in his garden, and upon domestic duties in his official residence; whether the services of these men are allowed him in addition to the £200 per annum voted to him in lieu of servants; whether he can state the total cost to the country of these seamen in pay, provisions, and allowances; what was the cost of the floating bath recently constructed and equipped by Steam Reserve artificers with Government material for the use of the Admiral's family, and out of what Vote in the Estimates was the cost of such labour and material defrayed; and, what was the cost of transforming and furnishing the Dockyard Lower School into a card-room and billiard-room by the Director of Works Department for the use of the Admiral Superintendent and his friends, and under what Vote was the cost of the material and labour of such work accounted for?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing), in reply, said, the insinuation running throughout the Question that the Admiral Superintendent had made improper use of his position for his own personal convenience was wholly unfounded. The eight seamen referred to formed a boat's crew, who had been employed in their legitimate duties, and not in the house or garden of the Admiral. The floating bath was for the use, not of the Admiral's family, but of the officers generally. The alterations in regard to the billiard-room had been sanctioned by the Admiralty for the use of the Dockyard officials; and similar billiard-rooms had for some time existed both at Portsmouth and Chatham.

MR. P. STANHOPE (Wedgesbury) asked, if it was to be laid down as a general principle that sailors were to be available for domestic service?

[No reply.]

EAST INDIA (CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS)—REPEAL.

Mr. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Government of India has taken, or is about to take, any step for securing the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Act in that country, in addition to temporarily suspending its operation; whether Her Majesty's Government is prepared to make to the Government of India any representation with the view of securing that repeal; and, whether Her Majesty's Government is prepared to make to the Government of India any representation with the view of securing the repeal of those provisions in the Cantonment Acts which give powers to the Local Government to make Rules and Regulations for inspecting and controlling houses of ill-fame, and for licensing and compelling the examination of prostitutes?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The power of repealing Acts of the Indian Legislature is vested, by Act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 67, in the Council of the Governor General for making Laws and Regulations. The Government have no intention of interfering—nor have they the power to interfere—with the discretion of that Body in making, repealing, or amending laws. The directions given to the Government of India as to the Regulations to be framed under the Cantonment Act will be found in the despatch which I have laid on the Table.

MR. JAMES STUART asked, whether the House was to understand, from the hon. Gentleman's reply, that the Government, while condemning certain Regulations as immoral and ordering their removal, were unwilling to take any steps for removing that legislation which authorized them, and, in some cases, encouraged them.

SIR JOHN GORST: The Legislature having entrusted a particular Body in India with the duty of making and amending the laws, it would be highly unbecoming of Her Majesty's Government to interfere with them.

MR. STANSFELD (Halifax): Does the hon. Gentleman mean to assure the House that in the history of the relations of Her Majesty's Government with the Government of India there are no precedents of advice or counsel being given by the Secretary of State to the Government of India?

SIR JOHN GORST: That being a Question of precedent, it is only fair that I should have Notice of it.

MR. JAMES STUART: Does the hon. Gentleman know that advice was given to the Government of India by Her Majesty's Government four years ago?

SIR JOHN GORST asked for Notice of that Question also.

MR. STANSFELD: In consequence of the answer of the hon. Gentleman, I beg to give Notice that on the 5th of June, on which day my hon. Friend the Member for the Crewe Division (Mr. M'Laren) has obtained first place for a Notice of Motion, he will move a Motion in favour of the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts, or those portions of them which authorize or encourage either the compulsory examination of women or the regulation of prostitution, and on that occasion he will undoubtedly endeavour to obtain a decision from the House.

INDIA — PROTECTION OF YOUNG GIRLS.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether a numerously signed Memorial was presented, in September last, to the Governor General of India, from the Ladies' Committee of the Calcutta Missionary Conference, and from other women in India, praying that the protection afforded by "The Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885," to young girls under 16 in this country might be extended to India; whether it is the case that the Governor General has replied to that Memorial refusing its prayer; whether such protection is afforded to girls under 16 in Russia; and, whether a Treaty has been concluded between this country and Russia, which came into force a year ago, by which provision is made for the extradition from India to Russia of persons accused of seducing girls under 16, which persons are thus liable to be delivered up from India to Russia, to be there tried for what is not a crime in India itself?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The Secretary of State has no knowledge of the facts stated in the first two paragraphs of the Question. Protection is afforded to girls under 16 by Section 373 of the Indian Penal Code. The answer to the last two paragraphs is in the affirmative; but the 18th section of the Russian Treaty provides that its stipulations

Mr. James Stuart

"Shall be applicable to the Colonies and Foreign Possessions of Her Britannic Majesty, so far as the laws for the time being in force in such Colonies and Foreign Possessions respectively will allow."

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—SUB-COMMISSIONERS, CO. Wicklow—FAIR RENTS.

MR. BYRNE (Wicklow, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that a large number of originating notices have been served to have fair rents fixed by the Sub-Commissioners now sitting in the County Wicklow; whether only 22 applications have been listed for hearing from the Shillelagh Union, 42 from Baltinglass Union, and 134 from Rathdrum Union; and, whether, considering that a very large number of cases will be left undisposed of in the county, he will arrange to have a supplemental list issued for the present Sub-Commission, or have another Sub-Commission granted to sit on an early day?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Land Commissioners inform me that the numbers stated in the Question are correct. All notices received from the County Wicklow up to and including the 27th of September last have been listed for hearing at the present sitting. The Commissioners cannot, having regard to the claim of other counties, extend the existing list of cases, or arrange at present for a further Sub-Commission sitting for the County Wicklow.

WAR OFFICE—THE INNISKILLING FUSILIERS.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.) asked the Secretary of State for War, If he is aware of the widespread discontent among the non-commissioned officers of the Inniskilling Fusiliers at Aldershot consequent on their being passed over in promotion in favour of the junior sergeant but one, in the filling of the post of Quartermaster Sergeant; is he aware that several general complaints have been made by the men so passed over; and, whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the truth or otherwise of the allegations contained in the General Reports with a view to removing the discontent so prejudicial to discipline?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The promotion of non-commissioned officers to the Regimental Staff is effected by the selection of the man whom the Commanding Officer considers to be best fitted for the post, irrespective of seniority. In this case the action of the Commanding Officer has been fully approved by the General Officer commanding the Brigade, and I decline altogether to interfere in the matter.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—CONVICTION OF JAMES M'KEON FOR RE-ENTRY.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the case of James M'Keon, who was tried before Colonel Turner and Mr. Maloney, Resident Magistrates under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, at Manorbhamilton, 9th May, and sentenced to 14 days in Sligo Gaol for re-entering a farm from which he had been evicted in October last; whether he is aware that the County Court Judge, in issuing a decree for possession, also made an order to the effect that in the event of M'Keon paying or tendering one year's rent within a certain time he might regain possession of his holding; whether the defence on 9th May was that such tender was made, but refused, unless costs were paid; whether the ruling of the County Court Judge was denied by Messrs. Hewson and Frazer, the complainants, who it was alleged were in Court when the ruling was given; whether there was some delay in obtaining a copy of the ruling from Mr. Harris, Clerk of the Peace, yet such copy of the ruling arrived before the Court of Petty Sessions broke up, though M'Keon had in the meantime been sentenced; and, whether, under the circumstances, the sentence on M'Keon will be set aside, and some compensation given for injury inflicted and loss of time?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): James M'Keon was tried before Mr. Turner, R.M., and Mr. Molony, R.M., on a charge of forcible entry and detainer of the house from which he had been evicted at the complaint of his landlord. M'Keon pleaded guilty to the charge, and was sentenced to 14 days' imprisonment without hard labour. He did state that the County Court Judge made an order that if he paid a year's rent within a certain time he might regain possession. He produced no evidence, written or otherwise, to sustain this statement, which was denied by the agent, Mr. Hewson, on oath, and by the landlord's solicitor, Mr. Fenton. The written decree of the Judge was produced to the Court; but showed no such ruling on its face as that alleged by the defendant. The charge against M'Keon had been adjourned before it was heard for two weeks, which was ample time for him to procure any proof of his innocence, if such existed. Nothing is known of the alleged arrival of any document, or copy of ruling in connection with it.

MR. CONWAY: Has the right hon. Gentleman made any inquiry of the Clerk of Petty Sessions with regard to the document furnished by the defendant; and is it not a fact it was read by the Petty Sessions Clerk to the magistrate before M'Keon was sent to gaol.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he was afraid he had given all the information in his power.

MR. CONWAY said, he should put a further Question on the subject.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—JUDICIAL OATHS—THE PRESBYTERIANS.

MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether it is the custom that when a Presbyterian desires to swear by the uplifted hand, in accordance with his legal rights, he is almost invariably asked in the Irish Courts of Law, "Do you believe that form of oath is binding on your conscience?" whether such a question is asked in virtue of any statutable requirement; and, if so, can he indicate where this statutable requirement is to be found; and, whether, as this inquiry is looked upon as an insult by many of those to whom it is asked, he will consider how best to put a stop to this or similar questions being asked in future?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN) (Dublin University): I am making inquiry as to the existence of the custom referred to in the Question; but from the information I have it does not seem to universally prevail. If the hon. Gentleman will kindly postpone the Question until after Whitsuntide, I will be able to give him a complete answer.

PRISONS (SCOTLAND)—DISCHARGE OF PRISONERS FROM BARLINNIE PRISON.

MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether the Government have yet arranged any plan for the discharge of prisoners from Barlinnie Prison which will be free from the inconvenience to the neighbourhood, amounting to a public nuisance, caused by the present system?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities), in reply, said, that arrangements to meet the difficulty had been adjusted subject to the approval of the Treasury, in which Department the matter was at present receiving consideration.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—ALLEGED MAINTENANCE OF CROWN WITNESSES.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact, as sworn by Cullinane, the Crown witness in the Lisdoonvarna Moonlighting case, that he and others had been kept in the pay of the police, and housed and maintained in a certain house in or near the Ballyrough Road, Dublin; whether he can state the cost of maintaining such lodging house, and whether it is accounted for under any, and which head, of the Irish Votes; and, whether he will state the number of Crown witnesses who have been thus housed and maintained during the last three years; and whether any, and which, of them have been convicted of any, and what, offences?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I have as yet received no Report in reference to this matter; and I am, therefore, unable to give an answer to the hon. Member.

MR. CONYBEARE said, if it would suit the convenience of the right hon. Gentleman, he should repeat the Question after Whitsuntide.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

ADMIRALTY—DEVONPORT DOCKYARD —THE FIREMEN.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether any, and what, means were taken to ascertain the fact, as recently stated by him, that the firemen employed in the Devonport Dockyards are satisfied with the present arrangements; whether it is the fact that two Petitions detailing their grievances had been some time previously forwarded to the Admiral Superintendent from the turn-cocks and engine-drivers and stokers; and, whether they received a reply to the effect that "the matter has been considered, and nothing can be done in it"?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The Admiral Superintendent of Devonport Dockyard informed me that the men were generally satisfied; and that, upon his informing them if they wished to give up this duty and the remuneration attached to it they could do so, they declined to take that course. The cost of the extra arrangements for dealing with fire in all the Dockyards, except Devonport, does not exceed £35 per annum. At Devonport, where different conditions exist, the cost of provisional arrangement introduced in 1886 was £960 per annum; and because the Admiral Superintendent has made some changes by which this excessive cost is reduced to £210 per annum, the hon. Gentleman has put to me nearly 30 Questions in support of the former extravagant system.

WAR OFFICE—COMPETITION FOR SUBALTERNS OF MILITIA.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Why it was that whereas 75 commissions were offered at the last competitive examination for subalterns of Militia only 63 were given; and, whether any change has recently been made in the system of marking?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle), in reply, said, that 75 commissions had been given at the last competitive examination for subalterns of Militia.

WAR OFFICE—THE "FIELD EXERCISES."

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in view of the recent changes, it is intended to issue a new edition of the field exercises; and, whether it is a fact, as stated by many booksellers, that the present edition is out of print?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle), in reply, said, that it was intended to issue a new edition of the field exercises.

WAR OFFICE—POWDER AND AMMUNITION BARGES IN THE RIVER THAMES.

COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether a new barge contractor has recently, by his neglect, placed the arsenal and town of Woolwich in great danger by leaving powder and ammunition barges unattended in the river Thames; whether about 750 tons of explosives were in the deserted barges, and that, with the adjacent powder ship and Government barges, a total of 2,000 tons of ammunition and powder was involved in risk; to whom would the people of the Metropolis look for indemnity for loss of life and property in case an accident had happened; whether his attention has been called to the statement of the contractor—

"That he employed vagrants, whose names and addresses he did not know, and who deserted the barges;"

And, if so, will the Government offer a reward for the said vagrants to come forward and explain whether they swam ashore, or how they all made their escape unobserved, and particularly why they left work for which they were to be paid; and, whether the said contractor will be continued in the service of the Government?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I explained, in answer to my hon. and gallant Friend a few days ago, that a barge contractor had recently committed a grave offence in the manner indicated in the Question. The contractor is bound by his contract to provide a suitable watchman for each barge; and as he failed to do so, he was summoned and punished by a heavy fine. The responsibility for the characters of the watchmen must rest with the contractor. This contractor is quite new to the work; and the notice taken of this offence will, no doubt, render him more careful in future.

TRADES AND COMMERCE—THE AUSTRIAN TARIFF—DUTY ON BICYCLES, &c.

MR. ERNEST SPENCER (West Bromwich) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is aware that the Austrian Government suddenly, without any previous warning or notice of any kind, have decided that bicycles and tricycles should be ranged in the class of carriages or personal vehicles, and that, under such regulation, the duty payable on each bicycle or tricycle imported will be florins 25 gold or £2 10s. (circa), and also that such duty should come into operation on the 10th of May instant; and, that, inasmuch as this measure will practically ruin the very considerable export business done by this country with Austria in the sale of bicycles and tricycles, whether he would communicate with the Austrian Government on the subject, with a view to securing the withdrawal of the impost?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Inquiry will be made, and such action taken as, in the circumstances, may be possible.

ISLANDS OF THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC—SAMOA—HARBOUR OF PAGO PAGO.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Treaty between the United States and Samoa, conceding to the former Power the conclusive control of the Harbour of Pago Pago in time of war, is still in force; and, in such case, if any period has been fixed for its termination; whether representations have been from time to time addressed to Her Majesty's Government by Australasian Ministers, directing earnest attention to the deprivation thereby to British ships of a suitable harbour and coaling station in Mid Pacific, and in the direct ocean track between Australasia and Vancouver, and Australasia and Panama; and, what steps have been taken in the matter?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): There is a Treaty between the United States and Samoa of January 17, 1878, which provides that the United States may establish a Naval Station in the Harbour of Pago Pago; but it does not give to the United States exclusive control over other parts of the harbour. So far as Her Majesty's Government are aware the Treaty is still in force. As far as I have been able to ascertain at present, no such representations as are indicated in the second Question have been made.

ISLANDS OF THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC—SAMOA.

MR. W. A. M'ARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any agreement was arrived at with Germany in regard to Samoa prior to the assembling of the Washington Conference; and, if so, what was the date of the agreement; whether the United States Government has agreed that Germany should act as the mandatory Power in Samoa; whether Germany was acting within her right in landing a force of armed men at Apia, in forcibly deporting to the Cameroons a King in Treaty relations with us, and in abolishing by declaration of their Consul the joint Consular jurisdiction over the district of Apia previously exercised by England, Germany, and the United States; and, whether there exists any correspondence on this matter with either Germany, the United States, or any of the Australian Colonies; and, if so, when it will be presented to the House?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): As I have already stated, the views of Her Majesty's Government were founded on the Reports of their High Commissioner in the Pacific, and were in accordance with the proposals made by Germany to the Conference at Washington. There was no "agreement" between Her Majesty's Government and that of Germany; but certainly an interchange of views and, as I have said, a concurrence of opinion as to the basis of an arrangement for the future government of Samoa. No conclusion has been arrived at upon that proposal. The landing a German force at Apia was consequent upon a declaration of war. The termination of the joint Consular jurisdiction at Apia was the consequence of the withdrawal of Germany from the Convention of 1879, upon which the separate jurisdiction of the Consuls revived. Her Majesty's Government do not think the maintenance of that Convention desirable. No doubt, there is Correspondence on these matters; but I am unable to say, at such short Notice, whether there is any that can at present be conveniently laid upon the Table.

Mr. E. Stanhope

POOR LAW GUARDIANS—VISITING COMMITTEES.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether only Guardians who are on the Visiting Committee are permitted to visit the poor-house of their Union; whether this Regulation is in accordance with an Order of the Local Government Board; and, if so, for what object such Order was made; whether the Regulation has led to ineffective control and supervision of workhouses by the Guardians, and whether, in consequence thereof, many complaints have been made; and whether he will consider the desirability of rescinding or modifying such Regulation?

THE PRESIDENT (MR. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Regulations of the Local Government Board require the Guardians to appoint one or more Visiting Committees from their own Body. The Board consider that Guardians who are not members of the Visiting Committee cannot claim as a right to visit the workhouse. The Regulations which the Board have issued contain no provision to this effect; but it appears to the Board to be the result of the statutory provision in the 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 76, s. 38. It is to be observed, however, that the Board of Guardians may grant permission to visit the workhouse, if they think fit, to any Guardian or Guardians who are not members of the Visiting Committee. The fact that every member of a Board of Guardians has not the right to visit the workhouse at any time he may think fit has not, in my opinion, led to ineffective control and supervision of workhouses by the Guardians; nor am I aware that many complaints have been made on the subject. I should not be prepared to interfere with the discretion of the Guardians in this matter.

VENEZUELA—THE UNITED STATES.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) (for Mr. WATT) (Glasgow, Camlachie) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can state if it is a fact that the United States Government have decided upon taking action against the United States of Venezuela, so as to recover the long outstanding claims of certain United States subjects; and, whether Her Majesty's Government, having regard to the widespread discontent existing in British Guiana, owing to the long delay in the delimitation of the North-Western Frontier, are now prepared to state what action they propose taking, so as to determine the question of boundary?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government have no such knowledge. I am not aware that there is widespread discontent in British Guiana. The state of affairs in the disputed territory is, undoubtedly, not satisfactory; but, at present, Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to state what action may be taken to determine the question of boundary.

ADMIRALTY—CASE OF G. L. GROVER, LATE MIDSHIPMAN OF H.M.S.

"BACCHANTE."

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea) (for Mr. GILLIAT) (Olapham) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he has been able to re-consider his decision not to grant a pension in the case of George Lionel Grover, late Midshipman of H.M.S. Bacchante, discharged without pension on his return invalided from service of great hardship on the coast of Africa?

THE FIRST LORD (LORD GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): No, Sir. I have very carefully inquired into Mr. Grover's case, and regret I am unable to reverse the decision previously come to. To place a midshipman after three years' service for the remainder of his life on the pension list is an act to which I cannot assent, when the officer does not, in my judgment come within the Regulations governing such pensions.

MR. WHITMORE begged to give Notice that, in consequence of the answer just given, his hon. Friend would call attention to the subject on going into Committee of Supply.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS— EMPLOYMENT OF COUNSEL.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been drawn to the statement made at the meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works on Friday last, that the Board was entitled, under the provisions of the Act appointing the Board of Works Inquiry Commission, to employ counsel on behalf of the Board, and to pay the cost of them out of the money of London ratepayers; and, whether, under the provisions of the said Act, it is competent for the Board to employ and to pay counsel at the expense of the ratepayers?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): The Act under which a Royal Commission is sitting to inquire into the working of the Metropolitan Board of Works enables them to appear by counsel or solicitor before the Commissioners. It is silent as to the payment of the counsel. I understand the contention of the Board to be that this clause carries with it, by implication, the right to charge the expense on the rates. Whether that contention is well founded or not is a question of construction, on which I cannot give an opinion. It must be settled by a Court of Law if any contest arises.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—BOARDS OF GUAR- DIANS—TRANSFER OF POWERS.

MR. PAULTON (Durham, Bishop Auckland) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, under Section 8 of the Local Government Bill, the powers and duties of existing Boards of Guardians could by Order in Council be transferred to the County Councils?

THE PRESIDENT (MR. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The terms of Clause 8 of the Local Government Bill are, no doubt, very comprehensive; and when the clause is reached in Committee I shall be prepared to agree to its being made clear that it is not to extend to Boards of Guardians.

Lord George Hamilton

ADMIRALTY—THE DOCKS AT HAULBOWLINE.

DR. FOX (King's Co., Tullamore) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is the intention of the Government to complete the docks at Haulbowline, and to open them for the repairing and building of ships?

THE FIRST LORD (LORD GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The dock at Haulbowline is in course of completion; and, when finished, will be utilized on any occasion when it advantageously can be.

DR. FOX: Is it the intention to spend any of the large sums about to be voted for the improvement of the Navy—

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order!

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked, if the Admiralty purposed excavating a passage from the deep sea channel to the dock, inasmuch as the dock could not be utilized before that was done? He had asked this Question three times in the course of the last seven months, but had received no answer. Had the work been commenced?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Of course, the dock would be useless unless there was access to it. Of course, the passage would be made before the dock was opened; but he could not answer the Question off hand.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — RE- APPOINTMENT OF MR. H. EGAN— TULLAMORE.

DR. FOX (King's Co., Tullamore) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Lord Chancellor has received a requisition from the Board of Town Commissioners of Tullamore, asking for the re-appointment of Mr. Henry Egan to the Commission of the Peace, for the purpose of the Towns Improvement Act; and, whether there is any special objection to his re-appointment?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Lord would be under no necessity of submitting another Vote to the consideration of Parliament until the very eve of the Prorogation. Another extraordinary fact with regard to this Vote for the Metropolitan Police was this—that whereas the Government required almost 50 per cent of the total Vote for the Metropolitan Police, with regard to the other police of the country it did not require anything of the kind. They wanted very little for the County and Borough Police, notwithstanding the fact that they were asking for 50 per cent of the total Vote for the Metropolitan Police. Why was that, unless the Government were anxious to obtain sufficient money in respect of the Metropolitan Police to enable them to set at naught all the criticisms which might be addressed against the Metropolitan Police from that (the Opposition) side of the House, and thus stave off any adverse vote which the House might consider it necessary to come to? Then, again, there was another Vote on Account of Ireland which it seemed to him was very much in excess of what the real requirements were. He referred to the Land Commission. The total Vote was £45,000; £20,000, or about one-half of it, had already been voted. The Government were, therefore, in funds for six months of the financial year, which would carry them up to the end of September; and yet the Committee were asked now for a further sum of £15,000, or £35,000 out of a total of £45,000. This Vote, if it were passed, would carry them on to January next. What would be the use of any comment by any Member of the Committee upon the Land Commission, if the Government were to have the money in hand so that they could go on utterly regardless of any observations from those who were concerned in criticizing their policy? This Land Commission was one of the Offices about which the Committee ought to have exceptional information; because the Government had now on the Table a Bill relating to the Office, and it was only right that hon. Members should be informed why this unusually large sum was to be taken for the Commission. He was afraid that he was wearying the House, but he would only cite one other item. Last year there was a Grant-in-Aid for Cyprus of £18,000. This year that £18,000 was to be run up to £30,000, or an addition of £12,000. What were the Committee now asked to do? £30,000 being the total Vote for the year, they were asked to vote on account a further sum of £11,000, making £29,000 in all, and there would only remain a balance of £1,000 out of the £30,000 to be discussed hereafter. Of what use would any discussion be, if the House had already voted £29,000 out of a total of £30,000 and the money had been spent? He presumed that the money was required for immediate expenditure, because the Government told them it was absolutely necessary to vote it. He respectfully submitted to the House that, whether necessary or not, it was only right and proper that the House should give some distinct information as to how it was that 29-30ths of the total Grant-in-Aid for Cyprus was required to be voted on account. There were other matters in this Vote which he might have gone into, but he had no desire to detain the Committee. He thought he had said enough to show, first of all, that the policy of these Votes on Account was a very doubtful and a very dangerous policy; and secondly, that many of the details and items of the Vote required special explanation at the hands of the Government.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The hon. Gentleman at the commencement of his observations referred to the "countout" which occurred last Friday; but when that "count out" took place, and it was moved on the other side of the House, it is right to say that there were only three Members present on the opposite Benches, while there were 24 or 25 on these Benches, the Government Bench itself being full.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: There would have been all the evening to get the Vote.

MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Member would be aware that there were seven Notices of Motion down on the Paper on going into Supply, and that certainly one hon. Gentleman intended to go on with his Motion if the House were kept, so that the Government had no chance of getting any Votes on that evening.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: In the case referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the hon. Member, could not have desire, however, to take this opportunity of saying that the Question of the hon. Gentleman seems to imply a misconception of the proposals of the Government—a misconception which I have noticed seems to be largely shared by those who have adversely criticized the clauses in the Local Government Bill dealing with this question. It seems to be the impression that we propose to take away certain powers now possessed by the Justices under which renewal of licences may be refused. The Bill does nothing of the kind. On the contrary, it is expressly provided that where a person is desirous that a licence should not be renewed on any ground on which Justices would, if the Act had not passed, have been authorized or required to refuse the renewal of such licence, such person may apply to the Justices, who may make a Report that the licence ought not to be renewed; and if, on appeal, the decision of the Justices be confirmed the Licensing Committee must refuse to renew the licence. In such a case there would be no claim for compensation. Whether the Justices do or do not possess such a power except for misconduct under the existing law is, I am aware, a matter of contention; but if they do possess such a power it will be seen we do not propose to take it away. Undoubtedly, however, such a power, if possessed, has been rarely exercised. This being so, we thought it right, with a view of facilitating the closing of public-houses where not required, to confer upon the County Councils powers, in addition to those of a judicial character possessed by the Justices, expressly enabling them to close public-houses where, in their opinion, they were not required; and in that case, and that alone, compensation can be claimed, and to provide for that compensation a special duty on licences may be imposed. The position, in the event of the Bill passing, would, therefore, be that where renewal of licences was refused in consequence of the action of the Justices under any powers at present possessed by them, no compensation could be claimed; but where renewal was refused by the County Council under the new powers created by the Bill compensation would be paid by means of a fund practically created by the Licensed Victuallers themselves.

Mr. Ritchie

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyronne, S.): The right hon. Gentleman says the magistrates rarely exercise their powers of refusing licences. I desire to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is willing to give the Returns he referred to the other day in reply to the hon. Member for the Leigh Division of Lancashire (Mr. Caleb Wright)?

MR. RITCHIE: I have promised to communicate with the Home Office upon the subject, and have done so; but I have not yet ascertained whether the Return can be prepared. If it can, it shall be granted.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): Does the right hon. Gentleman still adhere to the statement made that the Bill places holders of licences in a more secure position?

MR. RITCHIE: Yes, Sir; I take it that under the provisions of this Bill it will not be possible to do that which I know some hon. Members in this House desire—namely, to close the whole of the public-houses in a neighbourhood by means of what is commonly known as local option.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) asked whether, according to the right hon. Gentleman's own showing, the Licensing Magistrates would not have a perfect right to close every public-house without assigning any reason; and that, if they did not assign any reason, there would be no compensation?

MR. RITCHIE: As I have stated, what the exact powers of the magistrates are in this respect is a matter of contention; but, certainly, if the hon. Member refers to a decision recently given, I understand that Justices could not, even under that decision, act as the hon. Member suggests; but must take each case into consideration, and act judiciously with reference to it.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, whether, in view of the important discussions that might be anticipated on the Licensing Clauses of the Local Government Bill, he would cause to be printed and circulated as a Parliamentary Paper a full report of the case of "Sharp v. Wakefield and others," and of the Judgments delivered in that case by Mr. Justice Field and Mr. Justice Wills?

MR. RITCHIE (who replied) said, although the Judgments of Mr. Justice

Field and Mr. Justice Wills are, no doubt, of considerable importance, as the hon. Member is probably aware, an appeal against the decision of those Judges is pending. This being the case, it is not proposed to issue as a Parliamentary Paper a full report of the case and Judgments, as that would be a very unusual course.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Will the right hon. Gentleman not bring forward the Licensing Clauses until that appeal is decided?

MR. RITCHIE: Yes, Sir; we shall bring forward the Licensing Clauses as soon as the House will allow us to do so.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—THE FISH TRADE—THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL AND THE GREATER MUNICIPAL COUNCILS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government see their way to any steps to remedy the excessive difference between the price of fish brought to shore cheap and sold to the consumer very dear; or whether they will propose to add to the Local Government Bill provisions giving to the London County Council and the greater Municipal Councils powers of local legislation sufficient to deal with markets and monopolies and the sources of dear fish, bad gas, insufficient water, and other evils of that kind?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The hon. Member asks me whether the Government see their way to take any steps to remedy the excessive difference between the price of fish brought to shore cheap and sold to the consumer very dear. I should have said myself that that is, undoubtedly, an opportunity for private enterprise, which the hon. Gentleman might endeavour to stimulate himself. There is evidently a vast field for those who desired to benefit themselves and to benefit their countrymen. Then the hon. Member asks the Government to add to the Local Government Bill provisions giving to the greater Municipal Councils powers of local legislation. I think that the right time to discuss that question is when we arrive at the Local Government Bill itself; and if the hon. Gentleman desires to improve that measure the Government will be very glad of his assistance.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL gave Notice that he would put on the Paper an Amendment giving power to these Councils to deal with these and other monopolies.

UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND) BILL—THE COMMISSIONERS.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When Her Majesty's Government propose to state the names of the persons to be appointed Commissioners under the Scottish Universities Bill, which has been introduced in the House of Lords? He also wished to ask, in consequence of a rumour that the Government proposed that the Commission should consist of 15 Members, whether the right hon. Gentleman could now state the number of Commissioners?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): As the latter Question was not put upon the Paper, I have not informed myself upon the subject; and, therefore, I am unable to give the hon. Member the information he asks for. With regard to the Question on the Paper, the Government hope to be able to state the names of the Commissioners under the Scotch Universities Bill during the Committee stage in the House of Lords; but, in any case, they will be stated before the Bill leaves that House.

SCOTLAND—INSPECTION OF MINES—APPOINTMENTS.

MR. J. W. PHILIPS (Lanark, Mid) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in the event of a vacancy occurring among the Chief Inspectors of Mines in Scotland, he will give a pledge that he will appoint a new Inspector only from among the ranks of men who are, or have been, practical working miners?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): No; I can give no such pledge. I shall on every occasion appoint the most competent person I can find.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES) — THE MILITIA (IRELAND)—INSUBORDINATION.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.) wished to ask the Secretary of State for War a Question of which he had given him private Notice. It was, Whether he had seen a report in The Dublin Evening Mail, taken from The Cork Herald, which states that the Clare Militia, when assembling for their annual training, saluted their commanding officer with three groans; and what steps he intended to take in case this report should be verified?

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question; I should like to ask him whether the commanding officer was not Colonel O'Callaghan?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I know nothing of this matter except what is contained in the paragraph referred to. It is obvious, therefore, that I can make no statement with regard to it.

AUSTRALIA—CHINESE IMMIGRANTS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he is in a position to state what progress, if any, has been made in the negotiations between the British and Chinese Governments with reference to the landing of Chinese in Australia; and, whether the Governor of New South Wales has been instructed to veto any special Act passed by the Parliament of the Colony dealing with Chinese immigration?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir JOHN GORST) (who replied) said: Her Majesty's Government are not in a position to make any statement on the subject, which is one requiring full and careful consideration. No instructions of the nature suggested have been sent to the Governor of New South Wales.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE WHITSUNTIDE HOLIDAYS.

SIR WALTER B. RARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.) desired to know whether it was intended to hold a Morning Sitting to-morrow?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in reply, said, the Government were entirely in the hands of the House, and desired to meet the convenience of the House, with regard to the adjournment over the Whitsuntide Recess. There were, however, two steps which must be taken before the adjournment could be moved. In the first place, he must ask the House for a Vote on Account; and, secondly, he hoped that the House would read the Employers' Liability Bill a second time, so that it could be sent to the Grand Committee on Trade. If these steps were taken they would be prepared to move the adjournment that evening. But if those steps were not taken, he should have to ask the House to meet to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) said, he had proposed, on the Motion for Adjournment, to discuss the question of the emigration of crofters; but as he found that it would be possible to raise that question on the Vote for the salary of the Secretary for Scotland, he would deal with it then, and so avoid the necessity of delaying the adjournment.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that he would take care that all the Papers on the subject should be in the hands of Members before the end of the Recess.

In reply to Dr. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.),

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he was not able to say precisely when the Lunacy Acts Amendment Bill would be taken; but it was possible they might be able to reach it on the 4th of June.

In reply to Mr. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.),

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that if the Employers' Liability Bill was not read a second time that night he should have to ask the House to come to a decision on the measure at the Morning Sitting to-morrow.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE AFFRAY AT MITCHELSTOWN IN SEPTEMBER LAST—THE CORONER'S INQUEST.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I wish to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland a Question of which I have given him private Notice. It is this—Whether he is correctly reported, in his speech at Battersea last night, as having described the inquest at Mitchelstown as corrupt; and, if so, whether he will state to the House the ground on which the charge of corruption was based?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I am not sure that I used that word. If I did, I am glad that the hon. Member has given me the opportunity of saying that I never intended what the word "corrupt" naturally means when applied to a tribunal—namely, being bribed or influenced by corrupt pecuniary considerations. What I ought to have said—and I beg everybody concerned to take the correction—is that the tribunal was incompetent and worthless.

Subsequently,

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I have to ask the Chief Secretary a Question arising out of the answer he has given just now. In answer to my hon. Friend he said that the inquiry into the cause of death at Mitchelstown had been made before a tribunal which was incompetent and worthless; and I wish to know whether he will take steps to have an inquiry into the cause of death by some tribunal which is competent and worthy?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already answered several Questions on this subject, and I do not know that I have anything to add. I have followed exactly the precedent set by my Predecessors.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND) — THE RIVER BANN — LEGISLATION.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I wish to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in the event of the House not sitting to-morrow, when he proposes to introduce the Irish Drainage Bills, and especially that relating to the drainage of the Bann?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I must be guided by the feelings of the Irish Members. If they will take it as a non-contentious Bill, and the House has no objection, my right hon. Friend is not indisposed to put it down for Thursday, the 31st, the day we re-assemble after the Recess?

WAR OFFICE—NAVAL AND MILITARY ORGANIZATION—THE ROYAL MA- RINE FORCE.

CAPTAIN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he can give an assurance to the House that the promised inquiry into naval and military organization will include an examination into the cost of organization and employment of the Royal Marine Forces; whether at present the country reaps the full advantage from the expenditure on the scientific training and technical instruction of the officers and men of the Royal Marine Artillery; and, whether the transfer from the War Office to the Admiralty of the coaling stations abroad, and the substitution of Marine for Army garrisons, will tend to reduce expenditure and increase efficiency?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The Government certainly intend that the subject to which the hon. and gallant Member refers shall be inquired into by competent persons, under their direction and with their full responsibility.

NATIONAL DEFENCE BILL.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) asked, when the adjourned debate on the National Defence Bill would be taken?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, the Resolutions relating to Imperial Defence and the National Defence Bill would be the first Orders for Monday, June 4, as the Government were desirous, owing to the importance of the question, to have the matter disposed of as rapidly as possible. After the two Bills on this subject the Irish Bills would be taken.

RULES OF DEBATE—QUESTIONS.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) asked—in consequence of the enormous delay and waste of the time of the House that had been involved to-day in the answering of Questions—Whether the First Lord of the Treasury would arrange that in future the Questions and Answers should be printed with the Orders of the Day?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I think the hon. Gentleman must see that that is a question which must be decided by the House itself.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES—RETURN.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) asked, If the Government still intended to oppose the Return moved for by his hon. Friend (Mr. Handel Cossham) with regard to Friendly Societies?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) said, the Government still intended to oppose the Return in question, because they did not know how to get the information desired.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

VOTE ON ACCOUNT, No. 2.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a further sum, not exceeding £4,205,300, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the following Charge for Civil Services and Revenue Departments for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889," viz. :—

CIVIL SERVICES.

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.

Great Britain :—	£
Admiralty, Extension of Buildings ..	- -
Disturnpiked and Main Roads (England and Wales) ..	- -
Disturnpiked Roads (Scotland) ..	- -

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS.

England :—
Foreign Office	15,000
Colonial Office	7,000
Privy Council Office and Subordinate Departments	7,000
Board of Trade and Subordinate Departments	15,000
Bankruptcy Department of the Board of Trade	- -
Charity Commission (including Endowed Schools Department) ..	6,000
Civil Service Commission ..	9,000
Exchequer and Audit Department ..	10,000
Friendly Societies, Registry ..	1,500
Land Commission for England ..	4,000
Local Government Board	100,000
Lunacy Commission	3,000
Mint (including Coinage)	5,000
National Debt Office	2,500
Patent Office	9,000

Mr. W. H. Smith

	£
Paymaster General's Office	4,000
Public Works Loan Commission ..	1,500
Record Office	4,000
Registrar General's Office	5,000
Stationery Office and Printing ..	80,000
Woods, Forests, &c. Office of ..	4,000
Works and Public Buildings, Office of ..	6,000
Mercantile Marine Fund, Grant in Aid ..	20,000
Secret Service	6,000

Scotland :—

Secretary for Scotland	1,000
Exchequer and other Offices	1,000
Fishery Board	1,000
Lunacy Commission	500
Registrar General's Office	500
Board of Supervision	- -

Ireland :—

Lord Lieutenant's Household	2,000
Chief Secretary's Office	5,500
Charitable Donations and Bequests Office	500
Local Government Board	5,000
Public Works Office	6,000
Record Office	800
Registrar General's Office	2,500
Valuation and Boundary Survey ..	5,500

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

England :—

Law Charges	12,000
Criminal Prosecutions	40,000
Supreme Court of Judicature	65,000
Wreck Commission	2,000
County Courts	20,000
Land Registry	- -
Revising Barristers, England	- -
Police Courts (London and Sheerness) ..	3,000
Metropolitan Police	125,000
Special Police	9,000
County and Borough Police, Great Britain	2,000
Prisons, England and the Colonies ..	80,000
Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Great Britain	80,000
Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum ..	5,000

Scotland :—

Lord Advocate, and Criminal Proceedings	10,000
Courts of Law and Justice	10,000
Register House Departments	6,000
Crofters Commission	1,000
Police, Counties and Burghs (Scotland) ..	1,000
Prisons, Scotland	20,000

Ireland :—

Law Charges and Criminal Prosecutions	15,000
Supreme Court of Judicature	16,000
Court of Bankruptcy	1,500
Admiralty Court Registry	200
Registry of Deeds	3,000
Registry of Judgments	400
Land Commission	15,000
County Court Officers, &c.	18,000
Dublin Metropolitan Police (including Police Courts)	20,000
Constabulary	280,000
Prisons, Ireland	20,000
Reformatory and Industrial Schools ..	30,000
Dundrum Criminal Lunatic Asylum ..	1,000

the views of the Committee; but I can give no undertaking on the subject, as the discussion at this moment must be more or less of an academic character, and, considering that there is a measure on the Paper with which we are anxious to make progress this evening—considering also that we have arrived at a comparatively late hour, and that six hours will not be too much to devote to the important question we desire to bring before the House—I make an earnest appeal to the Committee to agree to the Vote at once.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.) said, he was sorry he was not able to agree to the speed at which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) wished to travel when voting these huge Grants on Account. His principal reason was that so few opportunities would be afforded to the House to take up those great questions of foreign policy which must come under consideration. They had already been engaged in a discussion which involved a large expenditure upon the Army and Navy, and many hon. Members must feel themselves in a peculiar position in regard to that subject. It might be that the money was necessary.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Allow me to point out that there is no item included in this Vote on Account for the Army and Navy. The Vote which is necessary for that purpose will afford ample material for a subsequent Resolution of the House.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, he was quite aware that there was no Vote in the Vote on Account which dealt with the Army and Navy; but the point he was coming to was that the Vote contained a sum on account of the Foreign Office. It seemed to him that in the course taken by the Government in asking for these huge sums of money they were putting the cart before the horse. Surely, before making this grant, the country had a right to know what the policy of the Government was with reference to foreign affairs. At any rate, that ought to be made plain before Parliament sanctioned a new and extensive departure in regard to the Army and Navy expenditure. Many independent Members felt themselves placed in this respect in a very embarrassing position. How was it possible for the House or the country to appreciate the seriousness of the position, unless they were informed what the policy of the Government in regard to foreign questions was? There had been a discussion in "another place" which, perhaps, might throw some little light upon the subject; but for his own part, he thought it was of importance for the House of Commons to insist upon a great deal more light being thrown upon the question. So far as he knew, there had not been a single hour in the course of the present Session in which the question of our foreign policy had been raised or considered. The Government complained that the progress which had been made with Public Business had been slow. No Members on that side of the House had offered any factious opposition in regard to foreign questions; he was afraid they were falling into the other extreme, and that they were neglecting their duty as vigilant servants of the public by leaving those foreign questions to take care of themselves. The position of this country was one which required the closest observance on the part of the Representatives of the people. The state of affairs on the Continent was extremely critical, and placed in the hands of the Government almost overwhelming responsibilities. For his own part, he was of opinion that no increase in our naval or military expenditure was necessary, if the foreign policy of the Government were of a sufficiently wise character as not to involve any interference on our part. He confessed that he was extremely anxious to know from some responsible Member of the Government, and he was glad to see the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in his place, whether this country was absolutely free from any engagement which was likely at the first brush of Continental difficulties to land us in any naval or military interference. Nobody could doubt that the state of the Continent was such as to inspire alarm on the part of all commercial people in this and every other country. All business undertakings were under a cloud, and the state of the Continent, its military condition, and the relations of one Power with another were such as to be a source of constant anxiety. They could not take up a foreign newspaper or the correspondence of an English journal in which that was not apparent every hour of the day. Some words were uttered by the Prime Minister, in his capacity as Foreign Secretary some time ago, which remained in the memory of all men who had business obligations in every part of the world. The noble Lord indicated that whatever might happen to be the policy of Austria must be a question of primary interest to this country. Those words must be construed to carry with them a very great danger to this country. If complications should arise in the East of Europe, he wanted to have an assurance from the Government that it was their firm intention not to make this country responsible, should an international war break out. Many of them would remember the circumstances of the Crimean War. They knew that in that case Great Britain was the first of the Great Powers to rush into conflict with Russia, and that, in reality, we left Austria and Germany with their hands absolutely free, laughing in their sleeves, while we fought the conflict in which they were much more interested than we. We might find that situation repeated, and he wished to ascertain whether the Government had learned wisdom from the experience this country had gained in the Crimean War. We had the admission of more than one foreign statesman that the policy pursued by this country on that occasion was unwise, and that the conflict, as far as we were concerned, might have been avoided for a considerable period, if not altogether. He, therefore, wished to know from the mouth of the hon. Gentleman who represented the Foreign Office, and from Her Majesty's Government generally, that there existed no obligation by which this country could become involved in any foreign complication in the event of the peace of Europe being disturbed. He did not say that this country ought to take no share, no matter what complications might arise, because something might happen which might affect us as well as other parts of the world. But assuredly it became us to be guided by a due sense of our responsibility in regard to our Colonial engagements and our relationship to our dependencies, and we should be the very last to commit ourselves and tie our hands in reference to any foreign Power. He would confess that, if there was a lingering disposition on the part of the Government to take part in any Continental broil—our Army, as had been stated by the Adjutant General and the Commander-in-Chief, was really too weak for any such purpose. If, on the other hand, the Government maintained the steady purpose not to interfere in any continental squabble which was likely to break out in the existing relations between Russia, Austria, and Germany, he thought it would be possible for this country to maintain such a position as would not render it necessary to make any large increase in the Army. Probably most of them would agree that our Navy ought to be maintained at such strength as to afford full security to our possessions at home and abroad. He thought that the present provision for the Navy was ample for that purpose, if we kept ourselves free from Continental complications. There was no reason why there should not exist between this country and France and this country and Russia such a state of feeling as would keep us apart from any Continental squabble. In that case this country would run no risk whatever, and there would be very little necessity for an increase of expenditure on the part of the Army. He hoped to have an assurance from the hon. Gentleman representing the Foreign Office or from the First Lord of the Treasury, that it was the desire of the Government and their intention to leave our hands free from any entangling engagements which would deprive us of our freedom of action if war should unhappily break out on the Continent.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) said, he desired to call the attention of the Committee to Vote No. 29.

MR. LABOUCHERE rose to Order, and said that he desired to discuss several Votes before the hon. Member moved the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) said, he had recently asked a Question of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs as to the Zambesi River. The Portuguese claimed all that portion of South Africa from the Indian Ocean to the Atlantic Ocean. Now, upon some of the tributaries of the Zambesi River, as well as upon the Zambesi River itself, there were a considerable number of British subjects. The Portuguese, however, had deprived them of the means of navigating the river, and he wanted to know whether the Government would take steps to protect British traders and the Scotch missionaries on the Zambesi River from the encroachments and usurpations of the Portuguese Government and their subjects? If they took no such steps, they practically, by their inaction, recognized the Zambesi River and its tributaries as belonging to the Portuguese Government. We had taken over a portion of the territory of one of the Chiefs which ran down to the Zambesi River. At present, all the mouths of the river were in the hands of the Portuguese, who imposed transit duties on foreign goods or everything that went into Africa by means of that river. He was not prepared to say that they had not the right to place transit duties on all goods that entered Africa by means of the Zambesi River. That was rather a question for the consideration of the Government. But he was informed that the Portuguese Authorities were preventing our steamers from coasting there, and were demanding that British vessels trading there, and the missionaries who had settlements on Lake Nyassa, should fly the Portuguese flag or cease trading. He wished to know whether the Government intended to protect British subjects and their steamers, or to acknowledge the right of the Portuguese Government to prevent the British Government sailing on the Zambesi River, having in view the fact that by taking over territory which ran down to the river they had now become one of the Powers on the Zambesi? There was another point which he also desired to call attention to. He had put a Question to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, in regard to a Return moved for by the hon. Member for Bristol in reference to the Office of Registrar of Friendly Societies. The Secretary to the Treasury said, in reply, that he had no means of getting the information asked for. He might tell the hon. Gentleman that some of the secretaries and officials of these friendly societies were getting larger salaries than the Prime Minister himself. Two of them received £6,000 a-year each. To his knowledge, there were 9,000,000 or 10,000,000 of persons, principally belonging to the working classes, who were insured in these industrial and friendly societies.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not see how this subject comes under this Vote.

DR. CLARK said, it came under the Vote for the Registration of Friendly Societies, which was Vote 13. He had said, last year, that he would move the rejection of the Vote, unless something was done to make the Office a reality instead of a sham. The present registration meant nothing, but it led people to believe that, because the rules were registered, there was Government security. The Government had indicated that they were willing to appoint a Select Committee to consider the whole question, and the hon. Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) had brought in a Bill upon the subject. He understood, however, that the Government were opposing that Bill. The hon. Baronet said that his measure only affected collecting societies; but this was a question affecting the whole of our working population, as one of these societies consisted of from 6,000,000 to 7,000,000 members. The Secretary to the Treasury had refused to print evidence which was given on the last inquiry. He (Dr. Clark) thought the time had arrived when there ought to be a full investigation into the working of the Act. Then would come the time for the Select Committee to consider the matter. As they had received a pledge from the Treasury last Session, he thought the Government ought now to state what they intended to do in the matter. The Secretary to the Treasury had stated that they could not get the information; but if a Select Committee were appointed, it would soon be able to lay all the information that was necessary before the House and the Government.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) said, he should like to say a few words on this subject before the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) rose to reply to the observations of hon. Members who had spoken on that side of the House. There were undoubtedly many of the Scotch people who at that moment took a very strong interest in the condition of affairs in the interior of Africa, and who thought that the fact that many of the missionaries were at stations beyond the settlement of any European Power was no reason for their not receiving protection at the hands of the British Government. The first and most important point which they were inclined to urge on Her Majesty's Government was that which had been put forward by the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark)—namely, that the access to the interior—the only good and available one—by the Zambesi, should be kept open to all nations, and particularly to this country, which had made settlements in the interior of that part of Africa. He urged on Her Majesty's Government to enforce on Portugal and other Powers the necessity of keeping open the Zambesi as an international highway. Portugal had undoubtedly certain legal rights on the South African litoral, and she had of late been not only exercising those rights, but, as he thought, unduly extending them in the manner alluded to by his hon. Friend. Hon. Members, he thought, ought to insist that the Government should recognize in no way whatever any territorial Sovereignty in South Africa over the waters of the Zambesi. We had a Consul at Nyassa—of course, not accredited to any Power, because there was no Power to whom he could be accredited—whose duty it would be to look after British interests when an appeal was made to him. Such an appeal would be made to him naturally when an attack was made upon the settlement by the slave dealers, and he, in his turn, would naturally appeal to the British Government for instructions. He, therefore, urged upon the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that something should be done for the maintenance of the authority of our Consul; that there should be no recognition, under any circumstances whatever, of any claim to territorial Sovereignty in the interior; and, lastly, the maintenance in all cases of free navigation on the Zambesi.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge) said, that the considerations laid before the Committee with regard to the position in Southern Africa were exceedingly important at the present time, and it was also necessary that they should ascertain from the Government what were their views and policy with regard to the Northern districts. At present, our territory, so far as it was represented by the Protectorate, was limited by a line drawn on a level with the Northern boundary of the Transvaal—that was to say, the 22nd parallel. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman would know the limits to which he (Mr. Conybeare) referred. In the last few weeks news had arrived that we had actually extended our Protectorate in some form or other to Bechuanaland. He asked the right hon. Gentleman what territories that Protectorate included, and whether the Government themselves had any clear idea of the limit to which the Portuguese territory was supposed to extend Westward from the Eastern seaboard; because it appeared to him, from what he had been able to gather, that the limits of the Portuguese territory were altogether of the most shadowy and uncertain character. It was worth while to recollect what took place in connection with Angra Peguena. He believed they had kept Germany waiting for two years to know our views with regard to the interior of Africa, in consequence of which Prince Bismarck became impatient, and secured a tract of territory which he believed he was correct in saying exceeded in extent anything which the people of this country believed to be in the hands of Germany. The cession of Angra Peguena included the acquisition by Germany of a huge district in which were some of the richest gold mines in South Africa. They did not want the same sort of imbroglio to arise in connection with Matabeleland as had arisen in that case. He did not say that it was wise for the Government to lay down a hard and fast line of demarcation. That would be impossible; but they did not want to allow matters to drift in an unbusiness-like way in connection with affairs in South Africa, and presently to find that Germany or Portugal had established a locus standi in the country, and acquired a vested interest which it would be impossible not to recognize. There were two courses which this country might adopt with reference to Matabeleland—one was that we should never interfere with a view to appropriating that country; and the other was to make it clear to other countries that we had interests there, and that those interests would probably extend in future, and that we intended to take such means for their protection as might be necessary. The first course appeared to him to be impossible; because, although it was well known that some parts of the Transvaal were rich in gold, and precious stones, this district was richer than anything they had yet seen. It was probable, therefore, that there would be a very considerable inrush of British subjects into Matabeleland. If that were so, it would be far better to take a statesman-like view of the situation and decide, once for all, what shape our policy should assume rather than let the matter slide. They did not want the history of Stellaland and Zululand to be repeated in Matabeleland. They had a right to ask that the Government should come to some understanding with Portugal as to where its territory was to begin and where it was to end; and if the right hon. Gentleman knew how that matter stood, he should be glad if he would give the Committee some information about it. It was well known that there had been some expeditions by British officers across the Victoria Falls, and the accounts given of the country showed how interesting it was, and how rich it would become if it were developed and fully opened up. Another consideration was that British subjects were already flocking into the country. He asked the right hon. Gentleman whether it was not a fact that valuable concessions had been granted, or attempted to be obtained, of mineral rights extending over huge tracts of the country? If the country was to come at all under British control, he thought they had a right to claim that concessions of mineral rights should not be made to individuals. He thought these matters should be regulated; because the difficulties which had arisen in other parts of South Africa were the consequence of the Chiefs unknowingly assigning away their rights. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman had already taken steps in that direction; and if so, he should be glad to hear what had been done. He should like to point out to the Government that there was a very strong feeling amongst those who were conversant with matters in Bechuanaland and Matabeleland generally that the proper trade route to the latter would be through Bechuanaland, and that the best thing to be done would be to extend the existing railway. This, although a difficult undertaking, would be an important step to take, and would not cost more than £3,000,000, a sum ~~not~~ thrown away on Sir Charles cally useless. If that money had been spent in constructing this railway, it would have been a thousand times more usefully employed than on that expedition. He was told that the Germans had an expedition in Matabeleland at the present time, or, at any rate, that there was competition between them, the Portuguese, and other nations, for a locus standi in the country. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman could give the Committee some information on this subject. It was very desirable that we should come to some common understanding with those countries that were taking action on the Continent, and prevent the recurrence of such a step as was taken by Germany in the case of Angra Peguena.

Mr. Buchanan

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): I do not think Her Majesty's Government will ever complain of interest being taken in foreign affairs and of demands being made for information before any step is made which would involve the interests of the country. I am glad to acknowledge the reticence and prudence of hon. Gentlemen in the midst of anxious affairs, in not unduly pressing the Government, and I hope that the assurances that I gave the House at the beginning of the Session, when challenged directly on the subject raised by the hon. Member for Bradford, were satisfactory to the House. I then assured the Committee that the Government had not entered into any engagement pledging the material action of the country which was not known to the House of Commons—that is to say, that the Government were free to deal in the interest of the country with events as they might occur. There had been no fresh engagements incurred by the Government since, and the position remained the same as when he last explained it. It would, indeed, be most imprudent for the Government to make any general and binding declaration of abstinence from interference in the affairs of the world. When we considered how wide and diversified were our national interests, and how great was the influence of this country in assisting in the maintenance of the peace of the world, any declaration of total abstinence from interference in European politics would be not only imprudent, but unworthy of the duty we owed to the world. I hope that will be considered by the hon. Member for West Bradford a sufficient answer to the observations he has made. I would remind the Committee that a wide discussion on foreign affairs is unnecessary at this moment, because the Foreign Office Vote stands first on the Paper for discussion on the 31st of the present month, and foreign affairs will, therefore, occupy our attention when the House re-assembles after Whitsuntide. But in answer to the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark), who has put some questions of undoubtedly great interest, I say that Her Majesty's Government distinctly do not recognize unlimited claims on the part of Portugal in the interior of Africa. The conditions by which the spheres of influence of European Powers in South Africa are bounded are perfectly well known. Those influences are not recognized, except where settlements take place, and where a Power possessed the means of maintaining order, protecting foreigners, and controlling the Natives. Where a Power, though seated on the sea coast, has made no approach to a settlement in the interior, and no step in the fulfilment of international duties, it is evident that we cannot recognize that it has any claim to deny us free commerce with the interior by a natural highway. Thus Her Majesty's Government cannot for a moment admit a right on the part of such a Power to stop the free passage of the Zambesi, which gives access to regions where the enterprize of our fellow-countrymen has already made considerable progress. It is a matter of regret that our commerce should be hindered by heavy charges; but where no international obligations interpose, it is in the power of Portugal or any other country to levy such duties as she may impose within her own territories. Hon. Members opposite have referred to the condition of the settlements in the interior of Africa. I must entirely deny that anything like a state of war has been entered into by Her Majesty's Consul on the authority of Her Majesty's Government. It is true that in view of the danger that threatened European Settlements, two British Consuls assisted personally in checking an attack upon those Settlements and in beating back the Arabs,

Sir James Fergusson

but undoubtedly it would not be the duty of the Consul to join in any hostile expedition against these tribes. It had been said it was for the settlers themselves to take steps for their own protection. That was obviously their duty, and it would be out of question to hinder them from taking steps for their own legitimate defence; but it would be incurring a most dangerous responsibility if Her Majesty's Government were to authorize, as suggested by the hon. Member for West Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan), the Consul to enrol men, or to take up any position in which he would require to be supported in case of disaster. It would be impossible that we could support a force entirely cut off from the British base, and from British territory. The hon. Member for the Camborne Division of Cornwall (Mr. Conybeare) has asked me questions with regard to matters of very recent date, but I hope he will allow me to postpone giving an answer to them, because it would require reference to documents which are not at hand. I trust it will not be supposed that we are not aware of the importance of not losing an opportunity of developing our interest through supineness, and the recent assumption of our Protectorate in what is generally called Amatongaland is a clear indication that neither the Imperial nor Colonial Authorities are indifferent to their obligations in that respect. I hope we shall keep pace with the expansion of colonization within the sphere of these most important Colonies in South Africa, the legitimate development of which they have a right to expect shall not be checked. It is undoubtedly an important point to which the hon. Member has directed attention, namely, that there should be no waste of the valuable mineral deposits in these countries by hurried grants made by the Native Chiefs, so that if they should become British Colonies, they should not be found to have been despoiled of those natural resources. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that those important considerations will not be lost sight of. In assuming a Protectorate it is evident that we ought to give advice and also exercise control.

DR. CLARK: Have we assumed a Protectorate over Matabelerland?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: I must, I think, ask the hon. Member to give me Notice to enable me to answer that question with more precision than I can do at the present moment. I had no intimation that this discussion would be initiated to night ; but I may say that of the correctness of the view that British enterprise in these territories should proceed on a settled plan, there can, I think, be no doubt. While there is much to be said in favour of the view that the vast regions of the interior of Africa should be opened up by an extension of railways from the South, it seems to me that there may also be valuable communication from points on the Eastern Coast. I trust the Committee will not think it necessary for me now to go into further details, and I am only sorry that it has not been possible for me to anticipate the questions which hon. Gentlemen opposite have referred to.

MR. W. H. SMITH : As there will be another and early opportunity of discussing foreign affairs, I claim to move "That the Question be now put."

THE CHAIRMAN said, that looking at the time of the evening (7 p.m.), and the importance of the subject, he thought it reasonable that the discussion should proceed, say for another half-hour.

Debate resumed.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) said he did not propose to enter into the discussion on Matabeleland, because he thought the right hon. Gentleman had shown that it was desirable not to do so without Notice. He rose only to advert very shortly to the points raised by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) and the hon. Member for West Bradford (Mr. Illingworth). He hoped he was correct in understanding that it was the intention of the Government that there should be free and open navigation of the Zambesi. The free navigation of that river was a matter of great importance to this country, and he thought that Her Majesty's Government should not admit any interference with that policy, which would, he believed, make it one of the great highways of commerce. With regard to the point of the hon. Member for West Bradford, he wished to express the satisfaction he felt at the acknowledgment of the right hon. Gentleman at the great forbearance which had been shown on that side of the House as regarded the foreign policy of the present Government. But while they felt that it was desirable to avoid anything which would embarrass Her Majesty's Government and increase the great difficulty in which they had been placed during the last few months, they thought at the same time that it was the paramount duty of the Government to embrace the earliest possible opportunity of taking the opinion of the House, and through the House the opinion of the country, before committing the country in any way to a change of relations with any foreign Power.

MR. HUNTER said, there was one point to which he must ask the attention of the Committee. He thought the First Lord of the Treasury and the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would admit that, if it was the intention of hon. Members to censure the course of the Government with regard to their action in reference to emigration from Scotland, they should do so at the first possible opportunity. It would be in the recollection of the Committee that when the question of the condition of the crofters was last before the House, the Government had disclosed very little with regard to their plan of emigration. In answer to Questions put to them from that side of the House, both the Lord Advocate and the First Lord had taken refuge in silence, but promised that a full scheme of emigration should be laid before the House. His astonishment had been very great to find, although the scheme had not been laid before the House, a new departure of a most grave and serious character had been taken on the sole responsibility of the Government and the Secretary for Scotland, and that on Monday last 25 families were reported to have left their homes en route for Canada. He objected to the action of the Secretary for Scotland on two grounds. In the first place, he objected to his not having first submitted his plans to Parliament, and obtained the consent of that House ; and, in the second place, he was opposed to his emigration scheme in toto. What was that scheme ? The Committee had heard that 100 crofters and their children had been sent to Canada, at the same rate at which 400 might be sent. He asked if that was a measure of the slightest practical value for the relief of distress in Lewis or for the benefit of the people in the Highlands. That ques tion the Committee would be able to understand when he had stated the figures relating to the case. Under this scheme they were to remove from the Island of Lewis 500 people out of a population which in 1881 amounted to 25,487, and which at present was probably larger; in other words, they were going to cure the distress in the Highlands by removing one out of every 51 or 52 of the population. Now, he thought that fact was sufficient to show that the action of the Government, if it was to be limited to this £10,000, was for practical purposes wholly useless; and if it was not to be so, it must be the beginning of action which would involve an enormous drain upon the Exchequer. If the people were to be expatriated to America at the cost contemplated by the Government, it was the taxpayers who would have to face a very heavy bill indeed. But he objected also to the scheme, because they had not been told on what terms the crofters had been sent out. All he could gather from the statement of the Lord Advocate was that the people were to be in a state of bondage for five years, either to the British Government or to certain Land Companies in America. They were not going out with their hands free to begin the world; they went with a load of debt upon them, which it was contemplated might, under favourable circumstances, be removed in five years; but, although in some cases there might be an ultimate improvement in the condition of the crofters, they were in the meantime to remain under the tender mercy of the Land Companies. There was another thing which he must refer to, and that was the kind of place, of all places in the world, to which they had been sent to. These people had little power of resisting cold; they lived in a climate which was naturally damp, but never very cold, and it was from such a climate that they were being sent to the British Siberia, where the extremes of heat and cold were greater than in any other part of the British dominions. Whatever might be the result of that experiment he could not regard it as one free from danger and risk, for no spot could have been less congenial to the habits of the crofters. Now, he objected again to State emigration as being nothing more than a perfectly hollow and illusory remedy for the distress in the country. Emigration had been recommended to them by no less a personage than the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and that was done upon the ground that there was something abnormal in the rapid increase of the population in Lewis; it was said that the people there were so given to multiplying their species, that it was impossible to deal with their grievances until some radical change took place in the population. But anyone who looked at the facts would see that the Lewis people were not sinners in that respect, above all others. If it were to be said that up to 1851 the population of Lewis increased somewhat rapidly, there would have been facts to support that conclusion, because, beginning with the present century and coming down to 1851, he found that the population had doubled in 45 years; whereas in England and Wales the population had doubled in 51 years. But since 1851, while the increase in the population of England and Wales had been 45 per cent, that in Lewis amounted to no more than 23 per cent, or only one-half the rate of increase in the former case. There was contained in the Papers laid on the Table of the House a most striking statement made by a gentleman who conducted the inquiry at Lewis on behalf of the Government, to the effect that in 1851 it was confidently predicted that unless the surplus population of Lewis were induced to remove some fearful calamity would ensue. But the people had not removed, and the predictions of 1851 had not been verified, and he said that the people remained and continued to multiply with great rapidity; that they had not starved, but year after year were adding to their expenditure on food and clothing, by-and-by adding luxuries to their former articles of daily use. There was nothing abnormal in the increase of the population of Lewis, although it had been larger than the increase in purely agricultural districts, the reason being that the people there had never been wholly dependent on agriculture in the present century. During the early part of the century they had the kelp industry, and after 1851 they had the fishing industry. It was, therefore, not a question of overpopulation; the distress in Lewis was simply the effect of the temporary depression under which their primary industry of herring fishing was suffering. After 1851, that industry had enlarged to such an extent as not only to maintain the whole population, which was considered very excessive, but to maintain a far larger and steadily-increasing population. He entirely refused to accept the views of those who said that the fishing industry was permanently destroyed in the Highlands; he could not believe that when there was a population of 30,000,000, so to speak, at the doors of these people, and an ocean teeming with fish, that permanent collapse of that industry had taken place, and therefore he thought the course of the Government would have been to deal with the present distress as of a temporary and not a permanent nature. The present condition of the people was not due to over-population; they were in distress, because they were denied access to the land. The general law was that a population would multiply until the lowest standard of comfort was reached, and the only thing that differentiated Lewis from the other parts of the Kingdom was that the standard of comfort there was very low. Some 200 years ago the standard of comfort throughout the country was about the same; but as time had gone on, the standard had improved elsewhere, and had remained very low in Lewis. He did not think it could be said that less than 25 per cent of the gross earnings of the people had been destroyed by the landlords. If that 25 per cent had been left to fructify in the pockets of the people, or used to raise their standard of comfort, there would be very little reason to complain of the total or relative amount of population in Lewis. He thought emigration was very much to be deprecated, because there were alternatives. There were home industries which might be created by the direct action of the Government. He was unwilling to put before the Committee any ideas on the subject, because, until they had Home Rule for Scotland and a national purse, a proposal which recommended itself to many people in Scotland might not be considered a practical one. But, to anyone who had travelled in the Highlands, it would be evident that the destiny of a large part of the Highlands was not to grow deer and sheep and grouse, but to grow timber. He did not attempt to enter into the question at any length; but he might remind hon. Members that the subject was before a Committee of the House last year, and that three foresters—the foresters of the Duke of Atholl, the Countess of Seafield and of Lord Mansfield—three of the most experienced men in Scotland, gave evidence. The substance of their testimony was that a great part of the land in the Highlands, which for a sheep rent, a deer rent, or a grouse rent, would only yield 1s. 3d. per acre, would, if planted with timber, yield from 7s. 6d. to 10s. per acre. There was unquestionably a vast amount of money in that proposal. The reason why proprietors had not planted as largely as they might was obvious; they could not afford to plant for posterity; but the nation could afford to plant for posterity, and if a practical scheme for planting the greater part of the Highlands with timber were inaugurated, it would be found that so far from it being a wise course to export the population to British Siberia, or elsewhere, they would require a larger population than existed in the Highlands at present. Therefore, he said that on every ground the conduct of the Secretary for Scotland in this matter was to be deplored; it was to be deplored that he should have taken the question of emigration out of the hands of the House of Commons and decided it for himself, and especially in the manner he had done. In order to take the sense of the Committee upon the conduct of the noble Marquess, he begged to move to reduce the Vote by £100.

MR. A. SUTHERLAND (Sutherland) said, it was quite clear that if the Government were to emigrate every man, woman, and child in the Island of Lewis with the exception of one family, and the same conditions were to apply to that family as now applied to the people, they would be paupers, because they would be shut out from the resources of nature. His hon. Friend (Mr. Hunter) had suggested certain alternatives to emigration; but there was one alternative which he did not suggest, and it was one which must naturally suggest itself to Her Majesty's Government, and that was that the people should have access to the land. That alternative should, in his opinion, take precedence of that of planting the Highlands. It was generally assumed that there was not sufficient land in the Island of Lewis for the population; yet, as a matter of fact, there was in that Island 35 acres for every man, woman, and child there. Would the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) say that the majority of the people had a holding of anything like that size? He (Mr. A. Sutherland) thought that until there was something approaching an equal division of land, it was not time to talk of emigration. They knew there was a state of things existing in the Island of Lewis that must be painful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman as well as to them. But the question was whether the Government had hit upon a proper remedy. He and his hon. Friends maintained that the Government had not done so; that they were deliberately shutting their eyes to the remedy which was at their door, and they were taking a course which would prove utterly futile. It would appear as if there never had been emigration from the Island before. There had been a constant stream of emigration from the Island for many years, and yet it had been of no use. Why? Because concurrently with that emigration there had been no opening up of the land for the people. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate knew perfectly well that the whole of the 'destitution in Lewis—the whole of the unsatisfactory state of the Island—arose from the pursuance of such a policy. This House had recognized the fact in legislation; because one of the conditions laid down in the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, was, that there should be an attempt made to revert to the state of matters with regard to the distribution of the land which existed 80 years ago. That condition was a practical recognition that the Government made a mistake in allowing the depopulation of the Island, and that landlords made a mistake in carrying it out. The Committee was perfectly justified in criticizing the conduct of the Government in the matter of emigration, because emigration was not wanted by the people. He was perfectly aware that emigration was wanted by the Highland landlords, but it was never desired by the people. While redistribution of the land had been asked for by the Highland people for years, their request had never been listened to. Emigration was wanted by the landlords, so that there would be no danger of the people asking for land, and the Government hastened to carry out the wishes of the landlords. He asked the Committee to contrast the conduct of the Government in the matter of emigration with their conduct with regard to money that was expressly voted by Act of Parliament. There was a clause in the Crofters Act to the effect that a certain amount of money should be devoted to the purpose of assisting people in the crofting parishes of the Highlands to buy boats and fishing gear; yet it was only after an agitation in the House, extending over a year, that the Government thought fit to give power that that money should be paid out of the Exchequer, and even then it was given under conditions which made it almost impossible for the people to get any benefit from it. No money had been asked by the people for emigration; but in the case where money was provided by Act of Parliament the Government did everything they could to throw obstacles in the way of giving it. Then he noticed that it was only picked families who had been deported. What would be the result on the Highlands if the flower of the population were to be taken out and the useless people left at home? What result would that have upon the development of the country? How could the Government hope to develop the fisheries, or do anything to mitigate the sufferings of the people when the flower of the population were sent away? Besides, he could not think that the conduct of the Government in this matter was Constitutional. It required an Act of Parliament to grant money in order to help the people to get fishing boats, but it seemed it required no Act of Parliament to deport the population. That was a matter upon which he hoped the Lord Advocate would be able to afford some satisfactory explanation to the Committee. For the reasons he had given, he heartily seconded the Motion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Hunter).

Mr. A. Sutherland

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £1,000, for the Secretary for Scotland, be reduced by the sum of £100."—(Mr. Hunter.)

Dr. R. M'DONALD (Ross and Cromarty) said, there was one point of some importance to which no attention had been drawn in the course of the debate, and that was that the Government had begun too late. They were sending these people to Canada after the crops had been sown, when, indeed, the crops were half-grown, and there was nothing more to do than prepare for the winter. Of course, they would have £100 to live upon; but what was to become of them until next year? Could any Gentleman who knew anything about America or Manitoba controvert the statement that emigrants going out now had nothing to do but build shanties? If the Government wanted to send these people away, why not send them just when the snow was melting? As it was, the money given to them would be spent before the next season came round. He was afraid that either this Government or the Government of Canada would have to furnish these people with money to prevent them dying of starvation. There was another point to which he wanted to direct attention. This was the only remedy, as his hon. Friend the Member for Sutherland (Mr. A. Sutherland) had said, which was always offered to them, no matter what Government was in Office. The Government professed to know the wants of the Highland people better than they who had been born and bred amongst those people. The Lord Advocate could not but allow that if he moved half the crofters in the Highlands, and gave two crofts to each crofter remaining, the latter would be very nearly as badly off as hitherto. But supposing that half the population were removed, and that the remaining crofters would be better off, what did the proposal mean? It meant that they would have to remove from 20,000 to 25,000 families. Were the Government prepared to do that? If not, what was their remedy worth? Who was to gain by this scheme? He did not see how the landlords would gain. He understood that each family was to get £120 out in Canada. Assuming that on the average there were five in a family, the fares to Manitoba would bring the total cost of the emigration of each family to £180. To remove half the population of the Highlands, therefore, they would be required to spend £3,600,000. Was the country prepared to spend so large a sum of money in sending crofters out of the country? It would be much more sensible for this Government, or any Government, to spend £500,000 sterling in increasing the crofts, and giving the crofters a chance of making a living in the country in which they were. But the Government seemed to think it was the landlords who must be attended to—that they must not be interfered with in any way. Why had the present Government, who had assented to the proposal for increasing the holdings, when asked to prepare rules and regulations respecting the increase of holdings, always answered “No?” He would not weary the Committee with any further observations, because what he was particularly anxious about was that the Lord Advocate should tell the Committee how these people were to live in Manitoba until they got their first crops out of the ground.

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD: My hon. Friend (Mr. Hunter) was correct in saying that the answers given to the Questions have been dull in the sense of being short; but if, in answering Questions, one had gone into an argument, it would have taken up too much time, besides being irregular. But I think I stated very distinctly, in my answers to Questions, that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to give a full opportunity to discuss this matter upon an Estimate which would be laid before the Committee of the House for this purpose. I take it that it is the mind and intention of my hon. Friends that it would be more just to go into the matter then, and that this is but a preliminary skirmish with the view of opening up the question. Having given that distinct intimation, it was our intention to place materials before hon. Members in ample time for that discussion, because it could not come on before the Recess. My hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Hunter) made a remark which struck me as a very remarkable one. He said the proprietors in Lewis had in the past taken 25 per cent of the gross earnings of the land, and all the other earnings, to themselves. If that was the case, and if it be the fact, as has been stated over and over again in this House, that the average payment to the landlord in Lewis is only £2—[HON. MEMBERS: £4.] I beg pardon; my information is different; but I will take it at £4.

of the day. Some words were uttered by the Prime Minister, in his capacity as Foreign Secretary some time ago, which remained in the memory of all men who had business obligations in every part of the world. The noble Lord indicated that whatever might happen to be the policy of Austria must be a question of primary interest to this country. Those words must be construed to carry with them a very great danger to this country. If complications should arise in the East of Europe, he wanted to have an assurance from the Government that it was their firm intention not to make this country responsible, should an international war break out. Many of them would remember the circumstances of the Crimean War. They knew that in that case Great Britain was the first of the Great Powers to rush into conflict with Russia, and that, in reality, we left Austria and Germany with their hands absolutely free, laughing in their sleeves, while we fought the conflict in which they were much more interested than we. We might find that situation repeated, and he wished to ascertain whether the Government had learned wisdom from the experience this country had gained in the Crimean War. We had the admission of more than one foreign statesman that the policy pursued by this country on that occasion was unwise, and that the conflict, as far as we were concerned, might have been avoided for a considerable period, if not altogether. He, therefore, wished to know from the mouth of the hon. Gentleman who represented the Foreign Office, and from Her Majesty's Government generally, that there existed no obligation by which this country could become involved in any foreign complication in the event of the peace of Europe being disturbed. He did not say that this country ought to take no share, no matter what complications might arise, because something might happen which might affect us as well as other parts of the world. But assuredly it became us to be guided by a due sense of our responsibility in regard to our Colonial engagements and our relationship to our dependencies, and we should be the very last to commit ourselves and tie our hands in reference to any foreign Power. He would confess that, if there was a lingering disposition on the part of the Government to take part in any Continental broil—our Army, as had been stated by the Adjutant General and the Commander-in-Chief, was really too weak for any such purpose. If, on the other hand, the Government maintained the steady purpose not to interfere in any continental squabble which was likely to break out in the existing relations between Russia, Austria, and Germany, he thought it would be possible for this country to maintain such a position as would not render it necessary to make any large increase in the Army. Probably most of them would agree that our Navy ought to be maintained at such strength as to afford full security to our possessions at home and abroad. He thought that the present provision for the Navy was ample for that purpose, if we kept ourselves free from Continental complications. There was no reason why there should not exist between this country and France and this country and Russia such a state of feeling as would keep us apart from any Continental squabble. In that case this country would run no risk whatever, and there would be very little necessity for an increase of expenditure on the part of the Army. He hoped to have an assurance from the hon. Gentleman representing the Foreign Office or from the First Lord of the Treasury, that it was the desire of the Government and their intention to leave our hands free from any entangling engagements which would deprive us of our freedom of action if war should unhappily break out on the Continent.

Mr. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) said, he desired to call the attention of the Committee to Vote No. 29.

Mr. LABOUCHERE rose to Order, and said that he desired to discuss several Votes before the hon. Member moved the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Dr. CLARK (Caithness) said, he had recently asked a Question of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs as to the Zambesi River. The Portuguese claimed all that portion of South Africa from the Indian Ocean to the Atlantic Ocean. Now, upon some of the tributaries of the Zambesi River, as well as upon the Zambesi River itself, there were a considerable number of British subjects. The Portuguese, however, had deprived them of the means of navigating the river, and he wanted to know whether the Government would take steps to protect British traders and the Scotch missionaries on the Zambesi River from the encroachments and usurpations of the Portuguese Government and their subjects? If they took no such steps, they practically, by their inaction, recognized the Zambesi River and its tributaries as belonging to the Portuguese Government. We had taken over a portion of the territory of one of the Chiefs which ran down to the Zambesi River. At present, all the mouths of the river were in the hands of the Portuguese, who imposed transit duties on foreign goods or everything that went into Africa by means of that river. He was not prepared to say that they had not the right to place transit duties on all goods that entered Africa by means of the Zambesi River. That was rather a question for the consideration of the Government. But he was informed that the Portuguese Authorities were preventing our steamers from coasting there, and were demanding that British vessels trading there, and the missionaries who had settlements on Lake Nyassa, should fly the Portuguese flag or cease trading. He wished to know whether the Government intended to protect British subjects and their steamers, or to acknowledge the right of the Portuguese Government to prevent the British Government sailing on the Zambesi River, having in view the fact that by taking over territory which ran down to the river they had now become one of the Powers on the Zambesi? There was another point which he also desired to call attention to. He had put a Question to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, in regard to a Return moved for by the hon. Member for Bristol in reference to the Office of Registrar of Friendly Societies. The Secretary to the Treasury said, in reply, that he had no means of getting the information asked for. He might tell the hon. Gentleman that some of the secretaries and officials of these friendly societies were getting larger salaries than the Prime Minister himself. Two of them received £6,000 a-year each. To his knowledge, there were 9,000,000 or 10,000,000 of persons, principally belonging to the working classes, who were insured in these industrial and friendly societies.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not see how this subject comes under this Vote.

DR. CLARK said, it came under the Vote for the Registration of Friendly Societies, which was Vote 13. He had said, last year, that he would move the rejection of the Vote, unless something was done to make the Office a reality instead of a sham. The present registration meant nothing, but it led people to believe that, because the rules were registered, there was Government security. The Government had indicated that they were willing to appoint a Select Committee to consider the whole question, and the hon. Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) had brought in a Bill upon the subject. He understood, however, that the Government were opposing that Bill. The hon. Baronet said that his measure only affected collecting societies; but this was a question affecting the whole of our working population, as one of these societies consisted of from 6,000,000 to 7,000,000 members. The Secretary to the Treasury had refused to print evidence which was given on the last inquiry. He (Dr. Clark) thought the time had arrived when there ought to be a full investigation into the working of the Act. Then would come the time for the Select Committee to consider the matter. As they had received a pledge from the Treasury last Session, he thought the Government ought now to state what they intended to do in the matter. The Secretary to the Treasury had stated that they could not get the information; but if a Select Committee were appointed, it would soon be able to lay all the information that was necessary before the House and the Government.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) said, he should like to say a few words on this subject before the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) rose to reply to the observations of hon. Members who had spoken on that side of the House. There were undoubtedly many of the Scotch people who at that moment took a very strong interest in the condition of affairs in the interior of Africa, and who thought that the fact that many of the missionaries were at stations beyond the settlement of any European Power was no reason for their not receiving protection at the hands of the British Government. The first and most important point which they were inclined to urge on Her Majesty's Government was that which had been put forward by the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark)—namely, that the access to the interior—the only good and available one—by the Zambesi, should be kept open to all nations, and particularly to this country, which had made settlements in the interior of that part of Africa. He urged on Her Majesty's Government to enforce on Portugal and other Powers the necessity of keeping open the Zambesi as an international highway. Portugal had undoubtedly certain legal rights on the South African littoral, and she had of late been not only exercising those rights, but, as he thought, unduly extending them in the manner alluded to by his hon. Friend. Hon. Members, he thought, ought to insist that the Government should recognize in no way whatever any territorial Sovereignty in South Africa over the waters of the Zambesi. We had a Consul at Nyassa—of course, not accredited to any Power, because there was no Power to whom he could be accredited—whose duty it would be to look after British interests when an appeal was made to him. Such an appeal would be made to him naturally when an attack was made upon the settlement by the slave dealers, and he, in his turn, would naturally appeal to the British Government for instructions. He, therefore, urged upon the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that something should be done for the maintenance of the authority of our Consul; that there should be no recognition, under any circumstances whatever, of any claim to territorial Sovereignty in the interior; and, lastly, the maintenance in all cases of free navigation on the Zambesi.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge) said, that the considerations laid before the Committee with regard to the position in Southern Africa were exceedingly important at the present time, and it was also necessary that they should ascertain from the Government what were their views and policy with regard to the Northern districts. At present, our territory, so far as it was represented by the Protectorate, was limited by a line drawn on a level with the Northern boundary of the Transvaal—that was to say, the 22nd parallel. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman would know the limits to which he (Mr. Conybeare) referred. In the last few weeks news had arrived that we had actually extended our Protectorate in some form or other to Bechuanaland. He asked the right hon. Gentleman what territories that Protectorate included, and whether the Government themselves had any clear idea of the limit to which the Portuguese territory was supposed to extend Westward from the Eastern seaboard; because it appeared to him, from what he had been able to gather, that the limits of the Portuguese territory were altogether of the most shadowy and uncertain character. It was worth while to recollect what took place in connection with Angra Peguena. He believed they had kept Germany waiting for two years to know our views with regard to the interior of Africa, in consequence of which Prince Bismarck became impatient, and secured a tract of territory which he believed he was correct in saying exceeded in extent anything which the people of this country believed to be in the hands of Germany. The cession of Angra Peguena included the acquisition by Germany of a huge district in which were some of the richest gold mines in South Africa. They did not want the same sort of imbroglio to arise in connection with Matabeleland as had arisen in that case. He did not say that it was wise for the Government to lay down a hard and fast line of demarcation. That would be impossible; but they did not want to allow matters to drift in an unbusiness-like way in connection with affairs in South Africa, and presently to find that Germany or Portugal had established a locus standi in the country, and acquired a vested interest which it would be impossible not to recognize. There were two courses which this country might adopt with reference to Matabeleland—one was that we should never interfere with a view to appropriating that country; and the other was to make it clear to other countries that we had interests there, and that those interests would probably extend in future, and that we intended to take such means for their protection as might be necessary. The first course appeared to him to be impossible; because, although it was well known that some parts of the Transvaal were rich in gold and precious stones, this district was richer than anything they had yet seen. It was probable, therefore, that there would be a very considerable inrush of British subjects into Matabeleland. If that were so, it would be far better to take a statesman-like view of the situation and decide, once for all, what shape our policy should assume rather than let the matter slide. They did not want the history of Stellaland and Zululand to be repeated in Matabeleland. They had a right to ask that the Government should come to some understanding with Portugal as to where its territory was to begin and where it was to end; and if the right hon. Gentleman knew how that matter stood, he should be glad if he would give the Committee some information about it. It was well known that there had been some expeditions by British officers across the Victoria Falls, and the accounts given of the country showed how interesting it was, and how rich it would become if it were developed and fully opened up. Another consideration was that British subjects were already flocking into the country. He asked the right hon. Gentleman whether it was not a fact that valuable concessions had been granted, or attempted to be obtained, of mineral rights extending over huge tracts of the country? If the country was to come at all under British control, he thought they had a right to claim that concessions of mineral rights should not be made to individuals. He thought these matters should be regulated; because the difficulties which had arisen in other parts of South Africa were the consequence of the Chiefs unknowingly assigning away their rights. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman had already taken steps in that direction; and if so, he should be glad to hear what had been done. He should like to point out to the Government that there was a very strong feeling amongst those who were conversant with matters in Bechuanaland and Matabeleland generally that the proper trade route to the latter would be through Bechuanaland, and that the best thing to be done would be to extend the existing railway. This, although a difficult undertaking, would be an important step to take, and would not cost more than £3,000,000, a sum that we had thrown away on Sir Charles Warren's expedition, which was practically useless. If that money had been spent in constructing this railway, it would have been a thousand times more usefully employed than on that expedition. He was told that the Germans had an expedition in Matabeleland at the present time, or, at any rate, that there was competition between them, the Portuguese, and other nations, for a locus standi in the country. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman could give the Committee some information on this subject. It was very desirable that we should come to some common understanding with those countries that were taking action on the Continent, and prevent the recurrence of such a step as was taken by Germany in the case of Angra Peguena.

Mr. Buchanan

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): I do not think Her Majesty's Government will ever complain of interest being taken in foreign affairs and of demands being made for information before any step is made which would involve the interests of the country. I am glad to acknowledge the reticence and prudence of hon. Gentlemen in the midst of anxious affairs, in not unduly pressing the Government, and I hope that the assurances that I gave the House at the beginning of the Session, when challenged directly on the subject raised by the hon. Member for Bradford, were satisfactory to the House. I then assured the Committee that the Government had not entered into any engagement pledging the material action of the country which was not known to the House of Commons—that is to say, that the Government were free to deal in the interest of the country with events as they might occur. There had been no fresh engagements incurred by the Government since, and the position remained the same as when he last explained it. It would, indeed, be most imprudent for the Government to make any general and binding declaration of abstinence from interference in the affairs of the world. When we considered how wide and diversified were our national interests, and how great was the influence of this country in assisting in the maintenance of the peace of the world, any declaration of total abstinence from interference in European politics would be not only imprudent, but unworthy of the duty we owed to the world. I hope that will be considered by the hon. Member for West Bradford a sufficient answer to the observations he has made. I would remind the Committee that a wide discussion on foreign affairs is unnecessary at this moment, because the Foreign Office Vote stands first on the Paper for discussion on the 31st of the present month, and foreign affairs will, therefore, occupy our attention when the House re-assembles after Whitsuntide. But in answer to the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark), who has put some questions of undoubtedly great interest, I say that Her Majesty's Government distinctly do not recognize unlimited claims on the part of Portugal in the interior of Africa. The conditions by which the spheres of influence of European Powers in South Africa are bounded are perfectly well known. Those influences are not recognized, except where settlements take place, and where a Power possessed the means of maintaining order, protecting foreigners, and controlling the Natives. Where a Power, though seated on the sea coast, has made no approach to a settlement in the interior, and no step in the fulfilment of international duties, it is evident that we cannot recognize that it has any claim to deny us free commerce with the interior by a natural highway. Thus Her Majesty's Government cannot for a moment admit a right on the part of such a Power to stop the free passage of the Zambesi, which gives access to regions where the enterprize of our fellow-countrymen has already made considerable progress. It is a matter of regret that our commerce should be hindered by heavy charges; but where no international obligations interpose, it is in the power of Portugal or any other country to levy such duties as she may impose within her own territories. Hon. Members opposite have referred to the condition of the settlements in the interior of Africa. I must entirely deny that anything like a state of war has been entered into by Her Majesty's Consul on the authority of Her Majesty's Government. It is true that in view of the danger that threatened European Settlements, two British Consuls assisted personally in checking an attack upon those Settlements and in beating back the Arabs, but undoubtedly it would not be the duty of the Consul to join in any hostile expedition against these tribes. It had been said it was for the settlers themselves to take steps for their own protection. That was obviously their duty, and it would be out of question to hinder them from taking steps for their own legitimate defence; but it would be incurring a most dangerous responsibility if Her Majesty's Government were to authorize, as suggested by the hon. Member for West Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan), the Consul to enrol men, or to take up any position in which he would require to be supported in case of disaster. It would be impossible that we could support a force entirely cut off from the British base, and from British territory. The hon. Member for the Camborne Division of Cornwall (Mr. Conybeare) has asked me questions with regard to matters of very recent date, but I hope he will allow me to postpone giving an answer to them, because it would require reference to documents which are not at hand. I trust it will not be supposed that we are not aware of the importance of not losing an opportunity of developing our interest through supineness, and the recent assumption of our Protectorate in what is generally called Amatongaland is a clear indication that neither the Imperial nor Colonial Authorities are indifferent to their obligations in that respect. I hope we shall keep pace with the expansion of colonization within the sphere of these most important Colonies in South Africa, the legitimate development of which they have a right to expect shall not be checked. It is undoubtedly an important point to which the hon. Member has directed attention, namely, that there should be no waste of the valuable mineral deposits in these countries by hurried grants made by the Native Chiefs, so that if they should become British Colonies, they should not be found to have been despoiled of those natural resources. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that those important considerations will not be lost sight of. In assuming a Protectorate it is evident that we ought to give advice and also exercise control.

DR. CLARK: Have we assumed a Protectorate over Matabeleland?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: I must, I think, ask the hon. Member to give me Notice to enable me to answer that question with more precision than I can do at the present moment. I had no intimation that this discussion would be initiated to night ; but I may say that of the correctness of the view that British enterprise in these territories should proceed on a settled plan, there can, I think, be no doubt. While there is much to be said in favour of the view that the vast regions of the interior of Africa should be opened up by an extension of railways from the South, it seems to me that there may also be valuable communication from points on the Eastern Coast. I trust the Committee will not think it necessary for me now to go into further details, and I am only sorry that it has not been possible for me to anticipate the questions which hon. Gentlemen opposite have referred to.

Sir James Fergusson

MR. W. H. SMITH : As there will be another and early opportunity of discussing foreign affairs, I claim to move "That the Question be now put."

THE CHAIRMAN said, that looking at the time of the evening (7 p.m.), and the importance of the subject, he thought it reasonable that the discussion should proceed, say for another half-hour.

Debate resumed.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) said he did not propose to enter into the discussion on Matabeleland, because he thought the right hon. Gentleman had shown that it was desirable not to do so without Notice. He rose only to advert very shortly to the points raised by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) and the hon. Member for West Bradford (Mr. Illingworth). He hoped he was correct in understanding that it was the intention of the Government that there should be free and open navigation of the Zambesi. The free navigation of that river was a matter of great importance to this country, and he thought that Her Majesty's Government should not admit any interference with that policy, which would, he believed, make it one of the great highways of commerce. With regard to the point of the hon. Member for West Bradford, he wished to express the satisfaction he felt at the acknowledgment of the right hon. Gentleman at the great forbearance which had been shown on that side of the House as regarded the foreign policy of the present Government. But while they felt that it was desirable to avoid anything which would embarrass Her Majesty's Government and increase the great difficulty in which they had been placed during the last few months, they thought at the same time that it was the paramount duty of the Government to embrace the earliest possible opportunity of taking the opinion of the House, and through the House the opinion of the country, before committing the country in any way to a change of relations with any foreign Power.

MR. HUNTER said, there was one point to which he must ask the attention of the Committee. He thought the First Lord of the Treasury and the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would admit that, if it was the intention of hon. Members to censure the course of the Government with regard to their action in reference to emigration from Scotland, they should do so at the first possible opportunity. It would be in the recollection of the Committee that when the question of the condition of the crofters was last before the House, the Government had disclosed very little with regard to their plan of emigration. In answer to Questions put to them from that side of the House, both the Lord Advocate and the First Lord had taken refuge in silence, but promised that a full scheme of emigration should be laid before the House. His astonishment had been very great to find, although the scheme had not been laid before the House, a new departure of a most grave and serious character had been taken on the sole responsibility of the Government and the Secretary for Scotland, and that on Monday last 25 families were reported to have left their homes en route for Canada. He objected to the action of the Secretary for Scotland on two grounds. In the first place, he objected to his not having first submitted his plans to Parliament, and obtained the consent of that House ; and, in the second place, he was opposed to his emigration scheme in toto. What was that scheme ? The Committee had heard that 100 crofters and their children had been sent to Canada, at the same rate at which 400 might be sent. He asked if that was a measure of the slightest practical value for the relief of distress in Lewis or for the benefit of the people in the Highlands. That ques tion the Committee would be able to understand when he had stated the figures relating to the case. Under this scheme they were to remove from the Island of Lewis 500 people out of a population which in 1881 amounted to 25,487, and which at present was probably larger; in other words, they were going to cure the distress in the Highlands by removing one out of every 51 or 52 of the population. Now, he thought that fact was sufficient to show that the action of the Government, if it was to be limited to this £10,000, was for practical purposes wholly useless; and if it was not to be so, it must be the beginning of action which would involve an enormous drain upon the Exchequer. If the people were to be expatriated to America at the cost contemplated by the Government, it was the taxpayers who would have to face a very heavy bill indeed. But he objected also to the scheme, because they had not been told on what terms the crofters had been sent out. All he could gather from the statement of the Lord Advocate was that the people were to be in a state of bondage for five years, either to the British Government or to certain Land Companies in America. They were not going out with their hands free to begin the world; they went with a load of debt upon them, which it was contemplated might, under favourable circumstances, be removed in five years; but, although in some cases there might be an ultimate improvement in the condition of the crofters, they were in the meantime to remain under the tender mercy of the Land Companies. There was another thing which he must refer to, and that was the kind of place, of all places in the world, to which they had been sent to. These people had little power of resisting cold; they lived in a climate which was naturally damp, but never very cold, and it was from such a climate that they were being sent to the British Siberia, where the extremes of heat and cold were greater than in any other part of the British dominions. Whatever might be the result of that experiment he could not regard it as one free from danger and risk, for no spot could have been less congenial to the habits of the crofters. Now, he objected again to State emigration as being nothing more than a perfectly hollow and illusory remedy for the distress in the country. Emigration had been recommended to them by no less a personage than the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and that was done upon the ground that there was something abnormal in the rapid increase of the population in Lewis; it was said that the people there were so given to multiplying their species, that it was impossible to deal with their grievances until some radical change took place in the population. But anyone who looked at the facts would see that the Lewis people were not sinners in that respect, above all others. If it were to be said that up to 1851 the population of Lewis increased somewhat rapidly, there would have been facts to support that conclusion, because, beginning with the present century and coming down to 1851, he found that the population had doubled in 45 years; whereas in England and Wales the population had doubled in 51 years. But since 1851, while the increase in the population of England and Wales had been 45 per cent, that in Lewis amounted to no more than 23 per cent, or only one-half the rate of increase in the former case. There was contained in the Papers laid on the Table of the House a most striking statement made by a gentleman who conducted the inquiry at Lewis on behalf of the Government, to the effect that in 1851 it was confidently predicted that unless the surplus population of Lewis were induced to remove some fearful calamity would ensue. But the people had not removed, and the predictions of 1851 had not been verified, and he said that the people remained and continued to multiply with great rapidity; that they had not starved, but year after year were adding to their expenditure on food and clothing, by-and-by adding luxuries to their former articles of daily use. There was nothing abnormal in the increase of the population of Lewis, although it had been larger than the increase in purely agricultural districts, the reason being that the people there had never been wholly dependent on agriculture in the present century. During the early part of the century they had the kelp industry, and after 1851 they had the fishing industry. It was, therefore, not a question of overpopulation; the distress in Lewis was simply the effect of the temporary depression under which their primary industry of herring fishing was suffering. After 1851, that industry had enlarged to such an extent as not only to maintain the whole population, which was considered very excessive, but to maintain a far larger and steadily-increasing population. He entirely refused to accept the views of those who said that the fishing industry was permanently destroyed in the Highlands; he could not believe that when there was a population of 30,000,000, so to speak, at the doors of these people, and an ocean teeming with fish, that permanent collapse of that industry had taken place, and therefore he thought the course of the Government would have been to deal with the present distress as of a temporary and not a permanent nature. The present condition of the people was not due to over-population; they were in distress, because they were denied access to the land. The general law was that a population would multiply until the lowest standard of comfort was reached, and the only thing that differentiated Lewis from the other parts of the Kingdom was that the standard of comfort there was very low. Some 200 years ago the standard of comfort throughout the country was about the same; but as time had gone on, the standard had improved elsewhere, and had remained very low in Lewis. He did not think it could be said that less than 25 per cent of the gross earnings of the people had been destroyed by the landlords. If that 25 per cent had been left to fructify in the pockets of the people, or used to raise their standard of comfort, there would be very little reason to complain of the total or relative amount of population in Lewis. He thought emigration was very much to be deprecated, because there were alternatives. There were home industries which might be created by the direct action of the Government. He was unwilling to put before the Committee any ideas on the subject, because, until they had Home Rule for Scotland and a national purse, a proposal which recommended itself to many people in Scotland might not be considered a practical one. But, to anyone who had travelled in the Highlands, it would be evident that the destiny of a large part of the Highlands was not to grow deer and sheep and grouse, but to grow timber. He did not attempt to enter into the question at any length; but he might remind hon. Members that the subject was before a Committee of the House last year, and that three foresters—the foresters of the Duke of Atholl, the Countess of Seafield and of Lord Mansfield—three of the most experienced men in Scotland, gave evidence. The substance of their testimony was that a great part of the land in the Highlands, which for a sheep rent, a deer rent, or a grouse rent, would only yield 1s. 3d. per acre, would, if planted with timber, yield from 7s. 6d. to 10s. per acre. There was unquestionably a vast amount of money in that proposal. The reason why proprietors had not planted as largely as they might was obvious; they could not afford to plant for posterity; but the nation could afford to plant for posterity, and if a practical scheme for planting the greater part of the Highlands with timber were inaugurated, it would be found that so far from it being a wise course to export the population to British Siberia, or elsewhere, they would require a larger population than existed in the Highlands at present. Therefore, he said that on every ground the conduct of the Secretary for Scotland in this matter was to be deplored; it was to be deplored that he should have taken the question of emigration out of the hands of the House of Commons and decided it for himself, and especially in the manner he had done. In order to take the sense of the Committee upon the conduct of the noble Marquess, he begged to move to reduce the Vote by £100.

Mr. Hunter

MR. A. SUTHERLAND (Sutherland) said, it was quite clear that if the Government were to emigrate every man, woman, and child in the Island of Lewis with the exception of one family, and the same conditions were to apply to that family as now applied to the people, they would be paupers, because they would be shut out from the resources of nature. His hon. Friend (Mr. Hunter) had suggested certain alternatives to emigration; but there was one alternative which he did not suggest, and it was one which must naturally suggest itself to Her Majesty's Government, and that was that the people should have access to the land. That alternative should, in his opinion, take precedence of that of planting the Highlands. It was generally assumed that there was not sufficient land in the Island of Lewis for the population; yet, as a matter of fact, there was in that Island 35 acres for every man, woman, and child there. Would the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) say that the majority of the people had a holding of anything like that size? He (Mr. A. Sutherland) thought that until there was something approaching an equal division of land, it was not time to talk of emigration. They knew there was a state of things existing in the Island of Lewis that must be painful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman as well as to them. But the question was whether the Government had hit upon a proper remedy. He and his hon. Friends maintained that the Government had not done so; that they were deliberately shutting their eyes to the remedy which was at their door, and they were taking a course which would prove utterly futile. It would appear as if there never had been emigration from the Island before. There had been a constant stream of emigration from the Island for many years, and yet it had been of no use. Why? Because concurrently with that emigration there had been no opening up of the land for the people. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate knew perfectly well that the whole of the 'destitution in Lewis—the whole of the unsatisfactory state of the Island—arose from the pursuance of such a policy. This House had recognized the fact in legislation; because one of the conditions laid down in the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, was, that there should be an attempt made to revert to the state of matters with regard to the distribution of the land which existed 80 years ago. That condition was a practical recognition that the Government made a mistake in allowing the depopulation of the Island, and that landlords made a mistake in carrying it out. The Committee was perfectly justified in criticizing the conduct of the Government in the matter of emigration, because emigration was not wanted by the people. He was perfectly aware that emigration was wanted by the Highland landlords, but it was never desired by the people. While redistribution of the land had been asked for by the Highland people for years, their request had never been listened to. Emigration was wanted by the landlords, so that there would be no danger of the people asking for land, and the Government hastened to carry out the wishes of the landlords. He asked the Committee to contrast the conduct of the Government in the matter of emigration with their conduct with regard to money that was expressly voted by Act of Parliament. There was a clause in the Crofters Act to the effect that a certain amount of money should be devoted to the purpose of assisting people in the crofting parishes of the Highlands to buy boats and fishing gear; yet it was only after an agitation in the House, extending over a year, that the Government thought fit to give power that that money should be paid out of the Exchequer, and even then it was given under conditions which made it almost impossible for the people to get any benefit from it. No money had been asked by the people for emigration; but in the case where money was provided by Act of Parliament the Government did everything they could to throw obstacles in the way of giving it. Then he noticed that it was only picked families who had been deported. What would be the result on the Highlands if the flower of the population were to be taken out and the useless people left at home? What result would that have upon the development of the country? How could the Government hope to develop the fisheries, or do anything to mitigate the sufferings of the people when the flower of the population were sent away? Besides, he could not think that the conduct of the Government in this matter was Constitutional. It required an Act of Parliament to grant money in order to help the people to get fishing boats, but it seemed it required no Act of Parliament to deport the population. That was a matter upon which he hoped the Lord Advocate would be able to afford some satisfactory explanation to the Committee. For the reasons he had given, he heartily seconded the Motion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Hunter).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £1,000, for the Secretary for Scotland, be reduced by the sum of £100."—(Mr. Hunter.)

DR. R. McDONALD (Mr. Hunter's martyr) said,

Mr. A. Sutherland

importance to which no attention had been drawn in the course of the debate, and that was that the Government had begun too late. They were sending these people to Canada after the crops had been sown, when, indeed, the crops were half-grown, and there was nothing more to do than prepare for the winter. Of course, they would have £100 to live upon; but what was to become of them until next year? Could any Gentleman who knew anything about America or Manitoba controvert the statement that emigrants going out now had nothing to do but build shanties? If the Government wanted to send these people away, why not send them just when the snow was melting? As it was, the money given to them would be spent before the next season came round. He was afraid that either this Government or the Government of Canada would have to furnish these people with money to prevent them dying of starvation. There was another point to which he wanted to direct attention. This was the only remedy, as his hon. Friend the Member for Sutherland (Mr. A. Sutherland) had said, which was always offered to them, no matter what Government was in Office. The Government professed to know the wants of the Highland people better than they who had been born and bred amongst those people. The Lord Advocate could not but allow that if he moved half the crofters in the Highlands, and gave two crofts to each crofter remaining, the latter would be very nearly as badly off as hitherto. But supposing that half the population were removed, and that the remaining crofters would be better off, what did the proposal mean? It meant that they would have to remove from 20,000 to 25,000 families. Were the Government prepared to do that? If not, what was their remedy worth? Who was to gain by this scheme? He did not see how the landlords would gain. He understood that each family was to get £120 out in Canada. Assuming that on the average there were five in a family, the fares to Manitoba would bring the total cost of the emigration of each family to £180. To remove half the population of the Highlands, therefore, they would be required to spend £2,000,000. Was the country prepared to send out so large a sum of money in would be much more sensible for this Government, or any Government, to spend £500,000 sterling in increasing the crofts, and giving the crofters a chance of making a living in the country in which they were. But the Government seemed to think it was the landlords who must be attended to—that they must not be interfered with in any way. Why had the present Government, who had assented to the proposal for increasing the holdings, when asked to prepare rules and regulations respecting the increase of holdings, always answered “No?” He would not weary the Committee with any further observations, because what he was particularly anxious about was that the Lord Advocate should tell the Committee how these people were to live in Manitoba until they got their first crops out of the ground.

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD: My hon. Friend (Mr. Hunter) was correct in saying that the answers given to the Questions have been dull in the sense of being short; but if, in answering Questions, one had gone into an argument, it would have taken up too much time, besides being irregular. But I think I stated very distinctly, in my answers to Questions, that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to give a full opportunity to discuss this matter upon an Estimate which would be laid before the Committee of the House for this purpose. I take it that it is the mind and intention of my hon. Friends that it would be more just to go into the matter then, and that this is but a preliminary skirmish with the view of opening up the question. Having given that distinct intimation, it was our intention to place materials before hon. Members in ample time for that discussion, because it could not come on before the Recess. My hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Hunter) made a remark which struck me as a very remarkable one. He said the proprietors in Lewis had in the past taken 25 per cent of the gross earnings of the land, and all the other earnings, to themselves. If that was the case, and if it be the fact, as has been stated over and over again in this House, that the average payment to the landlord in Lewis is only £2—[Hon. MEMBERS: £4.] I beg pardon; my information is different; but I will take it at £4.

DR. CLARK: £4. We got the information from yourself.

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD: I do not think I ever stated that the average rental in Lewis was £4. If I did, it was, I believe, wrong; but I will take it at so much. Twenty-five per cent on that would leave for the whole family £16 per annum upon which they could live. But our policy has been all along to accept the decision of the Crofters' Commission, which sat some years ago; which declared that, without emigration from the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, there was no real hope of any satisfactory solution of the difficulties which exist. We have been supported in that by hon. Members of the Party opposite, who have inquired into this question, and have in this House, within the present year, told us the same thing. Our policy is one which we have declared over and over again, and it has been met with obloquy. I am afraid we must bear that obloquy. If it is wrong, it must be put right by those who have the power to put it right; but consistency in this matter is the course we intend to pursue. We cannot help it. It is said that this is a scheme to send people out from the Highlands to what is called British Siberia. I can only say that people who have gone from the Highlands to that part of the British Dominions on former occasions have prospered, and have been happy and successful; and that the result of their going, on the inducement of others, had been that they themselves had induced others to go. The experiment we have made is a small one; but, in making it, we give the best proof of our good faith. If this place to which these people have gone out is, indeed, a British Siberia, then we have done certainly a most foolish thing as regards the future, because the reports which will reach home will be such as will prevent any further carrying out of our scheme. We are willing to face that condition, and we shall see who is right in the matter. Observations made here are reported; and I only say this for the purpose of stating that we do not agree with hon. Members opposite that it will be found to be a Siberia. No doubt, people who go out to Canada, and accept its more genial summer, which is better adapted for raising good crops, must face the consequence of a severe winter. These people in Lewis are spoken of as being "deported." I really must ask my hon. Friends not to use such language; it is not fair. There is not one of the persons who has gone off in the steamer to-day who has not gone willingly. As a matter of fact, there has been a difficulty in making a choice, and many have remained behind disappointed. I say it is not fair to use such a word as "deported," which indicates compulsion, instead of, as we hope, willingness, and with the result of inducing others to go. If there is not willingness to go, then our scheme falls through. I may mention another fact which I think of good omen. The opportunity presented to these people to go abroad has resulted in this—out of 100 who have gone I learn to-day that six married before they started. I am glad to say they were sufficiently prudent to abstain from entering on the obligations of matrimony before they started for that land, where, we believe, they will prosper. My hon. Friend the Member for Ross (Dr. R. McDonald) complains that these people have been sent out so late in the year. I quite admit it would have been a good thing if we could have started them a little sooner this year. That was not to be done; but we have had very excellent advice, and the advice given by those who know something about the matter is that we are not too late in sending them out, considering the way they will be received and looked after during their first year. It is a serious matter; but I can assure hon. Members it was not overlooked. Now I would like to correct one or two matters of fact. There is no intention to ask any interest on the money advanced to these people for the first four years, so that they will not be oppressed with any fear of that; and although they are to receive the money for four years without deduction, ultimate payments, including principal and interest, will not come to more than £4 16s. per £100.

MR. HUNTER: For how many years will it run?

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD: I think it will run for about 12 years, and I think there will be no difficulty in accomplishing that repayment. Nor will there be the least disposition on this side of the ocean or the other to press these people, if it should turn out that the period is too short. The matter will be controlled and managed by a Board of Commissioners, representing the Imperial Government, the Canadian Government, private subscribers, and the Land Companies.

MR. A. SUTHERLAND: Will the crofters who receive the money be represented?

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD: I think they will be represented by the private subscribers, who have philanthropically advanced money.

MR. A. SUTHERLAND: Are those who pay the interest represented direct?

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD: It is not usual, I think, so to treat people who have money advanced to them, and have to repay it. But, I repeat, they are substantially represented by the private subscribers, who have taken an extreme interest in this philanthropic scheme, and believe in its success. It is perfectly true that what we are doing at this particular moment is, as the hon. Member (Mr. Hunter) has said, a mere drop in the bucket. But you must make a beginning somewhere. If we succeed, as I earnestly hope we shall, we shall have a good opportunity of showing whether emigration can be carried out with practical success; and I have no doubt, if it is shown that that can be done, the people themselves will take it up.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) said, he would much have preferred that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate, instead of entering into a discussion which was hardly germane to the particular Vote before them, had told them by what authority, statutory or otherwise, the Government engaged in a scheme involving expenditure without, first of all, obtaining for it the sanction of the country. The right hon. and learned Gentleman told them that a Commission was to be appointed, and he told them how that Commission was to be constituted. Was that Commission to be a statutory one; and, if so, by what authority was it to be appointed? Was it to be appointed by Parliament; and, if it was to be appointed by Parliament, why had the Government commenced a scheme to be regulated by a Commission without, in the first place, having obtained the requisite power from Parliament? The right hon. and learned Gentleman told them that full opportunity would be given for the discussion of this matter; that Papers and Estimates would soon be laid on the Table; and that that would afford an opportunity for discussing the whole subject of State-aided emigration from the Highlands. If they were to have Papers and Estimates so soon, why had there been this unseemly and unconstitutional haste in forcing on an experiment which he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman would admit it was perfectly right they should have full opportunity of considering? Why had the Government been in such haste, without any powers, without any authorization from the House, to spend money upon this scheme? His hon. Friend the Member for Sutherland (Mr. A. Sutherland) asked the Lord Advocate to explain by what authority he committed the Government to this expenditure of money, by what authority he had acted in the matter; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman carefully avoided the point. The Lord advocate went into all sorts of extraneous matter; he raised a laugh here and a laugh there; but he carefully avoided what was the real matter of which he (Dr. Cameron) and his hon. Friends complained. The Lord Advocate told them that the Crofters' Commission recommended State-aided emigration, and that the policy of the Government was to carry out the decision of the Crofters' Commission. That was only one of the recommendations of the Crofters' Commission. Why had the Government not shown something like equal alacrity to carry out some of the other recommendations of the Commission, to carry out recommendations which they might have carried out without doing what appeared to him to be an unconstitutional act—namely, forestalling the House in the expenditure of public money? At the commencement of the evening he was much struck with a remark made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler). That right hon. Gentleman referred to the most valuable Constitutional provision under which, he said, no payment could be made out of the Treasury after the 31st of March, except on the authority of the Vote of the House. The right hon. Gentleman.

that in a few minutes they would have to discuss this commitment of the Government to the expenditure of money for a policy which was open to the gravest criticism. He did not blame the Government for trying an experiment of this sort tentatively, and in such a way as to make sure they did not do mischief; but what he did complain of was that while they pretended to give the House a full opportunity, by laying Papers on the Table, and introducing a special Vote, for the discussion of a most important question—namely, the propriety of devoting the funds of the State to the emigration of certain people, they prejudged the whole question by rushing in and carrying out the scheme with a high hand. The right hon. and learned Gentleman told them that of the men who had been emigrated no fewer than six got married on the morning before they left. He (Dr. Cameron) could quite understand that, because, according to the estate regulations, any young man who married without permission was liable to be evicted. No wonder that when men got an opportunity of going abroad they should rush into matrimony. In going into this scheme, the Government had gone in for a scheme which was tried by Sir James Matheson, and failed. Sir James Matheson spent, in connection with this very Island, as large a sum of money as the Government proposed to spend—he spent £12,000 on an emigration scheme, and the result was absolutely nil. Years passed, and it was then said that unless an emigration scheme were adopted the Island would go from bad to worse. As his hon. Friend (Mr. Hunter) had proved, by the quotations he read to the Committee from the Report of the Board of Supervision, events had completely given the lie to that prediction; and yet, in face of that, the right hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to repeat the experiment. He did not blame the Lord Advocate; he did not blame the Government for acting upon their conviction: what he blamed them for was committing the country to the expenditure of public money in a new direction and for a new departure altogether, and for doing so, when there was not the smallest need for haste, in such a manner as absolutely to forestall the House in the matter. He thought the least the right hon. and learned Gentleman could have done, if he wished fairly to carry out the pledge he gave to the House that they should have an opportunity of discussing the question before anything was done—[Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD dissented.] He admitted that they required to construe an answer of the right hon. and learned Gentleman as they would a contentious clause in a Bill; but, certainly, the interpretation he had put upon the pledge of the Lord Advocate was the interpretation which any ordinary-minded man would put upon it. It certainly would have been very much better had the right hon. and learned Gentleman refrained from doing anything until he had given hon. Members an opportunity of discussing the whole question.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he wished to say a few words in answer to the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the College Division of Glasgow (Dr. Cameron). They were asked by what authority they had acted in this matter? They had acted, as all other Governments had acted, in the face of a great emergency. They had taken upon themselves the responsibility of applying public money which, if Parliament did not give them, they must make good. They were in face of a great emergency and difficulty. The hon. Gentleman (Dr. Cameron) said he had no objection whatever to a tentative process, or to an effort to ascertain whether the emigration of crofters from Lewis would tend to the advantage of those unfortunate people, and all he found fault with them for was that they had been in a hurry. The hon. Gentleman thought they had done this before they ought to have done it—that Parliament ought to have had a full opportunity of expressing its opinion upon the whole scheme before anything was done. But what would have been the result of that? The tentative process which the hon. Gentleman desired should be carried out could not be carried out that year. For another year these people who had now gone out must have remained in Lewis, must have remained in a condition of destitution, and with the prospect of starvation before them. The Government would have been just a year behind in the testing of this experiment which, in their conscience, they believed to be necessary, and which they hoped would be entirely successful. They were applying a scheme of emigration tentatively, upon their responsibility, as one of the measures which they hoped might, if extended, afford relief to those distressed people. The hon. Gentleman said they ought to have laid the Papers and the Estimate on the Table before embarking on the scheme. They could not. It was impossible for them to lay Papers on the Table and ask for a Vote of £10,000, which Parliament knew they were about to apply for, in time to have obtained a judgment upon it. They had to carry out negotiations in Canada; they had to obtain an Act in the Canadian Parliament authorizing the course they had taken. Until that Act was obtained they could not proceed. The crofters themselves were only too anxious to go. The difficulty had been to make a selection, and in making a selection their aim and purpose had been to choose those who, as far as human foresight could see, would profit, and be successful in the new country. Whether the Government failed or succeeded, whether they were right or wrong, they had acted in the discharge of what they believed to be their duty to these people. They were prepared to take the consequences, and they believed that Parliament would approve of their action.

Dr. Cameron

DR. CLARK said, he and his hon. Friends would take a Division, because the arguments used on the part of the Government by the Lord Advocate and the First Lord of the Treasury did not meet the case at all. He quite admitted it was competent for the Government to act independently of Parliament; and if some special reason had been urged for their doing so, he and his hon. Friends might not have taken the action they intended. As a matter of fact, no experiment could be tried by the Government during the present year. The emigrants, or transported crofters, would not reach their destination until June, and it would be utterly impossible that they could do anything during the present year, so far as the sowing of crops was concerned. By sending them out now the Government were simply wasting the men's time. The Government were sending these crofters out far too late to be of any use this year, and the experiment they were making would be null and void, in place of being attended with satisfactory results. All the result would be to give some 40 or 50 extra labourers to the farmers in that neighbourhood. The reasons given by the Lord Advocate for the unconstitutional step taken by the Government—for it was unconstitutional for the Government to spend money without the knowledge of Parliament, and to conceal the fact until pressed for information in the House—were wholly insufficient. There was no necessity for the unseemly hurry in which this emigration scheme had been carried out. The proper time to have sent the people out would have been in the Indian summer, or the fall of the year. It was said that the late Royal Commission had recommended that emigration should take place; but the late Royal Commission did not do so. Only a portion of the Royal Commission recommended it. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) did not recommend it—the recommendation only came from the landlord part of the Commission, and even then it was only one of the minor recommendations of the Commission. The important recommendations were two. The first was that the size of the present crofters' holdings should be increased. It was recommended that the Sheriff should have power, when a township declared itself overcrowded, to increase the holdings in that township; but nothing had been done by the Government to carry out that, the principal, recommendation of the Commission. Secondly, they recommended that, in addition to new holdings, new townships should be formed under the conditions laid down in the Crofters' Act; but as he had lately brought before the notice of the House, though clauses were put into the Crofters' Act allowing the Crofter Commission to increase holdings for five years, now over two years of that period had passed, and not a single holding had been increased by the Commission, and during the remaining three years he did not expect that there would be more than 500 holdings increased, because the conditions upon which the enlargement was to be allowed would render the crofts worthless. The Government, he maintained, ought to have amended the Crofters' Act before they tried this emigration scheme, and ought to have allowed the Crofter Commission to have increased existing holdings, and to have created new townships for the accommodation of the great bulk of the population. Under the Crofters' Act, in the arrangements for increasing the holdings, the Government had not touched that other important factor in this matter—namely, the cottars who were one-third of the population in the crofter districts. These cottars, who were evicted crofters or their immediate descendants, had no land, and the only way to benefit them was to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission he had named—namely, to create new townships. But nothing of the kind had been done, and of all those recommendations of the Royal Commission which were made unanimously, the Government had disregarded the only recommendation they were anxious to adopt, having been a recommendation upon which the Commissioners were not at one. He (Dr. Clark) was opposed to the principle of the scheme the Government were carrying out—he was opposed to their policy in this matter in every shape and form. He had lived, he thought, in every one of our self-governing Colonies, and he knew something of our Crown Colonies; and he must say that, so far as comfort in the ordinary conditions of life was concerned, he should infinitely prefer to live in Sydney, Melbourne, or Dunedin, than in London, Dublin, or Edinburgh. Physically, those places in the Colonies were infinitely better than our large towns at home, and it was only sentimental reasons which kept him here. The other countries were superior in a great many ways, and they would be great nations when we probably were played out; but, as a citizen of this Empire, and as a Scotchman, he certainly objected to the principle underlying the Government policy. They were clearing away the agricultural population of these Islands, and for what? In order to create deer forests and sheep farms. What was the economical condition of the country under the present system? Why, it was this—that the land was becoming less and less fruitful, the production from it decreasing year by year. The sheep farms had no labour placed upon them, and were returning to a state of nature, the result being that they did not grow more than half, or, at the outside, two-thirds of what they used to grow. The land formerly occu-pled by crofters, being allowed to remain fallow, was producing less and less every year, and, of course, the general production of the whole country was less and less every year. No one would contend, except, perhaps, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that deer forests were of any use to the people generally, and he said emphatically that if they were going to get rid of their country population they would bring about a national calamity. We relied too much upon the extent of our manufactures. He knew something about the countries that used to be our customers for our manufactured goods, and he said, from his knowledge of them, that they were now supplying themselves with those commodities which they formerly used to obtain from us. What we should have to depend upon ultimately would be the home trade, and if we lessened the possibility of providing for our own wants at home we should be gradually preparing the way for a national calamity—we should be filling our towns more and more with an idle population with less food to feed them on, and would be, in fact, guilty of a national crime. However, those were questions which must be entered upon fully when the Government brought their scheme formally before the House. All that could be done now was to protest against the policy carried out by the Government, and to protest against the manner in which it had been sought to conceal from the House the real facts of the case until hon. Members had, unwillingly, wrung those facts from the Front Bench opposite. Furthermore, Members interested in this subject submitted that the Government were carrying out their experiments at a bad time of the year, when there was no chance of success, instead of deferring the discussion and putting off the adoption of arrangements until a period when there was a likelihood of light being thrown upon the subject, and a probability of the scheme being carried out successfully. He supported the Motion of his hon. Friend, and trusted he would carry it to a Division.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn) said, he wished to say a few words upon this question, and to call the attention of the Government to certain points at this stage, because he had had several communications from members of his constituency who were crofters and fishermen, and who were desirous of ascertaining whether the proposed scheme of emigration would be applied to that part of the country which he represented. He had once or twice asked the Lord Advocate for information on the subject; but, in reply to every Question put to that right hon. and learned Gentleman with regard to the government of Scotland, they got little or no information. He did not altogether think it was the fault of the Lord Advocate, however. It was the fault of the First Lord of the Treasury, who would not have the Secretary for Scotland in the House of Commons. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate merely came to that House as a machine to read from Papers answers to certain Questions. When the Scotch Members pressed him earnestly for further answers, he was, of course, like the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the President of the Local Government Board, or the Chancellor of the Exchequer, so far as Scotland was concerned, and so far as the subjects to which the Questions related were concerned—that was to say, he knew nothing about them. The consequence was that Scotch Members had to drag important statements from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate bit by bit, and often had to put the same Question down on the Paper three or four times, because they could not get a reply. He declared that, so far as the present Vote was concerned, the Secretary for Scotland and the Government were very much to blame for not having someone in that House who was responsible for the affairs of Scotland and knew what was taking place in Scotland, and who was, in fact, the Secretary for Scotland. He thought, if the First Lord of the Treasury would consider this matter—if he ever did consider Scotch affairs—the right hon. Gentleman would see that this debate illustrated emphatically the point he (Mr. Anderson) was making. On this emigration question what information had they got? Hardly any, except that they were told that the policy—the only policy—of the Government with regard to the state of things in Scotland was emigration. Well, he should have thought that, inasmuch as there were other alternative policies, the Government had turned their attention to them. The policy the crofters wanted was not that of sending them to Canada or other far-off places. They wanted to live in their own country; they wanted to have land given to them, and to be allowed to cultivate that land. He wondered whether the Government had seen the Memorial just presented to Lady Matheson, in which it was pointed out to her that two districts which were now deer forests—namely, Lochs and Aline, 30 or 40 years ago were covered by small though flourishing crofter townships. These places were cleared for the purpose of making the Lochs Forest and the Aline Forest. He (Mr. Anderson) wanted to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he did not think the attention of the Government should be turned rather to the expressed wishes of those people, in order to see if they could not bring in some legislation which would bring the crofter population back to the land they originally occupied? To get up here and say that the people wanted to emigrate was all stuff and nonsense. They did nothing of the kind. They looked upon going to foreign countries as absolute banishment. Think of what emigration meant to a man well advanced in life! Emigration might very well be a good thing to a young unmarried man of 18, or from 18 to 25; but if they took a man past 30 years of age—say a man of 40—with a family, and transplanting him from his own country, sent him over to Canada, without friends, ignorant of the habits of the people and having to learn everything there, it was no wonder that they found numbers and numbers of instances in which the people returned to their own country, having, as emigrants, proved utter failures. He would send to the First Lord of the Treasury—if in the midst of his multifarious duties he could devote a little time to the perusal of such a document—an account which appeared in one of the local newspapers of the counties he (Mr. Anderson) represented. This account, which he had received that morning, gave particulars of the condition in which some of these emigrants found themselves abroad. The account was given by two fishermen who had heard from emigration agencies brilliant statements as to the profits which were to be made by fishermen, and, being hard pressed to live at home, they had been led away by the rosy descriptions they had heard and had emigrated. But what did they find in the country to which they had emigrated? Why, they had had to go from place to place, and had everywhere found the trade crowded by competition; but, worse than that, they found wages far lower and living very much inferior, and houses far worse and the fishery much more difficult, than at home. And yet it was said that these men were to go out to British Columbia and fish and secure great prosperity. He did not think it was possible to read an instance of more absolute failure than that of the two men he referred to, and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury would not object to his sending him the account in question. If the right hon. Gentleman, as he had said, could in the midst of his other numerous duties find time to read it, it would, no doubt, produce a very strong effect upon his mind, as it would open up to him a new phase of this question which he had not been in the habit of considering. The Government were remarkable in this matter for a want of policy. They had not considered the interests and the capabilities and the character of the persons who were to be benefited, and they rushed blindly into this scheme of emigration. To think, as the First Lord of the Treasury had said, that at this great crisis an expenditure of some £10,000 would be sufficient for the relief of the distressed crofters, and to think that by that means they would be putting a stop to agitation and really conferring a benefit upon the population, was the most absurd proposition ever made from the Treasury Bench. But there was another point upon which he wished to say a word; and it was this—Where were the Government going to take these people from? Were they going to take them simply from Lady Matheson's estate? Were they going merely to give her an opportunity of getting rid of her crofters by sending them off, that she might be relieved of the trouble they gave her? How did the Government mean to select the emigrants? He rather thought—in fact, he had heard it stated—that the emigrants were selected in this way—there was a sort of anxious desire that the leading crofters, those people who were agitating to get their land back, should be got out of the way, and that those were the people who were preferred in the patronage of the Government. It was said that the Government were anxious to transplant from their native country those people who gave most trouble; and certainly, unless some preference was exhibited, he was at a loss to understand how the selection was being made. There must be some influence of that kind at work. At any rate, he would ask the Government this question, which he thought was a fair one. Why were the fishermen living on the Eastern Coast of Scotland left out? Let the Government think of the jealousy they were creating with these people. There was amongst the fishermen of the Moray Firth a great deal of distress, and perhaps the men there were anxious to try the experiment of emigration. Probably, after reading the account of their want of success given by the two fishermen to whom he had referred, these people would not be so anxious for emigration as they had been hitherto; but, be that as it might, the people on whose behalf he was speaking were anxious, whilst there was money being spent in this way, that they should derive some advantage from it as well as other people. He did not wish to increase the difficulties of the Government. All he desired to say was that he viewed with great disfavour any scheme which would ignore the counties he represented; and if the scheme did not include these people he certainly should move its rejection. If the scheme was one merely for the purpose of spending money on one particular county or estate, he looked upon it as very objectionable; and, therefore, he trusted that, before the scheme was wholly carried out, the Government would consider the suggestion he was making. Perhaps the remarks he had addressed to the Government would come to the notice of the Secretary for Scotland. They would not be reported to him by the Lord Advocate, because that right hon. and learned Gentleman had not been there to listen to them; but he (Mr. Anderson) trusted, at all events, that through one of the many different channels which had to be traversed in order to get at the Secretary for Scotland, and to bring any influence to bear upon him, there would be brought to his notice the view taken by some Scotch Members upon this subject, and that the scheme would not, after all, be an exclusive one, but would extend to other counties. He knew the difficulties which surrounded the subject—he knew the difficulties the Government had to face in dealing with the Crofter Question; but the Government seemed to be impressed with the idea that there were no crofters in any of the counties, except four or five. They seemed to have the most supreme ignorance as to what the crofters were, and where they were to be found. He trusted they would consider the few remarks he had made, and certainly hoped that his hon. Friend who had moved the Amendment would carry it to a Division, as he did not think the House had been fairly treated in this matter. He thought that on this, as on other questions as to the management of their affairs, Members representing Scotch constituencies were not fairly dealt with by the Government, mainly for the reason, as he had pointed out, that they had nobody to represent Scotch affairs in the Government in that House.

Dr. Clark

Mr. Anderson

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 37; Noes 88: Majority 51. —(Div. List, No. 114.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, he wished to call attention to a subject of local interest in connection with the item in the Vote for County Courts. There had been no satisfactory explanation given with reference to the complaint which had been made of the action of the County Court Judge at Stowmarket in Suffolk. There had been a good deal of friction between the County Court Judge and the suitors who came before him in the ordinary course of business. Questions which had been asked of the Government had had reference to special points; but the broad question which appeared to underlie all these special points was this—that the County Court Judge in question had been acting in a very harsh manner, and not to one person only, but to a great number of persons who had come before him. In that House the Government had referred hon. Members to the Lord Chancellor, and had put hon. Members off with answers which were not satisfactory—he would not call them evasive answers, because he did not suppose they were anxious to burke the question. No doubt, it was a difficult and even a delicate question; but he contended that in a matter like that, where constant complaints were arising from different Members of the House who were asked to take up the matter and press it upon the attention of the Government, where they had evidence of a state of things which could not be allowed to continue, it was no answer to the poor people whose claims for redress in a Court of Justice had been set aside and injured by the conduct of a particular individual—it was no satisfaction to them to be told—

THE CHAIRMAN: I understand the hon. Member is raising a question as to the conduct of a County Court Judge.

MR. CONYBEARE. Certainly, Sir.

THE CHAIRMAN: The salaries of County Court Judges are paid out of the Consolidated Fund, and are not included in this Vote.

MR. CONYBEARE: What, Sir, is this Vote for County Courts for?

THE CHAIRMAN: The salaries of the Judges of the County Courts and the salaries of the Judges in the higher Courts are included in the Consolidated Fund.

MR. CONYBEARE: Then do I understand, Sir, that it is impossible to discuss a question connected with the County Courts upon the Estimates?

THE CHAIRMAN: It is impossible to discuss a question as to the conduct of a County Court Judge upon this Vote.

MR. CONYBEARE: Then I beg to give Notice that I shall take the opportunity of bringing this subject forward on the Motion for Adjournment.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said, in the course of some introductory remarks made on this Vote on Account, the hon. Member for the Eastern Division of Donegal laid particular stress on Vote 37. Dealing with it in a very few words, the hon. Member had practically shown that a great deal of money had been wasted over the Vote in past years. Anyone who would take up the Auditor General's Report on this Vote would see from those figures that the estimated receipts last year were £78,500, and the actual receipts £74,011 3s. 3d.; therefore the Estimates exceeded the receipts by £4,448 16s. 9d. But that was not all. He did not propose to deal with the matter in extenso, but he wished to draw the attention of the Secretary to the Treasury to it, and he knew that that Gentleman in that House was always most anxious to clear up any point—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that we have passed the item upon which he is speaking.

DR. TANNER: I was not aware, Sir, that these Votes were being taken seriatim.

THE CHAIRMAN: There was a Division on an item subsequent to that to which the hon. Member is referring.

DR. TANNER: I presume, Sir, I should be in Order in taking up any Irish Vote on page 3, the Lord Lieutenant's Household for instance. There has been no Division on those Votes. I would ask your ruling, Sir, upon another point, and that is this—supposing a Division is taken upon any one of these Votes, and that then any one of us discusses a Vote lower down on the list, would it be in Order for an hon. Member who might not happen to have been present, and who might have something to say on a succeeding Vote to that made the subject, would he be able to speak?

THE CHAIRMAN: It is quite unnecessary to deal with a hypothetical case. The case in point has already been practically decided.

DR. CLARK said, he wished to say a word with regard to the payment of Fiscals. A Royal Commission had recommended that in future Procurators Fiscal, when appointed, should be limited to Crown work—that was to say, should be the servants of the Crown, and should not represent landlords as well. Since then, however, an important appointment had been made, and this recommendation had been overlooked, notwithstanding that all the lawyers in Scotland had been opposed to it. He thought it desirable that they should know how they stood in this matter, as there had been a pledge given by the late Lord Advocate. The Scotch Members understood, and it was agreed that in future Fiscals should be appointed for Crown work only, and that they should not be allowed to do private work, for the reason that if they were allowed to do private work as well as Crown work, the private work was affected by that Crown work. He (Dr. Clark) desired to know why, notwithstanding the pledges which had been given, the recommendations made by the Royal Commission had not been carried out? He did not wish to take up the time of the House by moving the reduction of the Lord Advocate's salary; but he wished to know the reason why the Treasury stood in the way of carrying out the system recommended by the Royal Commission?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) said, he was afraid he had no facts upon which to answer the specific question put by the hon. Member. The hon. Gentleman knew that in some districts the Procurator Fiscal had to give his whole time to the Crown, and take no other work. In other districts, however, a much higher rate of pay would have to be given to get the requisite ability than that which the amount of work would really require or demand, if the Procurator Fiscal were required to do no other work. He was sorry the Lord Advocate was not present, but he would communicate with him and ascertain what had taken place.

DR. CLARK said, he should like to ask the Government if they could give him any information as to the reason why the Crofter Commission had not been allowed to appoint Assistant Commissioners, in order that they might dispose of their work more quickly than they were doing? Three or four times this subject had been brought before the notice of the Treasury, and Scotch Members had understood that at last something was to be done to appoint Assistant Commissioners in order that the Commission might get through a portion of the work which was very urgent. Lewis had been spoken of a good deal in connection with the Crofter Question, but during the two years that the Commission had been at work they had not yet got there, and goodness knew when they would get there, because he understood they were going to Orkney and Shetland first. That was very hard on those poor crofters who applied to the Commission nearly two years ago for relief, and had not yet had their cases attended to. Unless the Government did something to have Assistant Commissioners appointed, the three men who were now at work on the business of the Commission would not possibly be able to hear all the cases. They had dealt with but few of the holdings, and the time they had occupied in deciding these cases was worth more than the value of the crofts. The Commissioners examined the land, and the work they did was so little compared with the necessities of the case, and with the work they might do, that he did not think it was worth while for Parliament to carry on the Commission at all in its present inadequate shape. Surely an appeal ought to be heard within 12 months of the time of its being lodged? Men, feeling that they were rack-rented, and seeing on estates in other parts of the country reductions made ranging from 25 to 75 per cent, were naturally unwilling to pay their rents, and in this way things were getting into a very bad state. The Government would have serious trouble to face unless they made provisions to have the crofter cases heard, and also to have appeals decided. He thought that the present attitude of the Government was a penny wise and pound foolish one, as it led to great expense being piled up. He trusted they would make good what the Act permitted. Clauses were passed in the Act to allow Assistant Commissioners, Valuers, and officers of that kind to be appointed; and surely it was the original intention of the Government to appoint men to do the work, and not to have the muddle and deadlock which existed at present. The Commissioners had been unable for years to do the work. As he had pointed out, in an island like that of Lewis, they had been unable to do it. The only way in which it was possible to get the Commission to go anywhere to hear cases within a reasonable time was to kick up a row, and to do illegal acts. That, however, was teaching the peasantry a very bad lesson. He thought that the Government should give the Act a fair chance, so far as they could, and should not prevent its being carried out merely because the Secretary to the Treasury was afraid of spending a pound or two. The Government seemed to forget that for every pound they spent for legal purposes in Scotland in England they were spending £2 10s. 0d., and in Ireland £5. He protested that in this matter they were treating Scotland in a mean and niggardly fashion.

DR. TANNER said, that, in the Vote on Account, there was included an item to which he took considerable objection; in fact, if the Members of the Party to which he had the honour to belong took the matter up seriously, it would require a whole Sitting to deal with it, or, perhaps, twoittings of the House. The item to which he referred was one for Law Charges and Criminal Prosecutions in Ireland. Now, it was within the recollection of the House that since the Criminal Law and Procedure Act, which was popularly known as the Coercion Act, was passed, a number of cases had been tried under its provisions, and again and again illegal actions had been committed by the magistrates who had tried those cases. He felt sure that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen—no matter how much they might differ from hon. Members who sat below the Gangway on that (the Opposition) side of the House—if they only thoroughly appreciated the facts, would understand that it was necessary that the Irish Members should be privileged to discuss these questions when money was asked under such a Vote, seeing that that money was not only to pay the magistrates who tried the cases, but the prosecuting counsel who appeared before the magistrates. Practically speaking, from the magistrates who sat on the Bench to the counsel who prosecuted, and the policemen who arrested a person, all these officials were paid by the Crown, and they were all part and parcel of the same method of carrying out, as far as possible, the political modus vivendi of the right hon. Gentleman who conducted, or rather misconducted, the business of Ireland. He should like to bring before the notice of the Committee two or three cases which had come under his own observation. What he was about to describe he had seen himself, and they said that—"Seeing was believing." The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, however, when he (Dr. Tanner) told him what he had seen in connection with one of the cases, had stated that his (the right hon. Gentleman's) information—which was inconsistent with what he (Dr. Tanner) had seen—was received from a reliable source; and what the right hon. Gentleman's insinuation there was he (Dr. Tanner) would leave to the judgment of the House. He would now allude to the case of one of his constituents—the case of a man named Crendon. This man, on Sunday the 8th April last, went into the town of Macroom. Well, it was within the knowledge of most men who paid any attention to Irish affairs that Ireland had been relegated, or was supposed to have been relegated, to a subordinate position by Her Majesty's Ministers, although, as a matter of fact, she still occupied that position to which she was entitled, aye, and which she would ever maintain. The Government might do their utmost against her, but she would come to the fore again and again. The more they tried to put her down, the stronger she would stand in front of them, and the more certain she would be to procure the downfall of the enemies to patriotic and single-minded and undivided action. But he was about to refer to the case of the young man Crendon. On that very day, Sunday the 8th of April, several meetings were to be held in different parts of Ireland by the Irish Nationalist Party. It had been determined to hold these meetings in consequence of a boast of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. For his own part, he did not find any fault with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for making this boast. The poor unfortunate right hon. Gentleman really did not know very often what he did. He had never visited the Province of Munster; he had never visited the Province of Connaught, and he had never gone into Ulster. In that very House he (Dr. Tanner) had said that, if the right hon. Gentleman would allow him, he should only be too glad to bring to his personal notice a great number of cases which might, perhaps, occasion his turning over a new leaf and being a better boy for the future. The right hon. Gentleman had stated in that House that the National League was dead. He (Dr. Tanner) happened to be the Representative of a portion of Cork in which the National League was "suppressed," consequently the right hon. Gentleman's boast referred to a portion of his (Dr. Tanner's) constituency. Well, the members of the suppressed branches of the National League determined that they would show the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant that he was utterly mistaken in his premises, and that in the speech he had delivered he had made a false statement to the country. Of course, it was immaterial for him (Dr. Tanner) whether or not the right hon. Gentleman had simply made his statement for the purpose of catching votes in this country, and to show what a great man the right hon. Gentleman was; suffice it to say that it was determined to hold meetings of the National League all over the country, and it subsequently transpired that several meetings were held in Macroom. On the Saturday before the meeting to which he was about to refer, he happened to meet in the City of Cork an old gentleman, a quiet old gentleman, a really good old man to play a game of whist with, but a person utterly unfitted to act as a magistrate, the duties of such a post being altogether past his time of life. This old gentleman told him that the meeting in Macroom was to be suppressed, whereupon he rejoined—"Who is going to suppress it?" and, turning round with a gallant air, this Captain Redmond—for this gentleman, as his name would indicate, had held a position in Her Majesty's Reserve Forces—of course, most of those gentlemen who belonged to the Magisterial Bench were attached to Her Majesty's Reserve Forces and had never been in action—Captain Redmond's manly breast heaved, and he said—"I am going to suppress it!" Now, really, there ought to be some common sense displayed in the matter of the suppression of these meetings. When an elderly gentleman of that kind took upon himself to suppress an entire district, and refused to give anyone any information as to the matter, he protested that the policy which permitted such a thing was absurd, and that the state of affairs was such that it could not be expected to meet with the sanction of the people of the country they now occupied. He asked Captain Redmond for further information, but he refused to give it. He (Dr. Tanner) had gone down to Macroom next day, as it was his duty to do. He had not been served with a copy of the writ stating that the meeting was to be suppressed, and he held the meeting in the morning—a meeting which was attended by some 500 men on horseback. At that meeting they discussed the matters most worthy of their consideration, and they congratulated one another on the fact that notwithstanding the edict of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who knew nothing whatever about the district, not only was the League doing well there, but, as a matter of fact, the numbers of the National League in the town of Macroom had increased once and a-half what they were before the publication of the edict. They also congratulated themselves upon the fact that in other places similar advances had been made by the League. So great had been the success from a National point of view which attended the suppression of the League, that it was a question whether it was not advisable, in order to make the organization more successful in those places where it had taken less hold amongst the people, to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, as a special and peculiar favour, to suppress the organization in the remaining parts of the county he had the honour to represent. Well, the morning meeting was held, and at 2 o'clock they proceeded to hold another meeting. At that time a troop of Cavalry had ridden into the Square, and there were over 100 Constabulary there. They were led by Captain Redmond, who walked up and down the Square, looking very uncomfortable, and by two or three District Inspectors of Police, trying to make the best of their time smoking cigarettes. He (Dr. Tanner) then thought it was desirable to make a protest in the name of the constituency and in the name of law and order, as supported by the people, as against this illegal demonstration on the part of the Crown. Accordingly, in order that the people might not suffer, he himself undertook to go forward. He tried to get the people to step back and remain quiet whilst the protest was being made, because he knew, from circumstances which had preceded this occasion, that the police had received orders "to baton, but not to arrest." The Crown did not take the responsibility of arresting him on that occasion; but they did what they would not have dared to do in England, Scotland, or Wales—that was to say, they tried to break his head. [Laughter.] Hon. Members opposite might laugh; but he could assure hon. Members from the North of Ireland and also English Members that if they could have witnessed the conduct of the police officials and the official supporters of law and order on the occasion in question they would not have been disposed to laugh, and would have been very much ashamed of supporting a Government which endeavoured to carry out its mandates by such brutal illegality. What happened on the occasion to which he was referring? He went into the Square, being perfectly content to do so, so far as he was personally concerned. He had, as he had said, told the people to be quiet and not to follow him; for if they did they would get into trouble. He had said—"Stop there, and let me go on." He got to the centre of the Square, and there he was collared. [Laughter.] He doubted whether hon. Gentlemen would laugh if they knew what took place. The District Inspectors in days gone by used to be considered gentlemen; but in recent years they had sadly degenerated, and that description could no longer with justice be applied to them. Well, while he was in the hands of three policemen and firmly pinioned, a District Inspector came up, and deliberately struck him in the face. The District Inspector would not have done it if his (Dr. Tanner's) arms had been free. Was, therefore, the act of this person gentlemanly or cowardly? He did not think hon. Gentlemen opposite would endorse such action; but he could assure them that it was quite a common occurrence in Ireland under the existing state of things in that country. He merely alluded to this incident because it was a personal matter, and he had no grudge against the unfortunate man who had been guilty of this piece of brutality. He treated him and the rest of his class as beneath contempt, and merely alluded to the subject en passant. The policemen who collared him took him off the Square; but he would do some of them the justice to say that in the evening they came to him and apologized, stating that although they were obliged to carry out the mandate of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, practically speaking, their hearts, their inclinations, and their minds were altogether against such dirty work. This young man, when he saw him dragged from the Square, made an exclamation, and the policeman struck him.

MR. MAC INNES (Northumberland, Hexham) rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 103; Noes 13: Majority 90. — (Div. List, No. 115.)

Original Question put accordingly, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported upon Thursday 31st May.

Committee to sit again upon Thursday 31st May.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO WORKMEN BILL.—[BILL 145.]

(Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Forwood.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.), in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the Bill was a consolidating as well as an amending one. In the interests of the working classes it was desirable the law on this subject should be put into one Statute. He would not now debate questions of large principle which he regarded as settled. It seemed to him impossible, as some Members wished, to sweep away the doctrine of common employment which had grown up in English laws. It was fair to call on an employer to provide plant and machinery in good condition; but that he should be rendered liable for the casual negligence or wilful misconduct of a servant was a doctrine which could not be upheld. It was not proposed in the Bill to do away with the doctrine of common employment; but they did propose to correct what they might deem had been the undue extension of that doctrine in the Courts of Law. All lawyers, he thought, would agree that when an employer delegated his control and authority over his workmen to a manager, who was an alter ego of himself, and who superintended in his name, the manager could not, and ought not, to be treated as a fellow-servant with those over whom he ruled. If he were so treated a premium would be placed upon such delegation of authority. It was right, therefore, in his opinion, to exclude all such cases from this doctrine of common employment. There was another matter dealt with in the Bill of some novelty to which he must refer. There largely prevailed, especially in the building trades, a practice of the contractor giving out different parts of the work to sub-contractors. Those sub-contractors were frequently men of straw, whose responsibility and liability to workmen were extremely inadequate, and yet the principal employer escaped liability because there was no privity between him and the men employed by the sub-contractors, although the plant or materials supplied by him proved to be deficient, and consequently led to accidents. That seemed to be a hardship; and it was attempted to be remedied in the 2nd clause of the Bill. While the liability of the sub-contractor was kept alive, the principal contractor, for whom the work was really being done, was made also liable for accidents which happened owing to the patent defect in the plant used. The next point he desired to refer to was that with regard to the burning question whether workmen should be allowed to contract themselves out of the Act. There were three possible courses that might be adopted. In the first place, absolute liberty might be given to the workmen. The second alternative was absolutely to prohibit contracting out of the Act; and the third was to prohibit the sub modo—that was to say, unless something as good as, or better than, the provisions of the measure existed in the contract of employment. The first course was one that naturally commended itself to some men of masculine mind, who thought it unwise to treat the working men of this country, who were its mainstay, like women and children, lunatics and sailors—these were all classes which the law, sometimes wisely, sometimes somewhat oddly, treated as incompetent to protect themselves. But among the friends of the working men who best knew their wishes there was a strong feeling that working men were often subjected to such pressure and coercion and influence on the part of their employers that the men were not really free agents. Absolute prohibition was condemned by the Committee which sat about the year 1876, before the Act of 1880 was passed; but the Committee which sat last year was about equally divided on the subject; so that the opinions in favour of prohibition had made progress. By the casting vote of the Chairman, the Report in favour of prohibition sub modo was adopted, which had been followed in the drafting of this Bill. The result of absolute prohibition would be that since the masters could not be prevented from insuring, the injured workmen would on all occasions have to meet, as antagonists, Insurance Companies, whose whole energies would be devoted to fighting every claim for compensation; there would thus be a great increase of litigation, and great hardship in many deserving cases. Moreover, absolute prohibition would put an end to a number of arrangements existing at this moment, and which were, in his judgment, much more beneficial to the men than any chance of compensation they could obtain under an Act of Parliament. Two, at least, of the great Railway Companies—namely, the London and North-Western and the London, Brighton, and South Coast, had established between themselves and their men arrangements for mutual assurance, which seemed to him to be of the most beneficial and salutary kind. Of the 53,000 employés of the first-named Company only 25 had refused to enter into this arrangement, and of the 9,000 or 10,000 workmen employed by the London, Brighton, and South Coast Company all except two had entered into a similar arrangement. Of the men employed in the collieries it was given in evidence before the Committee that 83,000 men in England had entered into such arrangement, while in North Wales 10,500 had done so. Contemporaneously with that the number of accidents had greatly diminished, especially in the latter case, so that that fact showed that the arrangement had not tended to carelessness, or want of security for the workmen themselves. This system appeared to be one of great advantage to the men, and it was, therefore, the purpose of the Bill to encourage such arrangements. The scheme they contemplated in the 3rd section of the Bill allowed the employer and the workmen, if they agreed, to contract themselves out of the Act, provided always that an adequate consideration was given by the employer for such contract. That adequate consideration was defined by the Bill to be this—some system of insurance against accidents of all kinds, and that covered not only the limited class for which the employer was liable under the present Bill, but accidents of all kinds such as were inevitable, or even the result of the injured man's own negligence. The field that was covered by the sort of insurance which they allowed as an alternative to liability under the Bill was a very much wider field than was covered by the Bill itself. The Bill required that the employer should make a contribution to the insurance fund in accordance with the average proportion of accidents for which a master was liable under the circumstances of that particular trade to the total number of accidents of all kinds that occurred. Thus, if in a particular trade it was calculated that a master was, on an average, liable for a third of the accidents that occurred he would have to contribute one-third to the insurance fund. It was also provided that the employer should become a guarantor of the solvency of the insurance fund. One rock upon which schemes of assurance were extremely likely to split was that the actuarial calculations might not be accurately made, and the fund contributions might not be adequate to meet the demands made upon them. It was, therefore, necessary to throw upon the employer the duty of guaranteeing the soundness of the scheme. This at first sight might seem a little hard, but workmen could not be expected to judge whether the scheme was a sound one, and therefore the responsibility must be thrown on employers. It seemed to the Government extremely desirable, if possible, to avoid litigation, which could benefit nobody but the hedge attorney, who was the chief person interested in legal proceedings of the kind. It was, therefore, important to ascertain beforehand that agreements entered into between employers and workmen were fair. The Bill provided that one of the Departments of the Government should examine and certify that any contract made, or proposed to be made, between employer and workman was a contract under which the latter obtained adequate consideration for renouncing the advantages he would have under the Act. The Board of Trade would certify as to all schemes, except those in regard to coal mines and factories, which would come under the control of the Home Office. Practically those clauses were an endeavour to carry out the recommendations of the last Committee on this subject. He might here state that since 1881, when the Employers' Liability Act passed, the total number of cases set down for hearing under it amounted to 1,800; of these, there was a verdict for the plaintiff only in 419 cases, while there were settled between the parties 265 cases, in which he assumed the plaintiff got some benefit at least, making a total of 684 cases of successful litigation out of 1,800, or only 38 per cent. Thus, in 62 per cent of the cases set down for hearing, the workman failed in the object and purpose of his litigation, and the unhappy employer was subjected to the burden of paying his own costs and probably the costs on the other side. The hope of the Government was that these clauses would lead to some system of general insurance, and that the several trades in various parts of the country might federate with that object. With regard to the plans of general compulsory insurance, such as was embodied in legislation in Germany in 1884 and in Austria in 1887, their experience was too recent and too slight to enable them to come to anything like a sound judgment; and, besides, the details of those Continental measures would, in his opinion, be absolutely intolerable in a country of freedom like this, involving, as they did, a very serious amount of interference with trade, which was necessary and inevitable under the systems. He believed that by the machinery of this clause it would be to the mutual interest of employers and employed to institute a general scheme of insurance, and that it would do more to smooth the asperities of the labour question than almost any other system that could be introduced. He believed, too, there were sufficient data for calculating risks and rates of premium, so as to make a scheme solvent and safe. The example of the London and North-Western Company showed that in a great undertaking like that there were the materials for completing a scheme safely and successfully within the limits of the undertaking itself; and his view was that by grouping collieries by districts, and the textile industries and the building trades in various parts, and getting them to combine, schemes of mutual insurance might be carried out in a solvent and practicable manner for the benefit of the workman. A novel feature in the Bill was the extension of its benefits to seamen. The recommendations of the Committee on this subject, in his opinion, were wise and went far enough. Nobody could deny the difference between the employer of labour at sea and the employer on land, for the simple reason that the former when once his ship was at sea lost all control over his delegates and agents; and, therefore, to make him responsible for their negligence or error of judgment when the ship had left harbour and was on the high seas would be an unjust extension of the principle of employers' liability. Moreover, shipowners were already under a special code of regulations, and were not free to employ whom they liked as engineers, seamen, captains, and mates. Accordingly, this Bill did not go further than the Select Committee's Report, and made the shipowner only liable for accidents occurring to his employés while the vessel was in a British port, where his position resembled that of employers on land. When once the ship had left the port his responsibility was limited to this—that she must be properly equipped with everything necessary for the protection and safety of the men before she starts. Here, again, with the object of preventing litigation, the Government had introduced a subsection which had been the subject of some criticism, enabling the Board of Trade to say in advance what things a ship of any particular class ought to have in order to its proper equipment in relation to the safety of the seamen, and it was suggested that these regulations should be annexed to the agreement of the sailor, so that he should have notice of what the ship ought to contain in order to satisfy the law. Another change introduced was the clause consolidating the Common Law action with the statutory action, so obviating a frequent cause of annoyance and suffering under the present law, and, at the same time, it was proposed to extend the jurisdiction of the County Courts in order to enable them to deal with Common Law claims as well as the statutory amount which exceeded the present jurisdiction of the County Courts. There were many other points to which he should like to advert, but he refrained from doing so with the view of giving as much time as possible for discussion. He begged to move that the Bill be read a second time.

Dr. Tanner

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Secretary Matthews).

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.) said, that before he commenced his remarks on the Bill, he must again take the opportunity of protesting against being "cornered" in this matter—against being so compressed and cabined in a debate on so important a Bill. He feared he could not interpret the situation in the same way as the right hon. Gentleman opposite had interpreted it. After taking a very active part officially on behalf of the trades of the country for 20 years, it was very difficult for him to compress his remarks into so short a period as was now allowed. However, he would contribute his share towards, if possible, closing the debate before 12 o'clock, if his hon. Friends would acquiesce in such an agreement. [An hon. MEMBER: Certainly not.] At any rate, he would contribute his share in that direction. There were three particular points in connection with the question of employers' liability, raised in the present Bill, upon which he wished to speak, and they were the question of common employment, the question of insurance out of the Act, and the further question of limitation of compensation. Now, with regard to the question of common employment, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had argued it at very considerable length, and he had quoted the conclusions arrived at by the Committee of 1876-7 so far as their Report was concerned, though the right hon. Gentleman had not given them any quotation from the evidence of the most important witness examined by that Committee. Now, with regard to the question of common employment, there was only one basis upon which the question could ever be satisfactorily settled, and that was on the basis of the abolition of common employment.

Common employment was nothing but a subterfuge for shielding employers from their natural liability. Employers were liable to all others persons except to the men engaged in their employment, for injury caused by any person engaged in their employment, and if that were so, upon what basis of logic, upon what sense of justice could an employer be excused from being equally liable to compensate a person in his employ for injuries received whilst engaged on his work, no matter by whom the injury might be done? He appealed to the Home Secretary to listen to him for a moment. He was not going to argue this subject at length here, but he should have a great deal to say on the matter when the Bill got into Committee, and his speech to-night would not deprive him of a full opportunity of discussing the question at a later stage. Let him give one instance, and that was as good as a hundred instances that were occurring every day in the building and some other trades. The case was this. On the extension of the Charing Cross Railway Bridge now in process of construction, two or three months ago, a mason was at work. He was injured through the falling of some bags of sand, receiving a great weight from a great height on to his right shoulder, which so injured his arm and his wrist that he would be for ever prevented from earning his living at his trade. Now that was a most serious accident to happen to any man who had nothing but his health and strength and bodily skill to depend on for the maintenance of himself and his family. Well, this accident occurred through the man in charge of the bags of sand, whose business it was to lower them from a high platform to a lower platform, improperly slinging the bags, as the pin was not hammered tight on the top of the bags, and so, when they were slung off the platform, they toppled and fell on the man. The man was a ruined man, although only 30 years of age. He and his family (for he had a family) were a charge on the ratepayers or on the benevolence of his friends, and yet the Government said that because that accident occurred through the incapacity or negligence, or whatever they liked to term it, of a man in common employment, there was to be no claim for compensation. A more monstrous piece of injustice to a workman could scarcely be conceived. This man had no more control or influence over or knowledge of the man who slung the bags of sand improperly than if he had been a workman in any other part of England or in some other part of the world. He could not see and could have no means of protecting himself against the want of skill or care on the part of the man above him. Now he (Mr. Broadhurst) asked the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary whether he thought that the law should remain in the condition whereby these accidents could occur constantly, and a workman and his family have no recompense whatever against the employer? He (Mr. Broadhurst) should, at a later stage, move such Amendments as would relieve the Bill of that anomaly, of that great injustice, and also relieve the Bill from much of its confused language. He did not say this was the fault of the draughtsman, but the confused language seemed to him to be introduced in order not to do an injustice to the workman, and at the same time to protect the employer from such liability as he would have to incur in the case of any other person except a workman in his employment. That was a subject they would have to hear a great deal of in Committee, and notwithstanding the Report of the inquiry which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had quoted with very considerable satisfaction, and with his eyes towards the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), whom he (Mr. Broadhurst) understood was likely to give the right hon. Gentleman valuable assistance on this matter. ["No, no!"] Oh, the hon. Member did not propose to give assistance on this point, and he (Mr. Broadhurst) begged the hon. Member's pardon. It was upon another subject, but that other subject was not altogether unconnected with the point he was now referring to. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Matthews) had been smiling, and he (Mr. Broadhurst) thought his reply to him would be this, that in the case of the man injured at the Bridge under this Bill, he would be provided for and protected by the system of insurance proposed. To that system the labour party entirely, objected from beginning to end, and it was upon that point he believed that the right hon. Gentleman was relying upon the hon. Member for Northampton for considerable steam power in pulling the Government through this very difficult task. With regard to this point, especially if the House would permit him, he should like to read something very shortly, only one or two words from the Report of the Select Committee of 1876-7. Although he was not a Member of the House at the time that Report was presented, it was at the instance of the body of which he (Mr. Broadhurst) was then, and still continued to be, the Secretary, that that Select Committee was appointed. He had attended every one of the sittings of the Committee from the beginning to the end, and had taken some part in arranging for the witnesses, and so on. Well, the most distinguished witness that was examined by that Committee was Mr. Justice Brett, and he thought the whole House would agree that a more brilliant Judge and a more fair-minded man and a more certain man on points of law was scarcely known in the judicial system. He (Mr. Broadhurst) personally did not regard Mr. Justice Brett with any great degree of affection or personal regard, for Mr. Justice Brett had felt it to be his duty to inflict upon a man whom he knew a most cruel sentence in connection with the strike in the Metropolis. Well, Mr. Justice Brett's whole evidence from beginning to end was centred in the question of common employment, and his Lordship argued the matter with every witness. A Member of the Committee at that time was Mr. Ripley, then representing Bradford in this House—a large employer and a man of large experience, but one who could not agree with this proposal. Mr. Ripley asked this question, whether he, Mr. Justice Brett, considered that it would be better that a master should not be liable for injury done to a servant in his employ. The learned Judge, in reply, said he disagreed with the Common Law on compensation. He did not think an employer should be liable for the act of his servant; but, he said, so long as he was liable in any one case, there was no reason or justice why he should not be liable in the case of accidents through the negligence of one servant causing injury to another servant. The learned Judge said—

Mr. Broadhurst

"Will you forgive me for stating that I must say again if you alter the old law with regard to everybody, then you should say that nobody ought to be liable for anything but his own negligence or want of care or skill, but so long as you maintain the general law, I think that general law ought to be applicable in regard to the liability of a master for injury to a servant."

Evidence of that kind, replies of that nature, were to be found in every column of the eight or 10 pages of the evidence given by that very great and distinguished man. It would be difficult for the opponents of this proposal to abolish common employment to produce any two, or indeed any half-dozen, witnesses who could possibly have greater weight on this subject than the one witness which he (Mr. Broadhurst) had quoted from this Parliamentary document. And now, with regard to the question of insurance. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary boasted—and very properly boasted—that the thing was very good so far as it went—that it had prevented contracting out of the Act. He (Mr. Broadhurst) understood that to be the correct interpretation of the Bill. But, at the same time that the right hon. Gentleman had made contracting out of the Act illegal, he had made insuring out of the Act much more easy, and it was insuring out of the Act which the labour party objected to, as much as they objected to the retention of this doctrine of common employment. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to a great Corporation called the London and North-Western Railway Company. Well, the London and North-Western Railway Company was a Corporation as paramount of the Civil Service of the State. Surely, the right hon. Gentleman was not going to compare that great body, that great Railway Company, at all with the conditions surrounding ordinary and every-day employment. It was no argument to apply the results of the experience of that Company to the whole labour of the United Kingdom. It did not apply in the building trade. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary said he hoped to be able to group mines and the building trade. [Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): And factories.] Yes, and factories; but he would tell the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the building trade that it was absolutely and utterly impossible to do anything of the kind. There was no continuity of employment in the building trade. A man was employed on Monday, and discharged on Wednesday, if there was no further use for him on the job on which he was employed. How were they to arrange for insurance in such a case, and he gave that as a mere illustration. It was very seldom that a man worked for any considerable number of years in one employment in any one of the industries connected with the building trade, and it would be impossible to arrange insurance under such conditions. That system of insurance struck at the very root of their reasons for this legislation. Their reason for this legislation was not the amount of money they obtained as compensation; they never put it forward on that condition, upon that basis. The first speech he (Mr. Broadhurst) had the honour to make in that House he made from the Benches opposite on the Bill of 1880, and he then declared that they did not want to get money if they possibly could avoid it, and that their desire was to ensure a motive being given to employers to take every possible security for the lives and limbs of their men. They talked about compensation—compensation of £150 to a widow and her half-dozen children who had lost their breadwinner! Did they call that compensation? Why, it was no compensation at all. No doubt £150 was better than nothing; but no money in a case of that kind could be compensation, and it was well known that it was not money they asked for. It was protection to life that they wanted, and if an employer, notwithstanding the figures quoted to the contrary—and this was his opinion from great experience in these matters—if an employer could secure himself from all liability by the payment of 1*d.* per head for his accidents to his workmen into some common fund or some corporation for this purpose, his motive for saving life would be greatly diminished if not entirely destroyed. The employer would pay the same money per year, whether there were accidents or not, and what they required was that when there was an accident, through gross negligence, through bad plant and carelessly arranging material, that a fine should be imposed not of an exorbitant character, but such a fine should be imposed upon those responsible that they would take care in future that no repetition of the accident would occur if they possibly could avoid it. The larger the expenditure of money, the more care would be taken to prevent a repetition of such accidents. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary spoke with some pride of his success in securing the interests of workmen in Sub-section 3 of Clause 3 of this Bill. Would the House permit him (Mr. Broadhurst) to read half-a-dozen lines of Clause 3, and then he would ask whether hon. Members had ever read a clause so cleverly constructed to defy anyone to understand its meaning as this clause was? He thought there must have been some mistake in the course of the printing, and that the words of the clause had probably got jumbled together, for it could not possibly have been deliberately intended to draw such a provision as this. Sub-section 3 said—

“The insurance should be to such amount and on such conditions as will, having regard to the whole scope of the indemnity thereby given, and having regard to the proportion borne by the number of accidents in case of which the employer is liable to pay compensation under this Act to the number of accidents which are the subject of insurance, insure to the workman, or in case of death, his representatives, a benefit equivalent to the compensation recoverable under this Act.”

If he might use such an expression by the permission of Mr. Speaker, and without offence, it would puzzle a Philadelphian lawyer to understand this clause. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would in his interest in the Bill, and in defence of the reputation of drafting, strike this sub-section out, or have it recast in language which ordinary people could understand. He thought the right hon. Gentleman could not have noticed it at all, or he would not have allowed it to pass. Sub-section 4 was an extraordinary proposal. In it the right hon. Gentleman said that every condition of arrangement entered into for any other purpose of a similar character would be binding on the parties in a case coming under this Bill.—[Mr. MATTHEWS: Admissible as evidence.] He feared he went rather farther than that. They were not going to admit it as evidence even. It might be put in evidence that a firm in Plymouth employing half a dozen men had made an arrangement for insurance with them, and this case might be used as evidence in dealing with the employés of a firm in Manchester, Liverpool, or Glasgow employing 500 or 1,000 men. He thought the right hon. Gentleman must see that they were not going to agree to any such extraordinary proposal as that. And now he would hurry to the last point, and that was the question of the limitation of compensation. He must ask the House to agree with him in this, that the life of a workman was worth more than £150. Now, there was the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, a great financier and a man of very firm purpose and great business abilities, and he was sure the right hon. Gentleman with his great commercial knowledge would agree with him that the life of a workman was worth more than £150. They agreed to £150 in 1880. [Mr. MATTHEWS: Or three years' wages earned prior to accident.] In many cases the sum of £150 would be the amount in the case of a skilled workman, but that was not his point. His point was that the Labour Party agreed to conditions in 1880 which they were not now going to agree to in 1888. In 1880 it was the dawn of legislation of this kind. They, the Labour Party, out of the House, had to lead hon. Members of this House as they would lead timid children to the water; they had to lead them by degrees, and after years of agitation, and after the expenditure of large sums of money, they induced this timid, shivering, and shrinking House of Commons to give them a small instalment of what was right and just in matters of this kind. Well, the House took their lesson like the bold hon. Gentlemen they were, and the Labour Party now asked them for something wider, something higher, and something more difficult. They pointed to the fact that to-day the opposition they experienced in 1880 from the Party opposite had grown perceptibly less. The prophecy of ruin to the trade of the country which had been so largely indulged in had been falsified as the Labour Party knew it would be, and that Party now asked the Government to say that a workman's life was worth at least £500. There were some hon. Gentlemen who would ask the Government to remove all limit. The life of an M.P. might be worth £5,000. Well, but M.P.'s, as a rule, had fortunes to leave to their families, how much more then was the life of a working man worth when he had nothing to leave his family, and when there was nothing before his wife and family but poverty the moment the bread winner was removed? On that subject he and his Friends would have a great deal more to say, and later on he should move Amendments in harmony with the remarks he had made to the House. He would now only say one word as to Clause 12, which he rather thought the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary did not seem to be so well acquainted with as he was with some other parts of the Bill. Clause 12 gave compensation to seamen under certain circumstances, but the circumstances were so difficult that to his mind seamen would very rarely obtain compensation under the clause. He should, he hoped, hear much from hon. Gentlemen representing the seaport towns in support of his views on this matter. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had limited compensation to accidents arising in the case of a voyage commencing in a port in the United Kingdom. Did he understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that under this clause, in the case of a vessel sailing, say from San Francisco to Liverpool, and an accident occurring in the course of the voyage, the seaman would be entitled to recover? He (Mr. Broadhurst) thought they would not. What reason was there why a man meeting with an accident going out should be compensated for the accident if through the negligence of the employer, and yet when returning home be not so compensated for an accident? He thought that was the correct interpretation of the Bill. [Mr. MATTHEWS: No, no.] At any rate, he would call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to what the greatest authority in the Metropolis had said with regard to this clause, and he would ask hon. Gentlemen who were interested in the subject from the standpoint in which he (Mr. Broadhurst) was interested in it to pay some attention to this. This authority said that this new departure—namely, this Clause 12—was evidently the result of the recommendation of the Royal Commission on the loss of life at sea. [An hon. MEMBER: Who is the authority?] The authority was the London Chamber of Commerce. He was quoting from The Chamber of Commerce Journal of May 5 of the present year. That journal said—

Mr. Broadhurst

“Shipowners, although objecting generally to the provision, did not appear to be much troubled by it, as they hoped to cover their responsibilities by insurance.”

Here was a confession of faith. They knew what that scheme of insurance was invented for in the first case, and what it was continued for now. It was to relieve the souls of those wealthy shipowners from financial trouble. The Chamber of Commerce consisted of shipowners, of great manufacturers of the City of London, and of great salesmen and others, and they said that they were not troubled much by the provision as they hoped to cover their liabilities by insuring out of them. That was a stronger condemnation of the right hon. Gentleman's 12th Clause than he (Mr. Broadhurst) should be prepared to pass on it. He only spoke with great diffidence and considerable hesitation as to whether the clause would ever be of much service to seamen. The Chamber of Commerce whose opinion he had quoted was a Chamber consisting of shipowners to a large extent, and they were very likely to know what would be the result of the provision. Seeing that the provision caused them no trouble, care, or anxiety, and that they would be able to cover all their liability by a system of insurance, it did not seem as though the provision would be of much use to seamen. For these reasons, and for others, he should feel it his duty when the Bill was read a second time—and he hoped many of his hon. Friends would do the same—to hand in such Amendments to the measure as would make it reasonable and just from the standpoint of the workmen properly entitled to compensation from their employers. He had only one other word to say, and that was with regard to the Committee to which the Bill should be referred. He heard it said that it was likely to go to the Grand Committee on Trade. He hoped, however, that it would be sent to the Grand Committee on Law, and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would favourably consider that suggestion, as he (Mr. Broadhurst) thought the Grand Committee would be a much more com-

but such a fine should be imposed upon those responsible that they would take care in future that no repetition of the accident would occur if they possibly could avoid it. The larger the expenditure of money, the more care would be taken to prevent a repetition of such accidents. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary spoke with some pride of his success in securing the interests of workmen in Sub-section 3 of Clause 3 of this Bill. Would the House permit him (Mr. Broadhurst) to read half-a-dozen lines of Clause 3, and then he would ask whether hon. Members had ever read a clause so cleverly constructed to defy anyone to understand its meaning as this clause was? He thought there must have been some mistake in the course of the printing, and that the words of the clause had probably got jumbled together, for it could not possibly have been deliberately intended to draw such a provision as this. Sub-section 3 said—

“The insurance should be to such amount and on such conditions as will, having regard to the whole scope of the indemnity thereby given, and having regard to the proportion borne by the number of accidents in case of which the employer is liable to pay compensation under this Act to the number of accidents which are the subject of insurance, insure to the workman, or in case of death, his representatives, a benefit equivalent to the compensation recoverable under this Act.”

If he might use such an expression by the permission of Mr. Speaker, and without offence, it would puzzle a Philadelphian lawyer to understand this clause. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would in his interest in the Bill, and in defence of the reputation of drafting, strike this sub-section out, or have it recast in language which ordinary people could understand. He thought the right hon. Gentleman could not have noticed it at all, or he would not have allowed it to pass. Sub-section 4 was an extraordinary proposal. In it the right hon. Gentleman said that every condition of arrangement entered into for any other purpose of a similar character would be binding on the parties in a case coming under this Bill.—[Mr. MATTHEWS: Admissible as evidence.] He feared he went rather farther than that. They were not going to admit it as evidence even. It might be put in evidence that a firm in Plymouth employing half a dozen men had made an arrangement for insurance with them, and this case might be used as evidence in dealing with the employés of a firm in Manchester, Liverpool, or Glasgow employing 500 or 1,000 men. He thought the right hon. Gentleman must see that they were not going to agree to any such extraordinary proposal as that. And now he would hurry to the last point, and that was the question of the limitation of compensation. He must ask the House to agree with him in this, that the life of a workman was worth more than £150. Now, there was the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, a great financier and a man of very firm purpose and great business abilities, and he was sure the right hon. Gentleman with his great commercial knowledge would agree with him that the life of a workman was worth more than £150. They agreed to £150 in 1880. [Mr. MATTHEWS: Or three years' wages earned prior to accident.] In many cases the sum of £150 would be the amount in the case of a skilled workman, but that was not his point. His point was that the Labour Party agreed to conditions in 1880 which they were not now going to agree to in 1888. In 1880 it was the dawn of legislation of this kind. They, the Labour Party, out of the House, had to lead hon. Members of this House as they would lead timid children to the water; they had to lead them by degrees, and after years of agitation, and after the expenditure of large sums of money, they induced this timid, shivering, and shrinking House of Commons to give them a small instalment of what was right and just in matters of this kind. Well, the House took their lesson like the bold hon. Gentlemen they were, and the Labour Party now asked them for something wider, something higher, and something more difficult. They pointed to the fact that to-day the opposition they experienced in 1880 from the Party opposite had grown perceptibly less. The prophecy of ruin to the trade of the country which had been so largely indulged in had been falsified as the Labour Party knew it would be, and that Party now asked the Government to say that a workman's life was worth at least £500. There were some hon. Gentlemen who would ask the Government to remove all limit. The life of sure, which he acknowledged was a decided improvement of the Act of 1880. He did not wish himself to labour the doctrine of common employment; but he felt there was no good reason for limiting the liability of employers in the manner proposed, and he trusted that the Bill would be so amended as to place a workman in relation to his fellow-workmen in the same position as any third person receiving injury whilst on the premises of the employer. He would also remind those who had charge of the Bill, that there were positions requiring skilled knowledge on the part of the employé, and yet that such places were filled by manifestly incompetent persons. In such cases, it surely could not be right to deprive the workman of his own claim to compensation for injuries arising out of accidents, owing to the incompetency and gross negligence of his fellow-working man. But there was another question of considerable importance—he meant of contractors and sub-contractors. Section 2, which referred to the point, did not, he thought, as drawn, apply to all such cases as it was no doubt intended that it should apply. Take the following instance. A mineowner engaged a sub-contractor to sink a shaft, at so much per yard. The sub-contractor, in turn, employed some dozen men to do the work, and paid them so much per week, all materials being supplied by the mineowner. The sub-contractor was usually a man of straw. Well, owing to imperfect shoring, a stone at the side of the shaft fell, and killed one of the working men. Under the law as it now stood, he ventured to say, the interpretation which would be placed upon the Bill, if it became law, would be that a workman had no right to compensation against the principal employer in respect of such an accident. He knew of an accident of the kind, where the representatives of a deceased workman had sought to enforce a claim for damages, and had obtained a judgment in the County Court below; but, on appeal, that judgment was reversed, although the fact was in evidence that the mineowner's engineer superintended the work of the sub-contractor in respect of the contract. He maintained that this subsection, as drawn, would not cover that position; and he, therefore, trusted that another clause would be added to definitely remedy the same. Then, as to notice before action, he was of decided opinion that that notice should be done away with altogether. He thought that it only embarrassed the position of the workman injured, or the position of his relatives in the case of his death. Certainly, the extension of time from six weeks to three months was an improvement; but, as he had said, he thought that the notice should be done away with altogether. If a man was seriously injured, by the time he was sufficiently recovered to consider his position, he was surprised to find that his legal rights were gone. If notice had to be given, there was no reason why it should be before action. In all actions of tort he thought it desirable that the statutory period for commencement of an action should be considerably shortened—say, 12 months from the accident, or in case of death, two years. He thought the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) was wrong so far as the interpretation he placed on the Act of 1880 was concerned. He thought that Act gave no alternative as to the limit of the amount recoverable. It was in the Bill, for the first time, that it was sought as an alternative to place the sum of £150 as the limit of the sum recoverable; and he agreed that that amount was far too small. He would prefer leaving the question of compensation to be dealt with by a jury; but he thought that, if they fixed any limit at all, the amount should be increased to £500. It would be preferable, in his opinion, however, to leave the matter in the hands of a jury, for they would know the circumstances of each case, and the matter might safely be entrusted to them. Then, as to the question of the application of the Act to seamen. He had hoped, certainly, after the words which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, who introduced the Bill, that the Government would have dealt more liberally with poor Jack than they appeared to do in the Bill. Looking at the sub-sections, it seemed that the remedy of the sailor was restricted to injury received in port. Sailors were a class of men who had not been so well looked after as they deserved, and he trusted that their rights of action would be more fully looked after by the Government than they appeared to be in this Bill. Then, coming to the definitions of the Bill, it was to be hoped that the expression "workman" would be held to include domestic or menial servants, clerks, omnibus conductors, and tramway conductors. One would desire that the Bill should apply to every person in the position of a servant. As to the question of the time it was contemplated that the Act should come into operation, it should not be lost sight of that the old Act expired by effluxion of time at the end of this Session, and that the new Act should come into operation immediately after the passing of the same. There was evidently now a ready disposition to admit the claims and rights of the working classes, and he trusted that no political partizanship on the one side or the other would be the means of thwarting such good intentions.

Mr. Broadhurst

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) said, he had put a Notice on the Paper to move the rejection of the Bill, but had done so rather with the desire to prevent the Bill being taken after half-past 12 o'clock, if by chance the House should sit so late. Certainly, he should be the very last person in the House to object to the passing of some such Bill as that, because he knew that the Bill now put forward by the Government was to a large extent a recast of a Bill of his own which was referred to a Select Committee last Session. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary (Mr. Matthews), referring to that Bill, appeared to labour under the impression that both his (Mr. O'Connor's) Bill, and that of his hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), did away with the doctrine of common employment altogether. He could answer for one of those Bills, and say that it was not correct to state that it did away with the doctrine of common employment at all, nor did he desire that it should be done away with. Suppose two men, under a common employer, were working together at a large stone, and one man happened to be negligent in handling the stone and that it fell and the other workman was injured; it seemed to him most reasonable that the common employer should be made responsible for that negligence. But what they were anxious last year to procure was that the employer should not be allowed to contract himself out of the liability under the Act of 1880, and that the workman should not be liable to contract himself out of the benefit of the Act. The provisions which were placed in this Bill under Section 3 appeared to him to be absolutely unworkable. As the French said, the door must either be open or shut; the liability must either be on the employer, and there must be no means of contracting himself out of the Act, or else all the arrangements they might make would inevitably end in disappointment, and the effect of the Bill would be a bolstering up of Employers' Liability Insurance Companies. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the Bill as if it were an improvement on the existing law, so far as the interests of the working classes were concerned, and he went on to say that he proposed to simplify the law by combining the Common Law action with the action under the Employers' Liability Act. But he did more than that. He (Mr. O'Connor) would ask the House to consider the force of the 11th section of the present Bill, which related to Common Law rights; the clause was to the effect that where any personal injury was caused to a workman by reason of any wrongful act in connection with the works in which a workman was employed, and the workman was entitled, independently of the Act, to any compensation from the employer, the action for compensation should be brought in the same time and on the same motion as if it had been brought under the Act, and should not be brought otherwise. In that way this Bill, which affected to be in the interest of the working classes, really cut down the Common Law right of the workman to an action under the Act; that was to say, he would only be able to bring an action within the limited time and upon notice being given to the employer. The question of notice was a very important matter; because, in consequence of the action of many employers, workmen were deluded into delaying proceedings by the belief that it would not be necessary to bring an action against the employers at all. He said that that cut down the existing Common Law right; but, again, in Clause 1, Sub-section B, the phraseology was so arranged that the liability of the employer was further reduced at the expense of the workman. Under the Employers' Liability Act of 1880, if any person having superintendence entrusted to him should be guilty of negligence whereby a workman was injured, the workman so injured should have compensation at the hands of the employer; but the effect of this new clause was that unless the injured workmen was actually under the superintendence of the man who was negligent, he would have no right of action against the employer. There, again, they had a reduction of the employers' liability at the expense of the workman. In order to test this clause he would like to quote a word or two from what he believed to be the best handbook on employers' liability, which said on this point—

“A acts as general superintendent over workmen employed in one department of a factory, and orders one of the workmen to lower a bale of goods from a window by a chain insufficient for the purpose; the chain breaks, and the bale of goods injures a workman in the same factory, but one over whom A exercises no superintendence. Under this Act he is liable.”

But, under the present Bill, he would not be liable by reason of want of superintendence exercised over the negligent official. The clause, therefore, required very great attention, in order to prevent it being liable to the objection he (Mr. O'Connor) had pointed out. Again, the class of persons who could bring an action under the Bill would be limited, as before, to those who were entitled under the Act of 1880. The Act of 1880 said in its 1st section that a workman, or, in case of injury resulting in death, the legal personal representative of the workman, and any person entitled to represent him in case of death, should have the same right to compensation against the employer. But Section 8 of this Bill said that the persons amongst whom compensation for injury should be awarded were husband, wife, parent, or child. If they were going to combine the action under the Act with the Common Law action, they would have a difficulty with regard to the terms of Lord Campbell's Act, which included with the wife, husband, parent, and child, grandparents, grandchildren, and stepchildren. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Matthews) said that that was in the Bill. He hoped it might be so; but there were authorities in legal circles who held a different opinion. The right hon. Gentleman also spoke of the disadvantage of actions abating in case of death. It was true that Sub-section 4 of Section 1 provided that an action under that section should lie against the representative of a deceased employer. So far, so good; but while it provided for continuation of an action on the death of the representative of the employer, the right hon. Gentleman seemed to have overlooked the case of the death of the injured workman. [“No, no!”] The right hon. Gentleman said “No;” but he could find in the Bill no provision by which an action commenced by an injured man should be allowed to continue at the hands of his representatives. With regard to Section 3, and the compensation of workmen under contractors or sub-contractors, it seemed to him that that was a recasting, and not a very good one, of his own Bill of last Session. He thought his own drafting was better. With regard to the voidance of contracts dealt with in Section 3, he had only two points to remark upon. In the first place, he would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that, unless the jurisdiction of the County Court was increased, there would be a limitation of actions in these cases. Then, with regard to Sub-section 4 of Section 3, which had been already quoted by the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst), it provided that any arrangement or agreement entered into by persons in similar employment elsewhere should be admissible as evidence of the reasonableness or propriety of any system of insurance entered into between employers and their men. He asked whether that similarity was to be treated as an issue of fact, or was it held to be a question of law? Was it a point on which appeal would lie? Again, in Section 6, Sub-section 2, it was provided that on trial of an action in the County Court without a jury, one or more assessors might be appointed for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of compensation. Now, no one could doubt the propriety of having skilled assessors where it might be necessary; but that two assessors should be required to help any qualified Court or jury to assess the amount of compensation was a thing that no one ever heard of. He suggested that it would have been well to follow the recommendation of the Select Committee of last year, which was that there should be special juries—that the parties should be entitled to have special juries wherever the case in the opinion of the Court warranted it. That would be much more useful than the appointment of these assessors, who were to do nothing but assess the amount of compensation. With regard to the question of seamen, he was agreeably surprised, when on the Committee, to find that although there were three Representatives of the ship-owning interest upon it, every one of them in the most loyal and generous spirit agreed in the recommendation that seamen should be included in the benefit of the Bill. He was glad to acknowledge the action of an hon. Gentleman who was sitting opposite who had no hesitation in supporting that proposal; but he regretted that the clause had been limited. It was only in case of tackle issuing from a port in the United Kingdom proving defective that a man injured in consequence was entitled to recover compensation from the owners. But it was perfectly possible for the master of a ship in any part of the world to have his vessel put in proper order and provide proper tackle. San Francisco had been suggested; but a bottomry bond could always be given for the money necessary to enable a master to put his ship in proper working order, and, therefore, why a man should not be entitled to compensation who was injured on the voyage home just as much as the man injured on the outward voyage, he could not understand. He did not wish to detain the House longer, but there was one further flaw in the Bill that he desired to point out. The right hon. Gentleman had referred, among other things, to the insurance fund in connection with the London and North-Western Railway, and he spoke of the system obtaining there as very satisfactory, and appeared to think that if other employers of labour had established the same system, there would be nothing to find fault with. But the right hon. Gentleman did not tell the House that the system was compulsory, and that the men were obliged to submit to it as a condition of employment, and that the men, if left to themselves, would prefer to trust to the benefit of the Employers' Liability Act. There was one clause in the Bill which related to procedure in Scotch Courts; but, as that appeared to be rather a question for Committee than the present stage of the Bill, he would not make further comment upon it. Before sitting down, he would like to endorse the opinion of the hon. Member for West Nottingham—namely, that this Bill should not be referred to the Committee on Trade, but to the Committee on Law. There was nothing in the Bill which required that it should be referred to the Committee on Trade, but there were many points as to which it would be well that it should be considered by the Committee on Law.

MR. AINSLIE (Lancashire, North Lonsdale) said, that as one of the Committee which sat on the Bills two years ago, he felt he was bound to say something in reference to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and particularly to that portion of it in which he spoke of the position that those whom he described as the Representatives of the employers of labour had taken up. He (Mr. Ainslie) deprecated altogether even the supposition that the Representatives, so-called, of the employers of labour had had any other object in view than that of benefiting the working classes; and, not only that, but he thought that from the recommendations of the Select Committee, and from the names of those who supported the various proposals submitted at the conclusion of the Committee, they might judge what the employers of labour desired to do. He wished also to protest against the language of the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) who seemed to think that hon. Members on that side of the House were disposed to put a money value upon the life of a workman. In fixing the limit of compensation at £150, as an alternative to three years' wages, the Committee had in view, as he thought hon. Members ought to be informed, more particularly the case of boys and apprentices, to whom an injury in early life was of the gravest moment, and who, if lamed, had a very limited scope of means of subsistence open to them in after life. The idea was that £150 to an apprentice or youth was probably a fair limit. The hon. Member for the Gower Division of Glamorgan (Mr. Randall) rightly interpreted the idea covered in the clause, providing that where negligence was shown punishment would follow, not merely in the mulcting a sum of money from the employer, for there was also a criminal liability to which the employer was subjected. Both these things must be before the mind of every employer when he was engaging workmen and fitting up the machinery necessary to their employment. One matter, which had been left out of sight by hon. Gentlemen who had spoken in the debate so far, was that they, who it might be said represented in the Select Committee the employers of labour, represented two classes of employers—the large employers of labour and the small employers of labour. They particularly had in mind the small employers of labour, the men whose whole capital probably was covered by £50 or £100, and who if they were to be mulcted in the sum of £500, as some hon. Members had suggested, would simply be ruined men. It was to protect these men, as well as large men, that some limit to the money they would have to pay was fixed. With regard to contracting and sub-contracting, he had tried to find out where the limit could be fixed. He did not feel sure, for instance, that if he was painting his house, as he was bound to do so many times in the course of a lease, he would not be liable for compensation for any accidents that might happen to the men engaged by the man employed by him. The wording of the language was so wide that he had to seek not where the narrow limit was, but where the utmost limit was to which the language might extend. He thought that a few words might with advantage be inserted in Committee, defining the limit of responsibility. In regard to the time of the notice, he thought that the Committee went to the utmost limit in their recommendations. He was bound to say that in regard to Sub-section 3, Clause 3, which was the subject of much animadversion by the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst), he was for a very long time puzzled to understand what the meaning of that sub-section was. But he thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, in his opening speech, made it sufficiently clear that if any alteration in the wording were wanted, he would take care it was made in Committee. He thanked the House for the patience with which they had listened to these few observations.

MR. LOCKWOOD (York) said, he would not detain the House at any length, because he assured hon. Gentleman who sat opposite that he was not going to criticize the Bill in any hostile spirit. They, who sat on the Opposition side of the House, must recognize that what the Home Secretary said in introducing the Bill was perfectly true—that that was, after all, an amending Bill, and if there were faults in it, the blame should not rest entirely upon the Head of the Government who had introduced it. The main faults which he found in the Bill were faults which existed in the Bill of 1880, and his regret was that the Government should have found it necessary to perpetuate those faults in what the Home Secretary had rightly called the amending Bill of that year. Now, to put it shortly, the main objections he had to the Bill were these. The Bill purported to recognize the injustice of the doctrine of common employment, as it was called. It recognized the injustice to a certain extent, but it did away with the good which would result from that recognition by imposing upon the litigants—he was speaking of the plaintiffs who would bring actions under the Bill—harassing conditions, which were a great burden upon such litigants. He objected entirely to the notice of action. For whose benefit was it—for the benefit of the employer? It must be, of course, for his benefit. But what right had the employer to notice of action? In nine cases out of ten the accident happened upon his own premises, and he had direct personal notice of it. If the accident did not happen upon his own premises, it happened where his workmen were working for him, and in that way he had direct notice of it. The great Railway Companies, whose systems extended from one end of the country to the other, had no notice of action in the case of accidents which were the result of their negligence at any part of their systems. There were the great Omnibus Companies plying through the streets of the Metropolis; they surely were more entitled to notice of action than an employer whom it sought under the Bill to make liable for accidents which occurred practically upon his own premises. He thanked the Home Secretary for the figures he had been kind enough to supply him. According to those figures, there were 1,800 actions; but in only 684 had the litigants been successful, the percentage of successful actions thus being about 38; but how came it that there were only 684 successful actions out of 1,800; how many of the persons who brought the actions had been made unsuccessful litigants by reason of being trammelled and hampered and harassed by this very notice of action? It was all very well for lawyers like himself to preserve this notice of action, because it was a fruitful source of litigation. Over and over again it happened that when a working man had gone into Court some objection was taken to his notice of action. The question upon whom the notice should be served, and as to within what time it should be served, and a great number of other considerations, rendered this a very harassing matter for litigants. He objected to the limit within which the action was to be brought. Why impose a limit of six months? Look at the cruel hardship which accrued from that. He had no doubt that many hon. Members remembered the case of "Johnson v. Shaw." In that case a man was injured in January, 1883, and by his injuries he was rendered insane. He was put into a lunatic asylum from which he was only brought out—fortunately cured—in July. That man had no means of appointing a committee to represent him in the action, and while that poor fellow was lying maimed and insane in the asylum, time was running against him. When he came out, the six months had expired, and he could not bring his action. There would be as cruel cases of hardship under this Bill. Hon. Members would find that one of the sub-clauses—Sub-clause 4, he believed—gave right of action against representatives of employers. But, supposing an accident happened, and immediately after the workmen had been injured the employer died. They knew what the delays of the law were, and therefore they could easily understand that more than six months might be taken up in the appointment of a representative of the employer who might be sued. In the meantime, the law's delays had prevented the workmen from bringing their action, and time had run against them. Surely, that was an injustice. Now, the third objection he had had reference to the matter of amount. Why did they limit the amount? They were told by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Ainslie) that the Committee, in fixing the amount of compensation at £150, had boys and apprentices chiefly in view. He (Mr. Lockwood) did not see why they should value the life of a boy at £150. Why not trust the juries? The Government were continually telling the House they had confidence in juries. Why did they say that, with regard to employers, the amount of compensation which they should pay should be limited, whereas in all other cases there was no limit as to the amount of compensation? These were his three objections to the Bill. Of course he had others, but he was not going to occupy the time of the House in discussing them. Surely, it was not a very generous provision of the Bill, when they were professing to deal with the working man so far as his employer was concerned, and they were professing to put that man on an equality with third parties who were not employed. Surely, it was not a very generous thing to take away or to hamper or to harass the working man's Common Law right of action. On what principle was that done; how came it that it had been introduced into the Bill? It might have been introduced to satisfy some of the Gentlemen who sat opposite, and who, it would appear, he thought, from one portion of the right hon. Gentleman's remarks, were not pleased with some of the provisions of the Bill, but who took great care to assure the right hon. Gentleman that there was no feeling of displeasure at the measure on their part. He (Mr. Lockwood) did not wish to say anything which could have a hostile bearing on the Bill, for he certainly joined with those who deprecated any Division against the Bill. It was, no doubt, an important question to what Committee the Bill should be referred. This was a Bill which involved questions of procedure, and the clause relating to procedure appeared to him to be the most important clause of the Bill. It was suggested by some Members that the Bill should be entrusted to the Grand Committee upon Trade. Of course, that Committee was quite able to deal with the many questions involved; but they were not, he submitted, capable of dealing effectively and effectually with questions of procedure, and he could only say that, if the Bill were sent to the Trade Committee, when it came back on Report those Members who took an interest in the matter would take an opportunity of being heard again upon the Bill.

Mr. Lockwood

COLONEL HILL (Bristol, S.) said, he could assure hon. Members that he should make but a very slight demand upon their time. As a shipowner, he desired to say that he had no wish whatever to offer any opposition to the second reading of the Bill; and he thought he might say that shipowners in general had no wish whatever to avoid any degree of responsibility which properly rested upon them, as upon all other employers of labour, to see that the conditions of their employment afforded the greatest amount of possible safety to the men they employed. But he wished to remind the House that there was a very considerable difference between the conditions of employment on land and at sea. The owner of a mine or a factory had the opportunity, as often as he pleased to avail himself of it, of visiting his mine or factory, and seeing that the precautions that he had ordered were being properly observed. The shipowner had not that opportunity. He might have the best possible vessel; he might have the very best equipment; and he might have the vessel manned and officered by men whom he knew to be good and skilful men, men who had obtained certificates from the Board of Trade to that effect; but when the vessel had gone away he was unable to exercise any supervision at all over her. Then he (Colonel Hill) ventured to say that the immunity from accident on board a vessel depended in a very great degree upon the skill of those on board rather than on anything the owner had had it in his power to do; and there was this also, that it was to the shipowners' self-interest in a very large degree, in a larger degree than in the case of employers on shore, that accidents should not happen. If an accident happened in a mine or a factory, it meant the stoppage of the profit-earning powers of the mine or factory for a certain limited time; but in the case of a ship it was quite different. An accident might deprive the owner of any profit for the whole twelve months, or, at all events, for the whole voyage in which the vessel was engaged. Three months' notice had been objected to in the case of employers on shore, and one of the great reasons of the hon. and learned Member for York (Mr. Lockwood) why there should not be any notice was, that accidents happened at the very door of the employer, as it were, and that the employer had direct personal notice of them. That, however, was not the case with shipowners. But there was another circumstance to be taken into account; a vessel came home, and, as hon. Members were aware, the crew was paid off. Now, if the shipowner had no notice of any claim, he had no means of providing himself with the necessary evidence with which to rebut any incorrect statement which might be made. Then he also urged that no special reason existed for the application of this provision to shipowners; for the latest Return of the loss of life at sea showed that the shipping trade was carried on with increasing immunity from accidents. The last Return, which was published in the April of this very year, showed that in 1885, the last year for which there was any Return, the total loss of life was 1,068. That was a decrease of 425 on the previous year, and the decrease of 1,072 on the average of the last 10 years. He thought the House would feel that that was a satisfactory statement, and that it showed that the shipowners had not been so oblivious to the claims of "Poor Jack" as had been asserted by hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. Then, again, shipowners and sailors were on very good terms, and he instanced, as a proof of that, that only a very short time ago he had the honour of introducing in the House a Bill which proposed to provide funds jointly by shipowners and sailors for the relief of widows and orphans. But if, however, upon these grounds it might not be considered desirable to except shipping from the operation of this Bill as it was in 1880, he hoped that the Committee, whether it be the Committee on Trade—which seemed to him to be the proper Committee—or the Committee on Law, to which the Bill was referred, would accept certain Amendments for the purpose of simplifying and adapting the Bill to shipping. Amendments would be brought forward to the effect that the liability should be confined to the equipments and fittings only. It had been said that the sailor ought to have the same right to compensation for an accident occurring on the homeward voyage as upon the outward voyage, because there was every facility abroad for refitting the vessels. But that was not always the case. There were places abroad where one could not get as good materials as one would wish to get, and the master had to manage with the best materials he could obtain. The shipowner had no control over such incidents. With regard to the question of time, he had already endeavoured to point out the difficulty which existed, and he would only mention further that the Accidental Insurance Companies insisted upon a notice of claim being given a very short time after the accident. He did not see any reason why notice of claim should not be given immediately upon the arrival of a vessel in port, and he hoped the Committee would see the desirability of adopting the Amendment to that effect. Then there were certain complicated suggestions made in Sub-section C, Clause 12, which would give to the Board of Trade a great deal of power in regard to the classification of vessels and the like, which he thought would be very intolerable. He had only to add that personally he desired that the occupation of the working man should be rendered as little hazardous as possible, and that he hailed with satisfaction any just and proper measure having that tendency.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central) said, that at that hour of the night (11.40) he would only detain the House three for four minutes; but having been one of those who originally before 1878 most strongly recommended this legislation to the House, he was anxious to say a few words. In the first place, he wished to say that it was very satisfactory to him to find a general concurrence of opinion now-a-days in favour of the principle of this Bill. He fully confirmed what his hon. Friend the Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) had said—namely, that those who originally promoted this Bill had in view mainly, not so much the giving of compensation in such cases, as the giving of fresh motive to employers to take care in carrying on their works. He thought that principle had been borne in mind in this Bill; but he hoped that it might be somewhat extended in the course of the passage of the Bill through Committee. There was one point he wished specially to advert to—namely, the application of the Bill to seamen. The Royal Commission, of which he was Chairman a few years ago, attached the very greatest importance to the extension of the provisions of the Act to seamen; they did so in the interest of the general security of seamen, not so much with the view of giving compensation to the men in particular cases, but because they thought that this was one of the best ways of bringing home responsibilities to the shipowners, and inducing them to conduct their business in a manner conducive to the safety of the men. He was afraid the Bill as it stood, as regarded seamen, was somewhat too restrictive, and he hoped that in Committee it would be improved in that respect. He did not see any reason for making so great a distinction between homeward and outward bound vessels as was made in the Bill. The owner of a ship who was sending the vessel to a foreign port was not in any worse position than the employer who employed an agent at home. A shipowner must at a port in a distant country employ an agent, and it was the agent's duty to see that the vessel was in as fit a state to return as it was to go out, and therefore he (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) hoped that in this respect there would be some change made in the Bill. He very much objected to the sub-sections of the clause to which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had adverted—namely, those sub-sections giving power to the Board of Trade to make specific regulations with respect to the equipment of vessels. That was the introduction of a provision to which the Royal Commission had objected, and he hoped that these sub-sections would disappear. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the changes proposed with regard to the doctrine of common employment, but he (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had been unable to make out whether the Bill made any important changes in the law as compared with the Act of 1880. He had compared the Bill with the Act of 1880, and he found that it was extremely difficult to make out the phraseology. The only other point he would refer to was the question of forbidding persons to contract themselves out of the Act. He entirely approved of that provision; but at the same time he was willing to admit that there was a great deal to be said for the principle of contracting out of the Bill in cases of mutual insurance. In conclusion, he had to say that he agreed with those who suggested that the Bill should be referred to the Grand Committee on Law, because he believed that, on the whole, that would give greater satisfaction than referring it to the Committee on Trade.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, he desired to make an appeal to the House with regard to this Bill. He did not feel justified in exercising any pressure, looking to the importance of the subject under discussion; but he gathered from the debate which had gone so far that it was the general wish of Members that the measure should be referred to a Grand Committee—to either the Committee on Law or the Committee on Trade, as to which question the Government desired to express no opinion that evening. They desired to reserve any expression of opinion upon that subject, and they had no prejudice in regard to it in one direction or the other. But, looking at the fact that that was practically the last night on which it was possible to discuss a question of that kind before the Holidays, and that the time after the Holidays was very fully appropriated, he thought he gathered that the general desire of the House was that the Bill should be read a second time that night. If that was the wish, he trusted that hon. Members would be content to reserve any observations they might have to make for a future occasion, and especially until the Bill was sent to a Committee, when full opportunity would be afforded them to raise any question in which they took an interest. He thought it would be for the public advantage and for the convenience of Members generally that the Bill should now be read a second time.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) said, he quite agreed with the general views expressed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith); but he did not quite understand when they were to hear from the Government, if the discussion closed that night, to which of the two Committees the Bill was to be referred. He thought there would be much greater willingness on the part of hon. Gentlemen behind him to assent to the proposal to take the second reading of the Bill that night, if they had a clear assurance from the right hon. Gentleman that the Government would accede to the appeal which had been made by every speaker on the Opposition side of the House, and, he believed, on the other side, that the Bill should be referred to the Committee on Law.

Mr. W. H. SMITH said, there must be a distinct Motion on that question, and the Government would put down the Motion to refer the Bill to either the Committee on Law or on Trade on the Monday after the Whitsuntide Holidays.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY: Are we to understand it is the wish of the Government that the Bill should be referred to the Committee on Law?

Mr. W. H. SMITH said, he was not quite prepared to say that. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] They had no prejudice at all in the matter, and they would endeavour to gather the general feeling of hon. Members interested in the question on both sides of the House, and take the best means they could of ascertaining the views of the House generally. It was a matter on which they could form no decided opinion now; and, therefore, he hoped the House would permit them to leave the matter open until they re-assembled.

Mr. MAC INNES (Northumberland, Hexham) said, that the right hon. Gentleman had asked them to assist him in taking the second reading of the Bill that night. If they assented to the second reading now, he hoped that hon. Gentlemen opposite would give them credit for very considerable self-denial. Very many of them had taken a great interest in this question, and they had wished to have it fully and amply discussed in the House; but all the opportunity of discussion permitted to them had been the very short space of time from 20 minutes to 11 to 10 minutes before midnight, because the previous hour was occupied by two speeches—of course, very interesting—from Gentlemen upon the Front Benches. The mass of Members, especially his hon. Friends connected with the mining interest, who took especial interest in this matter, would have no further opportunity of taking part in the debate. There was much discussion as to whether the Bill should be referred to the Committee on Trade or to that on Law; but to the great majority of Members that question was necessarily of no interest. It must necessarily be the case that the great majority of Members had not seats on either of those Committees; and, therefore, if the second reading was passed to-night, the vast majority of Members would have no further opportunity of taking part in the discussion on the Bill. If they did agree to the second reading then, he hoped hon. Members, when they met their constituents during the Holidays, would acknowledge that in this instance, as in other instances during the Session, hon. Members upon the Opposition Benches had shown no obstructive tendencies, as hon. Gentlemen sometimes wished to make out.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Fenwick.)

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that he could not, of course, object to an adjournment if it was pressed by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway; but he would regret it very much, for he thought it would postpone the progress of a measure in which they took an especial interest. It was really impossible to say when it would be in the power of the Government to name another day on which the Bill could be taken.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) said, he understood that the chief question now at issue was whether the Bill should be referred to the Committee upon Law or to that upon Trade. Personally, he thought that it would be better that the Bill should be discussed in Committee of the Whole House. As to the adjournment of the debate, he was opposed to the Friends with whom he usually acted. If they had prepared speeches, and wanted a sitting to-morrow, he did not want such a sitting, although he could come down just as well as they. Certainly, he thought they would be disappointed in the intention they had in view, because they would not have a House to-morrow, or, if they did, the vast majority of the House would be composed of the Government Supporters.

Mr. Mac Innes

An hon. Friend of his suggested that the Question should be put; he did not object to that, because he only rose with the object of facilitating matters if he could. He had understood that this important measure, with which they all sympathised in principle, would be read a second time that night, and that there would be no need to come down to the House to-morrow. Of course, if there was a Division to be taken, he would vote with his hon. Friend who had moved the adjournment of the debate; but he should only do so from personal motives. If his hon. Friends were anxious that they should have another opportunity of discussing the Bill, he would support them in their endeavour to get it; but he promised them an empty House to-morrow and an inattentive country, whereas if they followed his advice, and agreed to some sensible arrangement, they might, at some future time, have a favourable opportunity of discussing all the points of the Bill.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said, that at an earlier hour in the evening the Closure was moved by an hon. Member upon the Opposition side of the House, and now, at that late hour, 4 minutes to 12 o'clock, it appeared the Government were not satisfied with their great exploits in the course of the present sitting, but wished to obtain an opportunity, if they possibly could, of bringing on a measure which stood in the name of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He certainly thought the desire of those who took an especial interest in the Bill, and who had every right to be heard, should be acceded to by the Government. Without wishing to take up any further time of the House, he sincerely trusted that the Motion for the Adjournment would be accepted.

MR. W. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda) trusted the Government would allow the Bill to be adjourned till to-morrow.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

NATIONAL DEBT (SUPPLEMENTAL)
BILL.—[BILL 264.]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Jackson)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said, he thought it was most objectionable for the Government to attempt to rush through a Bill of that kind just before 12 o'clock.

It being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Thursday, 31st May.

NATIONAL DEFENCE BILL.—[BILL 235.]

(Mr. Secretary Stanhope, Lord George Hamilton, Mr. Brodrick)

COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Committee be deferred till Monday 4th June."—(Mr. Jackson.)

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) asked, whether the measure would be taken as the first Order on the 4th of June?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, it would be taken substantially as the first Order on the day named.

Motion agreed to.

SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—THE WHISTUNTIDE RECESS.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, it had been represented to him that it would be for the general convenience of the House if he now moved that the House, at the Sitting to be held To-morrow at two o'clock, should adjourn until Thursday, the 31st of May. He would, therefore, make that Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House, on rising To-morrow, do adjourn until Thursday the 31st of May."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I object, Sir.

MR. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, whether, if his hon. Friend the Member for the Camborne Division (Mr. Conybeare) withdrew his opposition and the Motion were agreed to, any Business would be taken at the Morning Sitting in addition to the Employers' Liability Bill?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he had no hesitation whatever in giving an assurance that no other Business would be put down on the Paper or taken at the Morning Sitting, as far as the Government were concerned.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Not even Report of Supply?

MR. W. H. SMITH: No.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I hope my hon. Friend will withdraw his opposition.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) asked, what reason the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) had for making the Motion now? It would be quite as safe to do it to-morrow.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he had two reasons for pressing his objection to the Motion. In the first place, he believed that it was most unusual to make such a proposition on the day before that on which the House was to rise for the Holidays; and, in the second place, it was clearly the intention of the Government to burk all discussion on the Motion. Several hon. Members had matters of importance to bring before the House upon the Motion for adjournment, and he should, therefore, certainly press his objection.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) said, he understood that if the hon. Member did press his objection the matter could not be discussed, but he (Mr. Harrington) thought he might venture to represent to the hon. Member that it had been generally understood, if not in a direct, at all events in an indirect way, that the House would finish its work that evening, and that if by any chance a Morning Sitting had to be taken on Friday, it would be only in reference to the unfinished debate on the Employers' Liability Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) had just stated, in the most distinct way, that no Business of any kind, beyond the Employers' Liability Bill, was to be taken at the Morning Sitting.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): Mr. Deputy Speaker, I rise to Order. I wish to ask you whether, a Motion having been made after 12 o'clock, and objection having been taken, it is possible to have any further discussion.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Not if the hon. Member persists in his objection. Occasionally hon. Members waive their objections.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON: On the point of Order I wish to ask—

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: There is no doubt that if the objection is pressed, the debate cannot be proceeded with.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I would point out to my hon. Friend (Mr. Conybeare), that if he wishes to discuss anything, he can do so on the Motion for Adjournment to-morrow.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerstone): May I ask why the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) has made the Motion to-day instead of to-morrow?

MR. W. H. SMITH: It was represented to me by hon. Members on both sides of the House that it would be for the convenience of the House that I should make the Motion now. As far as I am concerned, I have no other object whatever in making the proposal. I must come down to the Morning Sitting, and so must my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary (Mr. Matthews) to take part in the debate on the Employers' Liability Bill. It has been suggested to me that if the Motion is taken at the Morning Sitting instead of now, it must be put down first, and, therefore, must delay the debate on the Employers' Liability Bill. Of course, it is quite within the right of the hon. Member (Mr. Conybeare) to object.

MR. CREMER: Under the circumstances, and after the satisfactory explanation just given by the First Lord of the Treasury, I hope my hon. Friend will withdraw his objection.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON: On the question of Order, I have to ask you, Sir, this question. It having been represented to us that, if this objection is pressed, the question that must necessarily come on first will be the Question of Adjournment, and it having been decided by the House a few moments ago, that the first question otherwise to be taken should be the second reading of the Employers' Liability Act, I wish—

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Is that really a point of Order, Sir?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member for the Camborne

Division (Mr. Conybeare) press his objection?

MR. CONYBEARE: Yes, Sir; I object.

Question not put.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Ordered, That Standing Orders 39 and 129 be suspended, and that the time for depositing Petitions against Private Bills, or against any Bill to confirm any Provisional Order, or Provisional Certificate, and for depositing duplicates of any Documents relating to any Bill to confirm any Provisional Order, or Provisional Certificate, be extended to Thursday, 31st May. —(The Chairman of Ways and Means.)

ULSTER AND TYRONE NAVIGATION BILL

[Lords].

Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Macartney, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, and Colonel Sanderson nominated Members of the Select Committee (with Three Members to be added by the Committee of Selection).

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES) (SPECIAL REPORT)

Ordered, That the Committee of Selection have leave to make a Special Report.

SIR JOHN MOWBRAY accordingly reported from the Committee of Selection: That they had discharged the following Member from the Standing Committee on Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure, in respect of the Bail (Scotland) Bill: Mr. Haldane; and had appointed in substitution: Mr. Macdonald Cameron.

Ordered, That the Report do lie upon the Table.

MOTIONS.

—o—

COURT OF SESSION AND BILL CHAMBER (SCOTLAND) (CLERKS) BILL.

On Motion of The Lord Advocate, Bill to regulate the number and duties of the Clerks of the Court of Session and Bill Chamber in Scotland; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by The Lord Advocate and Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 269.]

TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION BILL.

On Motion of Sir William Hart Dyke, Bill for the promotion of Technical Instruction, ordered to be brought in by Sir William Hart Dyke and Mr. Jackson.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 270.]

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock.

Mr. Buchanan

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 18th May, 1888.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL—Second Reading— Employers' Liability for Injuries to Workmen [145].

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS—*Ordered—First
Reading*—Local Government (No. 8) * [271]; Local Government (Poor Law) (No. 7) *
[272].

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, owing to the continuance of his indisposition:—

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

QUESTIONS.

LABOURERS' (IRELAND) ACTS—BANDON BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many labourers' cottages have been built in the Bandon Union district by the Bandon Board of Guardians; whether it is a fact that 220 cottages have been applied for in the Union, and 147 authorized by the Local Government Board; whether £449 10s. 9d. has been already incurred as preliminary expenses; and, what steps will be taken by the Local Government Board to enforce the erection of labourers' cottages by the Bandon Board of Guardians?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Clerk of Bandon Union reports that 13 labourers' cottages have been completed, and 14 are in course of erection. It is the case that 220 cottages have been applied for. The number authorized by the Local Government Board was 133. Preliminary expenses to the amount of £449 10s. 9d. were incurred up to the 31st of March, 1887. The Guardians were precluded from entering into possession of the lands for the purposes of these cottages until they had taken the usual arbitration proceedings, or had received the consents of the parties interested. The clerk states that the arbitrator's award was not made until December last. The Guardians thereupon took the necessary steps for the erection of the cottages, and are expediting the matter as far as possible.

DR. TANNER asked, if it was not the fact that the Earl of Bandon was Chairman of the Board of Guardians, and that the Board had done everything in their power to prevent the erection of labourers' cottages; and whether the right hon. Gentleman would communicate with the Local Government Board and the Board of Guardians, in order to expedite the erection of these cottages?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he was afraid he could not answer the further Question. If the hon. Gentleman would put it on the Paper he would answer it.

FISHERY PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—ROSSCARBERY PIER.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether his attention has been directed to a series of Resolutions, passed by a large and representative meeting of the inhabitants of Rosscarbery, under the presidency of the Very Rev. P. Hill, P.P., V.F., condemning the new pier, and stating that it is, in its present condition, useless for any purpose, and that the repairs lately executed by the Board of Works were more injurious than serviceable to navigation; whether a Resolution, condemning the work as useless, was passed at a meeting held on the 30th April last, and a copy forwarded to the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant; whether, moreover, a statement, pointing out the defects of the works, was forwarded on the 6th of February, 1887, to the Fisheries Commission, to Sir Thomas Brady, who, in turn, forwarded it to the Lord Lieutenant on the 11th of November, 1887; and, whether steps will be taken to get the dock levelled to what was originally specified, and that an independent Inspector will be appointed to examine the works as executed, and the value and feasibility of the local remedial suggestions?

THE SECRETARY (MR. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): I regret that I have been unable to obtain the materials for a complete answer to this Question; but

MR. ANDERSON said, that the discussion was not over, and he repeated that it was in the midst of the discussion on emigration that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate left the House.

MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne) rose to a point of Order. He wished to ask if these personal arguments were relevant?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have not yet been able to see what they are leading up to.

MR. ANDERSON said, he did not think it right that Scotland only should be left entirely unrepresented in that House, and that was what his observations were leading to. It was a complaint which the Scotch Members had to make every day. [Cries of "Oh!"] Yes; every day there was the greatest possible difficulty in obtaining information when the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate was present; and in the middle of the debate upon emigration last night the right hon. and learned Gentleman left the House, and did not return, leaving important Questions which were asked by the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) and himself unanswered. Not only did the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate not appear, but he believed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not even take part in the Division.

SIR EDWARD CLARKE said, his right hon. and learned Friend certainly stayed until the close of the debate, and then left, having paired for the Division.

MR. ANDERSON said, that might have been the case; but he believed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman took no part in the Division on the Emigration Question. If the hon. and learned Solicitor General (Sir Edward Clarke) would look at the Division List, he did not think he would find the name of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate upon it, nor did the right hon. and learned Gentleman appear in the House subsequent to a few minutes before 8 o'clock. He did not think it was fair that upon an important question of that kind the only single Representative of the Government should retire from the House and leave nobody to answer Questions or give information. Yet, that morning, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer ventured to apologize, and explained the absence of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate on the ground that no Notice had been given that it was intended to discuss Scotch questions on that day. Now, he had come down there that day for the purpose of asking several Questions in regard to the Scotch officials. He knew that the opportunity might arise for discussing it, and he wanted to know when the Government were going to introduce their Bill as to the Scotch Fishery Board? There were various other things upon which he desired to obtain information; but it was impossible to do so. He found, on looking over the Division List, that he was quite right in the assertion he had made, for the name of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate did not appear in it. That justified the complaint he had made that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had left the House at an early hour. He (Mr. Anderson) looked upon it as an extraordinary instance of the contemptuous manner in which the Government treated Scotch interests, and he thought he was fully justified in what he had said just now, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer's apology for the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate was not founded upon fact. If the right hon. Gentleman had known that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had gone away to Edinburgh at 8 o'clock in the evening, he would not have attempted to make an apology. The hon. and learned Solicitor General appeared now to be the only Member of the Government who was prepared to deal with Scotch matters. He trusted that the hon. and learned Gentleman would answer the Question when the Bill in regard to the Scotch Fishery Board would be introduced, and whether the Government had decided upon adopting the suggestions which the Scotch Fishery Board made in their Report last year? He also wished to know whether the Government were ready to deal with the question of salmon fishing on the Eastern Coast of Scotland within the three-mile limit? He had put a Question to the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate as to whether fishermen who took salmon one mile from low water mark had a right to land the fish? But the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had refused to answer the Question, because he said it was one of law. Nevertheless the question was one of great importance, and he thought the Government were trifling with the House when they failed to have any Representative of the Scotch Executive in attendance.

MR. ADDISON said, he could not complain that the hon. and learned Member had displayed more warmth on this question than on any other; but he must complain that the hon. and learned Member had been wanting in courtesy and consideration to the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, who belonged to the same Profession as himself, and was an eminent member of it. Sitting, as he (Mr. Addison) did, behind the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, he had had the opportunity of knowing the great attention he paid to Scotch Business, and he was very much astonished at the observations which had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Elgin and Nairn (Mr. Anderson). The hon. and learned Member had dealt with a number of questions, which, if he might venture to say so, were of extremely trivial importance. Surely it was absurd to ask the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate in the House of Commons how salmon were to be caught, and where they were to be landed? Such a Question was hardly one which could be seriously put. Of this he was sure, that if the hon. and learned Member had really any serious Questions to put to the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, he ought, in common courtesy, to have given Notice to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that he had such intention. Throughout the remarks he had made he had evaded that point, and made no pretence that he had given Notice to the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate of his desire to obtain information.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question, "That the Question be now put," put, and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, and agreed to.

Resolved, That this House, at its rising this day, do adjourn till Thursday 31st May.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO WORKMEN BILL.

(Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Forwood.)

[BILL 145.] SECOND READING.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [17th May], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck) said, he should not have persisted in moving the adjournment of the debate last night if he had not been anxious to emphasize the protest made by his hon. Friend the Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) against the undue haste with which it had been attempted to force an important Bill of this character through a second reading. He regretted very much that he and those who acted with him should have considered it their duty to have taken such a course, inasmuch as it might seem that they were ungrateful both to the occupant of the Chair and the very hard working officials of the House in standing for a short time between them and the holiday they had so justly earned and were so fairly entitled to. However, it was impossible not to feel that two hours and 20 minutes, the time that had been allowed for the discussion of the second reading of a Bill of such importance, was certainly not adequate to expect justice to be done to the provisions of the Bill. He knew it had been said already in the course of the debate that the Bill now before the House was in many respects a decided improvement upon the Employers' Liability Act as it now stood. Generally speaking, he was quite willing to admit that the Bill was in some respects an improvement upon the present law; but viewed from the workmen's point of view, he hoped he might be pardoned if he said that it was not so generally satisfactory to them as the Bill which stood in the name of his hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), and for two very obvious reasons. The Act of 1880 had always, in the opinion of the workmen, possessed two very objectionable features. In the first place it endorsed to some extent the doctrine of common employment as laid down by the Judges, and in the second place it permitted employers and workmen to contract themselves out of the provisions of the Act, or rather he ought to say, it permitted the employers to persuade their workmen, and in many instances to coerce their workmen, into contracting themselves out of the provisions of that Act. Now both of these objectionable features, although he was bound to admit they were in a modified form, were still contained in the Bill now before the House; whereas in the Bill of the hon. Member for Morpeth, both of these objectionable features were conspicuous by their absence. With regard to the question of common employment, he must frankly confess that it was a most difficult problem, and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) might be forgiven for not having attempted to solve it, considering all the difficulties with which it was beset. He was aware that it was exceedingly hard to make an employer responsible to pay compensation for the carelessness and negligence of a fellow workman; but, on the other hand, it was equally hard that a workman should have to suffer and be permanently injured on account of the carelessness and incapacity of an unskilled labourer. On both sides of the question it would be found that there was an equal hardship, and it might well be questioned whether there would be a greater hardship endured by the employer if the doctrine of common employment was abolished than was now endured on the part of the workmen. He frankly confessed that he himself had some hesitation in facing this question of common employment, and he should preserve an open mind upon it. When the Bill came up for discussion in Committee—if it did come before a Committee—in that House, or if he had an opportunity of considering it in detail, he should reserve to himself perfect liberty of action as to the course he should take in reference to the question of common employment. With regard to the other principle of the Bill—namely, that of permitting employers and workmen to make an arrangement by mutual contract, he desired to offer to it his most strenuous and unqualified protest. Either the main principle of the Bill was desirable, or it was not. If they were satisfied in their mind that it was just and equitable that an employer should be made responsible for compensation for an accident that arose from traceable and culpable negligence on his part, or on the part of some one to whom he had entrusted his authority, then he maintained that if they were convinced in their own mind of the soundness of that principle they ought to be prepared to make their legislation uniform in its application. Considering all the mischief that had hitherto arisen from permissible legislation, and notably the legislation in reference to the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1875, together with the knowledge they had gained from experience in the working of the Employers' Liability Act of 1880, he thought they would be well advised if they made the principle of this Bill uniform in its application. But then he was told that it was undesirable to interfere with existing arrangements, and also with what was termed freedom of contract. It ought not to be forgotten, however, that the Act of 1880 interfered with arrangements that were existing at that time, and he should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary whether there had been any one made to suffer by the interference that Act necessitated? The Report of a Select Committee of 1883 showed that that Act had operated in the main to the advantage of both employers and employed. Not a single employer had been unduly harassed by the interference which the provisions of the Act of 1880 entailed. He was willing to admit that the doctrine of freedom of contract sounded very well. Hon. Gentlemen who sat on that side of the House professed to have a great regard for freedom and an anxious desire to preserve freedom of contract. He admitted that that doctrine had a most euphonious sound, but how did it operate in fact. What freedom was there in contract if on the one hand they had wealth and intelligence combined with a power of granting or refusing employment; and, on the other, as was too often the case, they had ignorance and poverty combined with pressing and urgent necessity, compelling the workmen in too many cases, he was sorry to say, even to sell their birthrights for the merest mess of pottage that might be offered to them. To speak of freedom of contract in cases such as that was simply absurd. He might be told that the Government had attempted to deal with such cases; that they had endeavoured to prevent the employers of labour from taking advantage of the poverty of the employed, by declaring that contracts should be void except under certain conditions. But how did they propose to determine whether the conditions were good or otherwise. How did they propose to arrive at such knowledge? How did they propose to arrive at an understanding whether the undertaking of the employer was sufficient to meet the requirements of the case? In Sub-section 4 of Clause 3 it was proposed that if a question arose as to whether an employer had satisfactorily provided for his employés, that evidence of a similar undertaking, under similar circumstances, should be admissible as evidence of the adequacy or otherwise of the undertaking. That was to say, that if a question arose as to whether the employer had adequately provided for the requirements of his workmen—say, for instance, in a district like South-West Lancashire, where there were from 28,000 to 30,000 miners, who had been forced, as a condition of being retained, to surrender their rights under the Act of 1880. It would, in that case, be perfectly competent for any one of the South-West Lancashire employers to cite the case of other employers who had taken a similar course with their workmen, and it would be admissible as evidence of the sufficiency of the undertaking made on the part of the employers with their workmen. Now he did not possess any legal knowledge, but he should certainly be very much surprised if any legal Member of that House would rise in his place and declare that Sub-section 4 of Clause 3, as it was now proposed, was in accordance with the law of evidence as it was understood in this country. What Judge could they get in this country who would allow to be used in a case evidence that had been submitted in a similar case, under similar circumstances, at another time. It might be regarded as a sound argument by a lawyer in defending the case of his client, but he ventured to submit to the House that there was no single Court of Justice in the country in which the Judge would allow a reference to a case of that kind to be admitted as evidence. Yet that was what was proposed in Sub-section 4 of Clause 3. It was proposed that evidence of an undertaking under similar circumstances, and in similar employment, should be admissible as evidence of the sufficiency of the undertaking. He maintained that such a proposal as that was most absurd. Then, again, in Sub-section 5 of Clause 3, the proposal made by the Government was, to his mind, equally absurd, if not, indeed, more so. It was proposed that if a dispute arose as to the sufficiency of an undertaking, either in the case of a miner or of an operative in a factory or workshop, an appeal might be made to one of Her Majesty's Secretaries of State, or, in regard to other employments, to the Board of Trade, who should have power to decide whether the undertaking was sufficient or not. The subject, which was really referred to one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State or the Board of Trade, was not merely the nature of a contract. It was proposed to refer for their consideration a fact as to whether any such proposal had been made or not. [Mr. MATTHEWS dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary shook his head. The sub-section said—

“On the application of a workman in any coal mine, metalliferous mine, factory, or workshop, or of his employer, one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, and on the application of a workman in any other employment, or of his employer, the Board of Trade, may consider and decide whether a contract made or proposed to be made between the workman and his employer whereby the workman deprives himself of any right under this Act, is made, or proposed to be made, on such consideration as in this section mentioned, and if the Secretary of State or Board of Trade decide and certify that the contract is so made, or is proposed to be so made, then not only that contract, but contracts in similar terms with other workmen engaged under the same employer or his successor in business and in a similar employment under similar circumstances, shall, without further proof, be deemed to have been made on such consideration as in this section mentioned.”

And then, when the decision had been given by the Secretary of State or by some responsible Minister connected with the Board of Trade, the decision was to be upheld not merely in the case in question, but every other similar case in which the same employers were concerned. No matter whether the case arose in South Wales or in the North of England—it was well known that an employer might be an employer of labour in the North of England and also an employer of labour in South Wales; that he might have collieries both in Northumberland and South Wales—this clause proposed that a decision arrived at in reference to a case which occurred in South Wales could be held to apply to a case which occurred under similar circumstances in the North of England. Such a proposal as that, to his mind, was simply ridiculous, and he hoped that when the Bill came to be considered in detail some steps would be taken to remedy the mischief which might be done by these two sub-sections, or to expunge them entirely from the Bill. With regard to the amount of compensation allowed under the Bill, he would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary whether he really believed that £150 was a sufficient limit to insert in the measure, and whether, having due regard to all the circumstances, it would not be infinitely better to leave the question of the amount entirely in the hands of the Judge, making the fixing of the amount a perfectly free and open question? In that case, the amount awarded might be more or it might be less than £150. They, on that side of the House, representing as they did the working classes, were perfectly willing that the question should be left open to be decided according to all the circumstances of the case. Then, again, with respect to the time of notice of action. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary whether there was really any necessity that the workman should be compelled to serve a notice upon his employer that he intended to bring an action? He entirely concurred in the remarks that were made by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for York (Mr. Lockwood) in the debate which took place last night. He did not see any necessity why notice should be given; and he thought it would be found that in 99 cases out of 100 that the employer was in such close touch with the work that he was perfectly and instantly aware of the smallest accident. He would undoubtedly be made immediately aware of it by those who exercised authority under him, and he did not think it was essential, therefore, that they could insist upon this provision of the Bill that notice should be given. However, he would not trouble the House at that stage with any more lengthened remarks; but he sincerely hoped that the principle of contracting out of the Bill would, after full and proper consideration, be either so modified as to reduce the amount of contracting out to a minimum, or be ultimately expunged from the Bill. For his own part, he should prefer that the power of contracting out of the Act should be entirely withdrawn. He thanked the House for its attention, and must apologize for having detained it so long; but before he sat down he would express a hope that the Government would take into serious consideration the desirability of referring the Bill not to the Committee on Trade, but to the Committee on Law, who were, he thought, more fit and competent to deal with the question. He said that with all the more confidence because he did not happen himself to be a Member of that Committee; but he did think that the legal Members of the House were the best qualified to deal with the question, and he, therefore, hoped the House would see their way to refer the Bill to the Committee on Law instead of the Committee on Trade.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, he congratulated the House on the tone and temper with which the Bill had been discussed by those who were, more or less, representatively interested, and upon the absence of Party spirit which had generally characterized the debate. He entertained strong hopes that the Bill might be so shaped as to be satisfactory both to employers and employed. With regard to the question of compensation, he would not then say anything as to what was the proper amount to which it should be limited; but he would ask the hon. Members opposite who objected to any limitation of the amount of compensation to remember that, whatever scale was fixed upon, the compensation would be a burden upon the industry itself. If an employer knew that for an accident, for which he was vicariously responsible, he was liable to have to pay a money penalty, he would provide for it in some way or other, either by insuring or by setting apart a reserve fund to provide for such contingencies. The hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division of Northumberland (Mr. Fenwick) was not ignorant of the fact that the provision of a fund to meet the liabilities under the present Act must be a charge on the industry itself; and in view of these considerations, and also of the fact that the margin out of which profits were made was now extremely small, an undue sum should not be fixed for compensation, as it would diminish the fund out of which wages were to be paid, and would thereby be injurious to the workmen in whose interest the Bill had been introduced. He thought the clause in regard to superintendence would require the careful attention of the Committee to which the Bill was to be referred. He was quite aware of the great difficulty of framing a satisfactory definition; but it was quite obvious that the word "superintendence" might be so construed as to apply to the case of a few workmen employed on a common work, one of whom was placed in the position of a quasi-foreman, and, in effect, to do away almost entirely with the doctrine of common employment. When hon. Members talked about the injustice of compensation being obtained in one case and not in another, it must not be lost sight of that the man to whose carelessness the accident was really due went scot-free, and would probably not be allowed by the Trades Union even to be dismissed by the employer who had to pay the penalty. In no part of the House would this matter be considered, he hoped, as if there were any real antagonism between the employers and the employed; if such an idea were entertained anywhere, it was because their mutual interests were not properly understood. As to the power of contracting themselves out of the Act, the hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division of Northumberland (Mr. Fenwick) said that about 30,000 miners in South-West Lancashire had been forced to take that course.

MR. FENWICK asked, if it was not the fact that it was made a condition of the engagement of the men in certain collieries that they should surrender all their rights under the Act of 1880?

MR. TOMLINSON said, that so far as he was acquainted with the facts, the men were free to take the privileges of the Act or the benefits of the Permanent Relief Society, and with the obvious fact before them, in the latter alternative, that the cost of litigation was saved, the Permanent Relief Society was largely preferred. In one case, where the employers determined to leave the men absolutely free, the men themselves met together and decided unanimously to request the employers to put them on the Permanent Society. Certainly, they could not be under the Act and have the advantage of the local relief society as well. In one part of Lancashire, very few of the colliers desired to claim to be under the provisions of the Act; though it was quite true that in another part of Lancashire a different view prevailed, but the idea of compulsion was a myth.

MR. FENWICK said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had not answered his question as to whether it was made a condition of the hiring of workmen that they should surrender any claim they had under the Act of 1880?

MR. TOMLINSON said, that in his view it was not a question of conditions of employment. No person could have the benefit of the Permanent Relief Society and still remain under the Act. He wished to disabuse the mind of the hon. Member that it was in the interests of the employer that the maintenance of the Permanent Relief Society was desired. It was both easier and less expensive for the employer to allow the Act to remain in force. But when it was mutually felt that greater advantage resulted from providing against all accidents by a permanent fund than by the uncertain operation of the Act, he considered that in the interest of the workman he should be allowed to enter into contracts excluding the Act.

MR. GULLY (Carlisle) said, he did not intend to enter into the vexed question of common employment. He desired simply to call attention to that part of the Bill which for the first time proposed to extend to seamen and shipowners the provisions of the Employers' Liability Act of 1880. The proposal of the Government was that the Employers' Liability Act should extend to cases of personal injury to seamen in the course of their employment, unless the accident occurred elsewhere than in a port of the United Kingdom, in which case the employer was not to be liable to pay compensation for injury, unless the injury was caused by some defect in the body, machinery, or tackle of the ship at the time when she last proceeded to sea from a port in the United Kingdom, and the default arose from the negligence of the owner or any person entrusted by him with the control of the ship. There were only two criticisms which he desired to offer in regard to that section of the Bill. Of course, it was obvious that a very large class of cases in which personal injury was sustained occurred while the ship was away from a port in the United Kingdom, and therefore the question of the liability of the ship-owner for injuries of that kind was a very large question. He should be sorry to see it limited to the extent to which it was limited by this action. He only wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) to the point, in the hope that before the Bill went into Committee the scheme might be modified somewhat in favour of the seaman. He had pointed out that the employer was not to be liable for accident which occurred outside a port of the United Kingdom unless there was some defect in the condition of the ship. Now, there was a very large class of cases also in which injury was sustained from the careless loading or overloading of the ship, and such cases were not covered by the section, as it stood, at all. He presumed the intention of the Government was by these words to include cases of careless loading, but that there had been some omission or mistake in the drafting, the proper words not having been used to express their intention. If they did not intend to include cases of careless loading, all he could say was that the clause was much more objectionable than he had thought it was, for that was the class of cases that ought, above all others, to be included in the Act. Either the Government meant it, or they did not. If they did, then he thought that the defects in the section, as it stood, might very easily be altered by adding the words "or loading," after the word condition. Another objection he had to the Bill was that it made it a condition to the liability of the owner for any negligence on his part in permitting a vessel to be in a dangerous condition, causing death or injury to a seaman, that the bad condition of the ship must have existed at the time when the ship last proceeded to sea from a port in the United Kingdom. Say, a vessel was proceeding from London to China or the Cape by way of the Suez Canal; suppose, after she left London well provided with anchors, she anchored during stress of weather and lost all her anchors but one, and that she afterwards put in to Brest or Lisbon, where she might refit and obtain new anchors, but that the captain negligently did not obtain them, and continued his voyage without the proper complement of anchors, and that, as a consequence, meeting with bad weather again, the ship was lost, and her crew were drowned. Under the clause, as it was drawn, the owner would not be liable, and that, he submitted, was not as it should be. The captain, no doubt, was a fellow-servant, but he was the fellow-servant who was vested with the largest authority, and who came nearest to the position of an employer himself, because he was entrusted with the care of all the interests of the employer. Under the section of the Bill as it stood, as he (Mr. Gully) had endeavoured to point out, the greatest negligence of the master, provided it occurred at some place other than a port in the United Kingdom, was negligence for which the owner was not to be held responsible, and that seemed to him altogether contrary to the spirit of the Employers' Liability Act. As a matter of fact, the section said this—"If you, the master, allow your ship to leave the United Kingdom in a defective condition, and if, in consequence of that, injury happens to a seaman, you shall be liable." Well, they scarcely required an Employers' Liability Act for that purpose, for if it was brought to the personal knowledge of an owner that his ship was in a defective condition, or that he had not procured the necessary appliances to work the ship efficiently, he would be liable at Common Law; therefore, the Bill was almost illusory as regarded the liability of the owner of a vessel for that class of accidents. He would suggest that the words of the section should be altered so as to make the owner of a vessel liable for an injury happening to a seaman by reason of the negligence of the master in not providing proper appliances for the safety of the men on board, although that negligence happened outside the United Kingdom,

Mr. Gully

If a master failed to supply a vessel with proper and needful appliances at any place where he had the opportunity of supplying them, and accident took place in consequence, the owner should be held responsible. He admitted that there was an attempt made in the Act to give, to a certain extent, the benefit of the Employers' Liability Act to seamen as regarded accidents in ports of the United Kingdom, and, no doubt, a very large percentage of the accidents which happened to seamen did take place in port during the process of loading and unloading. But while the measure gave some extension of benefit to seamen in respect of that class of accident, he submitted that it entirely failed to deal fairly with seamen in respect of another very large class of accidents which happened outside the ports of the United Kingdom.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, he thought that the bulk of the comments which arose on this question might more properly be urged in the discussions in Committee on the Bill; but as the measure, they were told, would be sent to a Grand Committee, and a large number of hon. Members interested in the question would not have seats on that Committee, there was a desire to express opinions during the second reading stage which otherwise might not have been raised at all. There was only one question of principle, so far as he knew, involved in the discussion which would arise on the Motion, and that was the question whether or not contracting out of the Act should be forbidden. That was the whole question upon which there was difference of principle. All the rest, he thought, would turn out to be difference of detail; and he was bound to say that if that question of principle were decided in favour of the view taken by the Government, and which also, by the casting vote of Lord Brassey, was taken by the Select Committee, of which he (Mr. Bradlaugh) was a Member—namely, that there was to be contracting out of the Act, then he thought it was only just for the Government to say that they had tried to frame as fair a Bill as was possible in view of the very difficult questions that arose. ["Oh!"] Well, he thought so, and he would explain why. There was one phrase which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary which he hoped that right hon. Gentleman would modify, if he offered any words in reply. The right hon. Gentleman drew attention to the large number of actions which had arisen in consequence of the Employers' Liability Act of 1880, and he pointed out that only 38 per cent of those actions had succeeded, and that in 42 per cent of the failures the employers had had to pay the costs. Now, he did not wonder that, with all the work the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had to do, he had not been able to have all the evidence taken before the Committee quite so much in his mind as he (Mr. Bradlaugh) had. He (Mr. Bradlaugh) himself had attended every Sitting of the Committee, had been present, he thought, at every minute of its sittings, and had conducted the bulk of the examination-in-chief until they came to that portion of the Bill which dealt with seamen, of which he had no knowledge; and he begged to say that the evidence was conclusive, both from professional witnesses, employers, and employed, that whatever the total number of accidents might be, it was exceedingly small, as a matter of percentage, compared with the large works and large number of men employed, and the matters arising in connection with those works. The percentage of cost in the matter of litigation was small; and nearly every employer, in answer to the question which Sir Thomas—now Lord Brassey put to everyone, said it was so small as not to be worth reckoning in connection with the business. There was no kind of evidence that litigation had increased to any great extent, or that there was any tendency to an increase. As to the actions which had failed, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, who put the number down at 42 per cent, had already been reminded by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for York (Mr. Lockwood) that many of them arose on the question of notice. There was one case which had not been referred to in that House, which was before the Courts only a little while ago, and which showed the monstrous character—and he thought he might use that word—of the objections sometimes taken on the part of employers. The name of the case he might mention, as it was not one in which an individual employer was concerned. It was that of "Beckett against the Corporation of Manchester." The man gave notice in proper time, but not to the proper officer. He gave it to the surveyor from whom he was in the habit of receiving his instructions from the Corporation; but that was the wrong officer, and the result was that the man was nonsuited and ruined. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had been exceedingly hurried by the way in which the debate went last night, and, therefore, had not dealt with as many points as he otherwise might have done; but he (Mr. Bradlaugh) trusted that he would say something to-day to show that he recognized on the part of the men the difficulty pointed out as to giving notice. He (Mr. Bradlaugh) quite agreed that in the Bill, as proposed, there was a clause which would meet such a case as that of Beckett if it occurred again, and would provide that the want or insufficiency of notice should not be a bar to the maintenance of an action if the Court before whom the case was tried, or the Court of Appeal, should be of opinion that there was reasonable excuse for the want or insufficiency. He would put this to the Government—if a certain man had a legal right, why should they put upon him a duty and obligation as to notice in making good that right which they did not put on litigants in actions at Common Law? In the case of an ordinary member of the public having a claim for damages in respect of injuries received, he could bring his action at any period within the Statute of Limitations; and in the case of a workman, if he had a right, why did they burden him with restrictions which, as the case referred to proved, at times prevented him from obtaining any remedy? The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary might say—"We have put Subsection 6 to Section 4, to meet every case that can be raised." Well, he did not wish to put the matter unfairly, but he did desire the right hon. Gentleman to appreciate what was passing through the minds of many of those who were arguing against him. The hon. Gentleman the Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) made a strange mistake last night. The hon. Member had put it very strongly when he said that human life was worth more than £150, and that that was all the compensation that the Bill would give. He (Mr. Bradlaugh) did not understand that the Bill limited the amount of damage to be recovered to £150. What the Bill did was to recognize what the Committee felt—namely, that there were a number of cases in which the compensation estimated on a three years' earnings would not be adequate; as, for instance, in the case of a grown man, who had not long escaped from his apprenticeship, and, therefore, was receiving a very low wage. There were cases in which a man would have received a much larger compensation than £150, on the principle of three years' computation if an accident had occurred a week later, when he was receiving a larger wage; but, after all, this question of amount of compensation was purely a matter for Committee. If he were a Member of the Grand Committee, he should try to increase that sum; but, as he said, the matter was clearly one of detail, on which he had no right to detain the House for a longer period than was necessary just to draw attention to the point. He was at variance with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson), who had just addressed the House, on one point. He understood the hon. and learned Member to say, first, that there was no inducement held out to the men to contract out of the Act, and, next, that contracting out of the Act was not made a condition of hiring. He (Mr. Bradlaugh) thought that the Committee had had several printed contracts placed before them, in which the men were obliged, as a condition of the hiring, to consent to contracting themselves out of the Act. He had thought they had called half-a-dozen witnesses who produced the contracts from the places in which they were employed. He would not weary the House by going at any length into the question, because this, again, was a matter which they could deal with better when it came before them in Committee. He had thought, however, that the evidence was overwhelming, and that with regard to Lancashire they had had express evidence given by one of the representatives of a Miners' Association to the effect that great pressure was put upon the men to coerce them into contracting themselves out of the benefits of the existing Act, and that this witness estimated that between 28,000 and 30,000 men were treated in this way. The hon. Member asked how these Returns were obtained? The Returns were obtained from South-West Lancashire, and it was shown that all the colliery firms there, with the exception of that with which the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Blundell) was associated, contracted out of the Act. A number of men produced the conditions of hiring, which were affixed to the pit's mouth, and without signing these conditions contracting himself out of the Act, they were told no man was allowed to descend the pit. It might be said that that was not coercion. He would put what it was from the evidence of Lord Dudley's agent, and would not use his own language, except so far as he aided the witness in examining him. Lord Dudley's agent, when examined before the Committee, urged that contracting ought not to be touched, because the employer and the employed were on equal terms in bargaining and ought to be left free.

Mr. Bradlaugh

Mr. TOMLINSON said, that what he had meant to convey was, that in Lancashire the system of the Permanent Relief Society, where it prevailed, was assented to by masters and men.

Mr. BRADLAUGH said, his view of the evidence was that a contract laying down certain conditions was drawn up by the solicitor to the employers or their association, and that no man was allowed to go down the pit until he had accepted those conditions. He had put it to the agent of Lord Dudley whether he thought that a man who had no means of subsistence except the sale of his labour, and who had no means of employment save the particular one he was seeking to enter into under the contract, was in as good a position to make a bargain as the employer with whom he contracted, and the witness replied that he thought he was. He (Mr. Bradlaugh) had then put it to the witness that taking a man who had no means of subsistence whatever, save the employment he was seeking, with a wife and children depending on him, whether he thought that the mere consideration of the man entering the employment should be sufficient to relieve the employer of all liability under the Act, and the answer was in the affirmative—that it was right to require a man to contract himself out of the Act, although if he refused he would have to go away and starve. He (Mr. Bradlaugh) remembered the astonishment depicted on the countenance of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Preston when this witness gave his evidence.

Mr. TOMLINSON: I said nothing about the condition of things at Dudley. I only spoke about South-West Lancashire.

Mr. BRADLAUGH: I thought the hon. and learned Member contended that coercion was a myth.

Mr. TOMLINSON: Yes; in South-West Lancashire.

Mr. BRADLAUGH said, he was in a difficulty here, seemingly, for, with regard to Lancashire, the Committee had the express evidence given by one of the representatives of the miners' associations that great pressure was put upon the men to deprive them of the benefit of the Act; and they also had the statement that, with the exception of one Company—namely, the Company with which the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Blundell) was associated—the whole of the colliery proprietors of South-West Lancashire contracted out of the Act. He had himself produced a printed form of contract which was posted up at the mouth of the pit, and to which the colliers were required to assent before they were allowed to go down the pit. He was only going by the evidence. That might be quite wrong; but the hon. and learned Member for Preston had exercised, as he (Mr. Bradlaugh) had done, considerable latitude of examination, and he was sure, if there had been anything incorrect, they would have had the advantage of the skilled knowledge of the hon. and learned Gentleman in bringing it out. He did not suggest that there was anything but the fullest desire to arrive at the truth, and, having arrived at it, the great desire of every Member of the Committee was to frame the best recommendation they could as to what they all admitted was an exceedingly difficult problem to solve. There were several matters on which the Government had not adopted the recommendation of the Committee, as to special juries and County Courts and so on; but these were pure matters for Committee, and he would not weary the House now by going into them. There was one point, however, which he must deal with, and

MR. ANDERSON said, that the discussion was not over, and he repeated that it was in the midst of the discussion on emigration that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate left the House.

MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne) rose to a point of Order. He wished to ask if these personal arguments were relevant?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have not yet been able to see what they are leading up to.

MR. ANDERSON said, he did not think it right that Scotland only should be left entirely unrepresented in that House, and that was what his observations were leading to. It was a complaint which the Scotch Members had to make every day. [Cries of "Oh!"] Yes; every day there was the greatest possible difficulty in obtaining information when the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate was present; and in the middle of the debate upon emigration last night the right hon. and learned Gentleman left the House, and did not return, leaving important Questions which were asked by the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) and himself unanswered. Not only did the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate not appear, but he believed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not even take part in the Division.

SIR EDWARD CLARKE said, his right hon. and learned Friend certainly stayed until the close of the debate, and then left, having paired for the Division.

MR. ANDERSON said, that might have been the case; but he believed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman took no part in the Division on the Emigration Question. If the hon. and learned Solicitor General (Sir Edward Clarke) would look at the Division List, he did not think he would find the name of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate upon it, nor did the right hon. and learned Gentleman appear in the House subsequent to a few minutes before 8 o'clock. He did not think it was fair that upon an important question of that kind the only single Representative of the Government should retire from the House and leave nobody to answer Questions or give information. Yet, that morning, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer ventured to apologize, and explained the absence of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate on the ground that no Notice had been given that it was intended to discuss Scotch questions on that day. Now, he had come down there that day for the purpose of asking several Questions in regard to the Scotch officials. He knew that the opportunity might arise for discussing it, and he wanted to know when the Government were going to introduce their Bill as to the Scotch Fishery Board? There were various other things upon which he desired to obtain information; but it was impossible to do so. He found, on looking over the Division List, that he was quite right in the assertion he had made, for the name of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate did not appear in it. That justified the complaint he had made that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had left the House at an early hour. He (Mr. Anderson) looked upon it as an extraordinary instance of the contemptuous manner in which the Government treated Scotch interests, and he thought he was fully justified in what he had said just now, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer's apology for the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate was not founded upon fact. If the right hon. Gentleman had known that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had gone away to Edinburgh at 8 o'clock in the evening, he would not have attempted to make an apology. The hon. and learned Solicitor General appeared now to be the only Member of the Government who was prepared to deal with Scotch matters. He trusted that the hon. and learned Gentleman would answer the Question when the Bill in regard to the Scotch Fishery Board would be introduced, and whether the Government had decided upon adopting the suggestions which the Scotch Fishery Board made in their Report last year? He also wished to know whether the Government were ready to deal with the question of salmon fishing on the Eastern Coast of Scotland within the three-mile limit? He had put a Question to the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate as to whether fishermen who took salmon one mile from low water mark had a right to land the fish? But the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had refused to answer the Question, because he said it was one of law. Nevertheless the question was one of great importance, and he thought the Government were trifling with the House when they failed to have any Representative of the Scotch Executive in attendance.

MR. ADDISON said, he could not complain that the hon. and learned Member had displayed more warmth on this question than on any other; but he must complain that the hon. and learned Member had been wanting in courtesy and consideration to the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, who belonged to the same Profession as himself, and was an eminent member of it. Sitting, as he (Mr. Addison) did, behind the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, he had had the opportunity of knowing the great attention he paid to Scotch Business, and he was very much astonished at the observations which had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Elgin and Nairn (Mr. Anderson). The hon. and learned Member had dealt with a number of questions, which, if he might venture to say so, were of extremely trivial importance. Surely it was absurd to ask the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate in the House of Commons how salmon were to be caught, and where they were to be landed? Such a Question was hardly one which could be seriously put. Of this he was sure, that if the hon. and learned Member had really any serious Questions to put to the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, he ought, in common courtesy, to have given Notice to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that he had such intention. Throughout the remarks he had made he had evaded that point, and made no pretence that he had given Notice to the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate of his desire to obtain information.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question, "That the Question be now put," put, and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, and agreed to.

Resolved, That this House, at its rising this day, do adjourn till Thursday 31st May.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO WORKMEN BILL.

(Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Forwood.)

[BILL 145.] SECOND READING.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [17th May], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck) said, he should not have persisted in moving the adjournment of the debate last night if he had not been anxious to emphasize the protest made by his hon. Friend the Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) against the undue haste with which it had been attempted to force an important Bill of this character through a second reading. He regretted very much that he and those who acted with him should have considered it their duty to have taken such a course, inasmuch as it might seem that they were ungrateful both to the occupant of the Chair and the very hard working officials of the House in standing for a short time between them and the holiday they had so justly earned and were so fairly entitled to. However, it was impossible not to feel that two hours and 20 minutes, the time that had been allowed for the discussion of the second reading of a Bill of such importance, was certainly not adequate to expect justice to be done to the provisions of the Bill. He knew it had been said already in the course of the debate that the Bill now before the House was in many respects a decided improvement upon the Employers' Liability Act as it now stood. Generally speaking, he was quite willing to admit that the Bill was in some respects an improvement upon the present law; but viewed from the workmen's point of view, he hoped he might be pardoned if he said that it was not so generally satisfactory to them as the Bill which stood in the name of his hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), and for two very obvious reasons. The Act of 1880 had always, in the opinion of the workmen, possessed two very objectionable features. In the first place it endorsed to some extent the doctrine of common employment as laid down by the Judges, and in the second place it permitted employers and workmen to contract themselves out of the provisions of the Act, or rather he ought to say, it permitted the employers to persuade their workmen, and in many instances to coerce their workmen, into contracting themselves out of the provisions of that Act. Now both of these objectionable features, although he was bound to admit they were in a modified form, were still contained in the Bill now before the House; whereas in the Bill of the hon. Member for Morpeth, both of these objectionable features were conspicuous by their absence. With regard to the question of common employment, he must frankly confess that it was a most difficult problem, and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) might be forgiven for not having attempted to solve it, considering all the difficulties with which it was beset. He was aware that it was exceedingly hard to make an employer responsible to pay compensation for the carelessness and negligence of a fellow workman; but, on the other hand, it was equally hard that a workman should have to suffer and be permanently injured on account of the carelessness and incapacity of an unskilled labourer. On both sides of the question it would be found that there was an equal hardship, and it might well be questioned whether there would be a greater hardship endured by the employer if the doctrine of common employment was abolished than was now endured on the part of the workmen. He frankly confessed that he himself had some hesitation in facing this question of common employment, and he should preserve an open mind upon it. When the Bill came up for discussion in Committee—if it did come before a Committee—in that House, or if he had an opportunity of considering it in detail, he should reserve to himself perfect liberty of action as to the course he should take in reference to the question of common employment. With regard to the other principle of the Bill—namely, that of permitting employers and workmen to make an arrangement by mutual contract, he desired to offer to it his most strenuous and unqualified protest. Either the main principle of the Bill was desirable, or it was not. If they were satisfied in their mind that it was just and equitable that an employer should be made responsible for compensation for an accident that arose from traceable and culpable negligence on his part, or on the part of some one to whom he had entrusted his authority, then he maintained that if they were convinced in their own mind of the soundness of that principle they ought to be prepared to make their legislation uniform in its application. Considering all the mischief that had hitherto arisen from permissible legislation, and notably the legislation in reference to the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1875, together with the knowledge they had gained from experience in the working of the Employers' Liability Act of 1880, he thought they would be well advised if they made the principle of this Bill uniform in its application. But then he was told that it was undesirable to interfere with existing arrangements, and also with what was termed freedom of contract. It ought not to be forgotten, however, that the Act of 1880 interfered with arrangements that were existing at that time, and he should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary whether there had been any one made to suffer by the interference that Act necessitated? The Report of a Select Committee of 1883 showed that that Act had operated in the main to the advantage of both employers and employed. Not a single employer had been unduly harassed by the interference which the provisions of the Act of 1880 entailed. He was willing to admit that the doctrine of freedom of contract sounded very well. Hon. Gentlemen who sat on that side of the House professed to have a great regard for freedom and an anxious desire to preserve freedom of contract. He admitted that that doctrine had a most euphonious sound, but how did it operate in fact. What freedom was there in contract if on the one hand they had wealth and intelligence combined with a power of granting or refusing employment; and, on the other, as was too often the case, they had ignorance and poverty combined with pressing and urgent necessity, compelling the workmen in too many cases, he was sorry to say, even to sell their birthrights for the merest mess of pottage that might be offered to them. To speak of freedom of contract in cases such as that was simply absurd. He might be told that the Government had attempted to deal with such cases; that they had endeavoured to prevent the employers of labour from taking advantage of the poverty of the employed, by declaring that contracts should be void except under certain conditions. But how did they propose to determine whether the conditions were good or otherwise. How did they propose to arrive at such knowledge? How did they propose to arrive at an understanding whether the undertaking of the employer was sufficient to meet the requirements of the case? In Sub-section 4 of Clause 3 it was proposed that if a question arose as to whether an employer had satisfactorily provided for his employés, that evidence of a similar undertaking, under similar circumstances, should be admissible as evidence of the adequacy or otherwise of the undertaking. That was to say, that if a question arose as to whether the employer had adequately provided for the requirements of his workmen—say, for instance, in a district like South-West Lancashire, where there were from 28,000 to 30,000 miners, who had been forced, as a condition of being retained, to surrender their rights under the Act of 1880. It would, in that case, be perfectly competent for any one of the South-West Lancashire employers to cite the case of other employers who had taken a similar course with their workmen, and it would be admissible as evidence of the sufficiency of the undertaking made on the part of the employers with their workmen. Now he did not possess any legal knowledge, but he should certainly be very much surprised if any legal Member of that House would rise in his place and declare that Sub-section 4 of Clause 3, as it was now proposed, was in accordance with the law of evidence as it was understood in this country. What Judge could they get in this country who would allow to be used in a case evidence that had been submitted in a similar case, under similar circumstances, at another time. It might be regarded as a sound argument by a lawyer in defending the case of his client, but he ventured to submit to the House that there was no single Court of Justice in the country in which the Judge would allow a reference to a case of that kind to be admitted as evidence. Yet that was what was proposed in Sub-section 4 of Clause 3. It was proposed that evidence of an undertaking under similar circumstances, and in similar employment, should be admissible as evidence of the sufficiency of the undertaking. He maintained that such a proposal as that was most absurd. Then, again, in Sub-section 5 of Clause 3, the proposal made by the Government was, to his mind, equally absurd, if not, indeed, more so. It was proposed that if a dispute arose as to the sufficiency of an undertaking, either in the case of a miner or of an operative in a factory or workshop, an appeal might be made to one of Her Majesty's Secretaries of State, or, in regard to other employments, to the Board of Trade, who should have power to decide whether the undertaking was sufficient or not. The subject, which was really referred to one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State or the Board of Trade, was not merely the nature of a contract. It was proposed to refer for their consideration a fact as to whether any such proposal had been made or not. [Mr. MATTHEWS dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary shook his head. The sub-section said—

“On the application of a workman in any coal mine, metalliferous mine, factory, or workshop, or of his employer, one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, and on the application of a workman in any other employment, or of his employer, the Board of Trade, may consider and decide whether a contract made or proposed to be made between the workman and his employer whereby the workman deprives himself of any right under this Act, is made, or proposed to be made, on such consideration as in this section mentioned, and if the Secretary of State or Board of Trade decide and certify that the contract is so made, or is proposed to be so made, then not only that contract, but contracts in similar terms with other workmen engaged under the same employer or his successor in business and in a similar employment under similar circumstances, shall, without further proof, be deemed to have been made on such consideration as in this section mentioned.”

And then, when the decision had been given by the Secretary of State or by some responsible Minister connected with the Board of Trade, the decision was to be upheld not merely in the case in question, but every other similar case in which the same employers were concerned. No matter whether the case arose in South Wales or in the North of England—it was well known that an employer might be an employer of labour in the North of England and also an employer of labour in South Wales; that he might have collieries both in Northumberland and South Wales—this clause proposed that a decision arrived at in reference to a case which occurred in South Wales could be held to apply to a case which occurred under similar circumstances in the North of England. Such a proposal as that, to his mind, was simply ridiculous, and he hoped that when the Bill came to be considered in detail some steps would be taken to remedy the mischief which might be done by these two sub-sections, or to expunge them entirely from the Bill. With regard to the amount of compensation allowed under the Bill, he would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary whether he really believed that £150 was a sufficient limit to insert in the measure, and whether, having due regard to all the circumstances, it would not be infinitely better to leave the question of the amount entirely in the hands of the Judge, making the fixing of the amount a perfectly free and open question? In that case, the amount awarded might be more or it might be less than £150. They, on that side of the House, representing as they did the working classes, were perfectly willing that the question should be left open to be decided according to all the circumstances of the case. Then, again, with respect to the time of notice of action. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary whether there was really any necessity that the workman should be compelled to serve a notice upon his employer that he intended to bring an action? He entirely concurred in the remarks that were made by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for York (Mr. Lockwood) in the debate which took place last night. He did not see any necessity why notice should be given; and he thought it would be found that in 99 cases out of 100 that the employer was in such close touch with the work that he was perfectly and instantly aware of the smallest accident. He would undoubtedly be made immediately aware of it by those who exercised authority under him, and he did not think it was essential, therefore, that they could insist upon this provision of the Bill that notice should be given. However, he would not trouble the House at that stage with any more lengthened remarks; but he sincerely hoped that the principle of contracting out of the Bill would, after full and proper consideration, be either so modified as to reduce the amount of contracting out to a minimum, or be ultimately expunged from the Bill. For his own part, he should prefer that the power of contracting out of the Act should be entirely withdrawn. He thanked the House for its attention, and must apologize for having detained it so long; but before he sat down he would express a hope that the Government would take into serious consideration the desirability of referring the Bill not to the Committee on Trade, but to the Committee on Law, who were, he thought, more fit and competent to deal with the question. He said that with all the more confidence because he did not happen himself to be a Member of that Committee; but he did think that the legal Members of the House were the best qualified to deal with the question, and he, therefore, hoped the House would see their way to refer the Bill to the Committee on Law instead of the Committee on Trade.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, he congratulated the House on the tone and temper with which the Bill had been discussed by those who were, more or less, representatively interested, and upon the absence of Party spirit which had generally characterized the debate. He entertained strong hopes that the Bill might be so shaped as to be satisfactory both to employers and employed. With regard to the question of compensation, he would not then say anything as to what was the proper amount to which it should be limited; but he would ask the hon. Members opposite who objected to any limitation of the amount of compensation to remember that, whatever scale was fixed upon, the compensation would be a burden upon the industry itself. If an employer knew that for an accident, for which he was vicariously responsible, he was liable to have to pay a money penalty, he would provide for it in some way or other, either by insuring or by setting apart a reserve fund to provide for such contingencies. The hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division of Northumberland (Mr. Fenwick) was not ignorant of the fact that the provision of a fund to meet the liabilities under the present Act must be a charge on the industry itself; and in view of these considerations, and also of the fact that the margin out of which profits were made was now extremely small, an undue sum should not be fixed for compensation, as it would diminish the fund out of which wages were to be paid, and would thereby be injurious to the workmen in whose interest the Bill had been introduced. He thought the clause in regard to superintendence would require the careful attention of the Committee to which the Bill was to be referred. He was quite aware of the great difficulty of framing a satisfactory definition; but it was quite obvious that the word "superintendence" might be so construed as to apply to the case of a few workmen employed on a common work, one of whom was placed in the position of a quasi-foreman, and, in effect, to do away almost entirely with the doctrine of common employment. When hon. Members talked about the injustice of compensation being obtained in one case and not in another, it must not be lost sight of that the man to whose carelessness the accident was really due went scot-free, and would probably not be allowed by the Trades Union even to be dismissed by the employer who had to pay the penalty. In no part of the House would this matter be considered, he hoped, as if there were any real antagonism between the employers and the employed; if such an idea were entertained anywhere, it was because their mutual interests were not properly understood. As to the power of contracting themselves out of the Act, the hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division of Northumberland (Mr. Fenwick) said that about 30,000 miners in South-West Lancashire had been forced to take that course.

MR. FENWICK asked, if it was not the fact that it was made a condition of the engagement of the men in certain collieries that they should surrender all their rights under the Act of 1880?

MR. TOMLINSON said, that so far as he was acquainted with the facts, the men were free to take the privileges of the Act or the benefits of the Permanent Relief Society, and with the obvious fact before them, in the latter alternative, that the cost of litigation was saved, the Permanent Relief Society was largely preferred. In one case, where the employers determined to leave the men absolutely free, the men themselves met together and decided unanimously to request the employers to put them on the Permanent Society. Certainly, they could not be under the Act and have the advantage of the local relief society as well. In one part of Lancashire, very few of the colliers desired to claim to be under the provisions of the Act; though it was quite true that in another part of Lancashire a different view prevailed, but the idea of compulsion was a myth.

MR. FENWICK said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had not answered his question as to whether it was made a condition of the hiring of workmen that they should surrender any claim they had under the Act of 1880?

MR. TOMLINSON said, that in his view it was not a question of conditions of employment. No person could have the benefit of the Permanent Relief Society and still remain under the Act. He wished to disabuse the mind of the hon. Member that it was in the interests of the employer that the maintenance of the Permanent Relief Society was desired. It was both easier and less expensive for the employer to allow the Act to remain in force. But when it was mutually felt that greater advantage resulted from providing against all accidents by a permanent fund than by the uncertain operation of the Act, he considered that in the interest of the workman he should be allowed to enter into contracts excluding the Act.

MR. GULLY (Carlisle) said, he did not intend to enter into the vexed question of common employment. He desired simply to call attention to that part of the Bill which for the first time proposed to extend to seamen and shipowners the provisions of the Employers' Liability Act of 1880. The proposal of the Government was that the Employers' Liability Act should extend to cases of personal injury to seamen in the course of their employment, unless the accident occurred elsewhere than in a port of the United Kingdom, in which case the employer was not to be liable to pay compensation for injury, unless the injury was caused by some defect in the body, machinery, or tackle of the ship at the time when she last proceeded to sea from a port in the United Kingdom, and the default arose from the negligence of the owner or any person entrusted by him with the control of the ship. There were only two criticisms which he desired to offer in regard to that section of the Bill. Of course, it was obvious that a very large class of cases in which personal injury was sustained occurred while the ship was away from a port in the United Kingdom, and therefore the question of the liability of the ship-owner for injuries of that kind was a very large question. He should be sorry to see it limited to the extent to which it was limited by this action. He only wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) to the point, in the hope that before the Bill went into Committee the scheme might be modified somewhat in favour of the seaman. He had pointed out that the employer was not to be liable for accident which occurred outside a port of the United Kingdom unless there was some defect in the condition of the ship. Now, there was a very large class of cases also in which injury was sustained from the careless loading or overloading of the ship, and such cases were not covered by the section, as it stood, at all. He presumed the intention of the Government was by these words to include cases of careless loading, but that there had been some omission or mistake in the drafting, the proper words not having been used to express their intention. If they did not intend to include cases of careless loading, all he could say was that the clause was much more objectionable than he had thought it was, for that was the class of cases that ought, above all others, to be included in the Act. Either the Government meant it, or they did not. If they did, then he thought that the defects in the section, as it stood, might very easily be altered by adding the words "or loading" after the word condition. Another objection he had to the Bill was that it made it a condition to the liability of the owner for any negligence on his part in permitting a vessel to be in a dangerous condition, causing death or injury to a seaman, that the bad condition of the ship must have existed at the time when the ship last proceeded to sea from a port in the United Kingdom. Say, a vessel was proceeding from London to China or the Cape by way of the Suez Canal; suppose, after she left London well provided with anchors, she anchored during stress of weather and lost all her anchors but one, and that she afterwards put in to Brest or Lisbon, where she might refit and obtain new anchors, but that the captain negligently did not obtain them, and continued his voyage without the proper complement of anchors, and that, as a consequence, meeting with bad weather again, the ship was lost, and her crew were drowned. Under the clause, as it was drawn, the owner would not be liable, and that, he submitted, was not as it should be. The captain, no doubt, was a fellow-servant, but he was the fellow-servant who was vested with the largest authority, and who came nearest to the position of an employer himself, because he was entrusted with the care of all the interests of the employer. Under the section of the Bill as it stood, as he (Mr. Gully) had endeavoured to point out, the greatest negligence of the master, provided it occurred at some place other than a port in the United Kingdom, was negligence for which the owner was not to be held responsible, and that seemed to him altogether contrary to the spirit of the Employers' Liability Act. As a matter of fact, the section said this—"If you, the master, allow your ship to leave the United Kingdom in a defective condition, and if, in consequence of that, injury happens to a seaman, you shall be liable." Well, they scarcely required an Employers' Liability Act for that purpose, for if it was brought to the personal knowledge of an owner that his ship was in a defective condition, or that he had not procured the necessary appliances to work the ship efficiently, he would be liable at Common Law; therefore, the Bill was almost illusory as regarded the liability of the owner of a vessel for that class of accidents. He would suggest that the words of the section should be altered so as to make the owner of a vessel liable for an injury happening to a seaman by reason of the negligence of the master in not providing proper appliances for the safety of the men on board, although that negligence happened outside the United Kingdom,

Mr. Gully

If a master failed to supply a vessel with proper and needful appliances at any place where he had the opportunity of supplying them, and accident took place in consequence, the owner should be held responsible. He admitted that there was an attempt made in the Act to give, to a certain extent, the benefit of the Employers' Liability Act to seamen as regarded accidents in ports of the United Kingdom, and, no doubt, a very large percentage of the accidents which happened to seamen did take place in port during the process of loading and unloading. But while the measure gave some extension of benefit to seamen in respect of that class of accident, he submitted that it entirely failed to deal fairly with seamen in respect of another very large class of accidents which happened outside the ports of the United Kingdom.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, he thought that the bulk of the comments which arose on this question might more properly be urged in the discussions in Committee on the Bill; but as the measure, they were told, would be sent to a Grand Committee, and a large number of hon. Members interested in the question would not have seats on that Committee, there was a desire to express opinions during the second reading stage which otherwise might not have been raised at all. There was only one question of principle, so far as he knew, involved in the discussion which would arise on the Motion, and that was the question whether or not contracting out of the Act should be forbidden. That was the whole question upon which there was difference of principle. All the rest, he thought, would turn out to be difference of detail; and he was bound to say that if that question of principle were decided in favour of the view taken by the Government, and which also, by the casting vote of Lord Brassey, was taken by the Select Committee, of which he (Mr. Bradlaugh) was a Member—namely, that there was to be contracting out of the Act, then he thought it was only just for the Government to say that they had tried to frame as fair a Bill as was possible in view of the very difficult questions that arose. ["Oh!"] Well, he thought so, and he would explain why. There was one phrase which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary which he hoped that right hon. Gentleman would modify, if he offered any words in reply. The right hon. Gentleman drew attention to the large number of actions which had arisen in consequence of the Employers' Liability Act of 1880, and he pointed out that only 38 per cent of those actions had succeeded, and that in 42 per cent of the failures the employers had had to pay the costs. Now, he did not wonder that, with all the work the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had to do, he had not been able to have all the evidence taken before the Committee quite so much in his mind as he (Mr. Bradlaugh) had. He (Mr. Bradlaugh) himself had attended every Sitting of the Committee, had been present, he thought, at every minute of its sittings, and had conducted the bulk of the examination-in-chief until they came to that portion of the Bill which dealt with seamen, of which he had no knowledge; and he begged to say that the evidence was conclusive, both from professional witnesses, employers, and employed, that whatever the total number of accidents might be, it was exceedingly small, as a matter of percentage, compared with the large works and large number of men employed, and the matters arising in connection with those works. The percentage of cost in the matter of litigation was small; and nearly every employer, in answer to the question which Sir Thomas—now Lord Brassey put to everyone, said it was so small as not to be worth reckoning in connection with the business. There was no kind of evidence that litigation had increased to any great extent, or that there was any tendency to an increase. As to the actions which had failed, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, who put the number down at 42 per cent, had already been reminded by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for York (Mr. Lockwood) that many of them arose on the question of notice. There was one case which had not been referred to in that House, which was before the Courts only a little while ago, and which showed the monstrous character—and he thought he might use that word—of the objections sometimes taken on the part of employers. The name of the case he might mention, as it was not one in which an individual employer was concerned. It was that of "Beckett against the Corporation of Manchester." The man gave notice in proper time, but not to the proper officer. He gave it to the surveyor from whom he was in the habit of receiving his instructions from the Corporation; but that was the wrong officer, and the result was that the man was nonsuited and ruined. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had been exceedingly hurried by the way in which the debate went last night, and, therefore, had not dealt with as many points as he otherwise might have done; but he (Mr. Bradlaugh) trusted that he would say something to-day to show that he recognized on the part of the men the difficulty pointed out as to giving notice. He (Mr. Bradlaugh) quite agreed that in the Bill, as proposed, there was a clause which would meet such a case as that of Beckett if it occurred again, and would provide that the want or insufficiency of notice should not be a bar to the maintenance of an action if the Court before whom the case was tried, or the Court of Appeal, should be of opinion that there was reasonable excuse for the want or insufficiency. He would put this to the Government—if a certain man had a legal right, why should they put upon him a duty and obligation as to notice in making good that right which they did not put on litigants in actions at Common Law? In the case of an ordinary member of the public having a claim for damages in respect of injuries received, he could bring his action at any period within the Statute of Limitations; and in the case of a workman, if he had a right, why did they burden him with restrictions which, as the case referred to proved, at times prevented him from obtaining any remedy? The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary might say—"We have put Subsection 6 to Section 4, to meet every case that can be raised." Well, he did not wish to put the matter unfairly, but he did desire the right hon. Gentleman to appreciate what was passing through the minds of many of those who were arguing against him. The hon. Gentleman the Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) made a strange mistake last night. The hon. Member had put it very strongly when he said that human life was worth more than £150, and that that was all the compensation that the Bill would give. He (Mr. Bradlaugh) did not understand that the Bill limited the amount of damage to be recovered to £150. What the Bill did was to recognize what the Committee felt—namely, that there were a number of cases in which the compensation estimated on a three years' earnings would not be adequate; as, for instance, in the case of a grown man, who had not long escaped from his apprenticeship, and, therefore, was receiving a very low wage. There were cases in which a man would have received a much larger compensation than £150, on the principle of three years' computation if an accident had occurred a week later, when he was receiving a larger wage; but, after all, this question of amount of compensation was purely a matter for Committee. If he were a Member of the Grand Committee, he should try to increase that sum; but, as he said, the matter was clearly one of detail, on which he had no right to detain the House for a longer period than was necessary just to draw attention to the point. He was at variance with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson), who had just addressed the House, on one point. He understood the hon. and learned Member to say, first, that there was no inducement held out to the men to contract out of the Act, and, next, that contracting out of the Act was not made a condition of hiring. He (Mr. Bradlaugh) thought that the Committee had had several printed contracts placed before them, in which the men were obliged, as a condition of the hiring, to consent to contracting themselves out of the Act. He had thought they had called half-a-dozen witnesses who produced the contracts from the places in which they were employed. He would not weary the House by going at any length into the question, because this, again, was a matter which they could deal with better when it came before them in Committee. He had thought, however, that the evidence was overwhelming, and that with regard to Lancashire they had had express evidence given by one of the representatives of a Miners' Association to the effect that great pressure was put upon the men to coerce them into contracting themselves out of the benefits of the existing Act, and that this witness estimated that between 28,000 and 30,000 men were treated in this way. The hon. Member asked how these Returns were obtained? The Returns were obtained from South-West Lancashire, and it was shown that all the colliery firms there, with the exception of that with which the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Blundell) was associated, contracted out of the Act. A number of men produced the conditions of hiring, which were affixed to the pit's mouth, and without signing these conditions contracting himself out of the Act, they were told no man was allowed to descend the pit. It might be said that that was not coercion. He would put what it was from the evidence of Lord Dudley's agent, and would not use his own language, except so far as he aided the witness in examining him. Lord Dudley's agent, when examined before the Committee, urged that contracting ought not to be touched, because the employer and the employed were on equal terms in bargaining and ought to be left free.

Mr. Bradlaugh

Mr. TOMLINSON said, that what he had meant to convey was, that in Lancashire the system of the Permanent Relief Society, where it prevailed, was assented to by masters and men.

Mr. BRADLAUGH said, his view of the evidence was that a contract laying down certain conditions was drawn up by the solicitor to the employers or their association, and that no man was allowed to go down the pit until he had accepted those conditions. He had put it to the agent of Lord Dudley whether he thought that a man who had no means of subsistence except the sale of his labour, and who had no means of employment save the particular one he was seeking to enter into under the contract, was in as good a position to make a bargain as the employer with whom he contracted, and the witness replied that he thought he was. He (Mr. Bradlaugh) had then put it to the witness that taking a man who had no means of subsistence whatever, save the employment he was seeking, with a wife and children depending on him, whether he thought that the mere consideration of the man entering the employment should be sufficient to relieve the employer of all liability under the Act, and the answer was in the affirmative—that it was right to require a man to contract himself out of the Act, although if he refused he would have to go away and starve. He (Mr. Bradlaugh) remembered the astonishment depicted on the countenance of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Preston when this witness gave his evidence.

Mr. TOMLINSON: I said nothing about the condition of things at Dudley. I only spoke about South-West Lancashire.

Mr. BRADLAUGH: I thought the hon. and learned Member contended that coercion was a myth.

Mr. TOMLINSON: Yes; in South-West Lancashire.

Mr. BRADLAUGH said, he was in a difficulty here, seemingly, for, with regard to Lancashire, the Committee had the express evidence given by one of the representatives of the miners' associations that great pressure was put upon the men to deprive them of the benefit of the Act; and they also had the statement that, with the exception of one Company—namely, the Company with which the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Blundell) was associated—the whole of the colliery proprietors of South-West Lancashire contracted out of the Act. He had himself produced a printed form of contract which was posted up at the mouth of the pit, and to which the colliers were required to assent before they were allowed to go down the pit. He was only going by the evidence. That might be quite wrong; but the hon. and learned Member for Preston had exercised, as he (Mr. Bradlaugh) had done, considerable latitude of examination, and he was sure, if there had been anything incorrect, they would have had the advantage of the skilled knowledge of the hon. and learned Gentleman in bringing it out. He did not suggest that there was anything but the fullest desire to arrive at the truth, and, having arrived at it, the great desire of every Member of the Committee was to frame the best recommendation they could as to what they all admitted was an exceedingly difficult problem to solve. There were several matters on which the Government had not adopted the recommendation of the Committee, as to special juries and County Courts and so on; but these were pure matters for Committee, and he would not weary the House now by going into them. There was one point, however, which he must deal with, and that was as to insurance societies; and here he found himself in disagreement alike with the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) and the hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division of Northumberland (Mr. Fenwick). It was suggested that if the employer could insure himself against risk, he would not be as careful of the lives and limbs of those he employed as he should be. Now, assuming that to be true, what was clear was that the employer could insure himself against that risk whether his men contracted out of the Act or not. They had overwhelming evidence of that, so that the argument of his hon. Friends fell to the ground. But what had operated very much with himself, and, he believed, with other Members of the Committee, was that they found very large bodies of the men were contented with the insurance societies, or provident funds, or whatever else they might be called, now existing, and really wanted them to continue. Scores of thousands of men wanted the insurance societies to continue, and he did not think they were entitled to neglect that fact when they were dealing with something that must be in the nature of a compromise, and that could not be quite decided on the bare line of principle. When they were so deciding matters, they must cut clear whatever damage they might do on either side. When making a compromise, they must try to do the best for all concerned. Great ridicule had been heaped upon the Government by the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst), because of the wording of the 3rd section of the Bill, and of some of the sub-sections. While there were one or two verbal Amendments he (Mr. Bradlaugh) would like to suggest in that section, if it should be his fortune to be on the Committee to which the Bill was to be sent, he was bound to say that the Government had tried to meet the difficulty in principle which the Committee would have to contend with. The Employers' Liability Act dealt with a very limited number of accidents indeed. The evidence given before the Select Committee showed that the proportion was so trifling as only to be a very small percentage of the whole of the accidents that occurred; and then the question was whether it was possible to get any reasonable system of insurance in which the payments were anything like reasonable which would cover all kinds of accidents, and would, therefore, leave persons employed in no uncertainty, and whether it would not be doing a really good thing for the men to say to the employers on the one hand—"You have been relieved from your responsibility under the doctrine of common employment as interpreted by the Judges"—a responsibility which, speaking for himself, he (Mr. Bradlaugh) must say he thought they ought to bear, but as to which he admitted a different view might be taken by others—"and, relieving you from that responsibility, we ask you, as a condition of being so relieved, to join with the men in forming such funds as will give them protection, for such payment as is just, not only in the case of accidents for which you may be made properly responsible, but against all accidents whatever happening in the business in which you are commonly engaged." It was true that with reference to some businesses it would be impossible to get that continuity of employment which would enable that to be done; but then, in those cases, the employers would not be released from their responsibility, and he did not, therefore, understand the objection of the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Nottingham. If this question were again raised, he should be obliged to give the vote he had already given in that Committee, and he did not think the House would do other than the Committee had done. If the Grand Committee decided as the Select Committee did, then he should feel it his duty to try and arrange the best compromise he could for the men and the public generally, on the most satisfactory conditions he could get. Evidence had been brought before the Select Committee on behalf of the Northumberland and Durham miners, and the Report of the London and North-Western Railway Company, to which reference had been made, had been considered; but, with all deference to those who had spoken of it, he would point out that, although it was an excellent Company, the late Mr. Findlay had something of a Napoleonic way of dealing with its servants. They found that, on the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway, a different state of things prevailed. Mr. Findlay's attitude was rather that of the Commander of an Army, than that of an employer contracting with men whose labour he was buying. He (Mr. Bradlaugh) believed Mr. Findlay to have been a thoroughly good man, trying to do the best he could for the Company and the servants. He had made inquiries into this subject, since the Committee sat two years ago, putting questions to men in all kinds of employment; and while he agreed that in a good many districts there was a great amount of natural irritation at the harsh measures used by some employers towards their men, he believed the general feeling on the part of the large majority of men was to have some system of insurance, and not to run the risk of a law suit, in which the damages would be largely swallowed up by the lawyers, whenever an accident occurred to them. Then, it was exceedingly difficult to face the additional centralization involved in Sub-section 5 of Section 3; but if they did not do that, what were they to do? The hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division said—"Leave it to be decided by the Court." Yes; but poor people who desired to have the matter settled might be starving and unable to wait for the decision of a Court. A rich employer, with a rich insurance society at his back, could fight the matter out in a Court. Mr. Shaen, a solicitor of many years' experience, retained on behalf of the men, and Mr. Ruegg, who was employed on behalf of the employers, gave evidence on this point before the Committee, and it had seemed to the Committee that it would be an act of the greatest cruelty to leave the Courts to decide these matters.

Mr. Bradlaugh

MR. FENWICK said, he had not said that it should be left to Courts to decide whether a contract was good or not, but what the amount was to be.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, it would be a great pain to him if anything should happen, through his advocacy of the subject in that House, to break or weaken the friendship which for years had existed between himself and men like the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Wansbeck Division. But he must say that he failed to understand the hon. Gentleman's objections. The hon. Member held that, under the Sub-section, that which the Board of Trade might hold to be fair consideration and fair employment in the case of a man in the North of England, would be held fair in the case of another man under the same employer in South Wales, in some other kind of employment; but that was not his (Mr. Bradlaugh's) reading of the measure. If the circumstances of the employment, however, were similar, why should there not be similarity right through?

MR. FENWICK said, that that might be sound argument; but to admit what was done in one part of the country as evidence as to what should be done in another part of the country, was contrary to reason; and he should be very much surprised to see any legal Gentleman rise and defend such a proposition according to the Law of Evidence.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, he did not quite know where the Law of Evidence came in. Let them see how the matter stood. No one was to be allowed to contract themselves out of the Act, unless there was a contract in which there was an adequate contribution from the employer; and in the event of any dispute as to the adequacy of the contribution or other matter, before the contract was entered into, or after it was entered into, the employer and the employed might submit the matter to the Home Secretary or the Board of Trade. He thought it was a misfortune if they had to so submit it. It would be better if the employer and employed could elect a few men as a kind of committee who should determine such things. The Board of Trade was not likely to have the time to attend to those matters. The working men's organization on the one hand, and the employers' organization on the other, with their respective legal advisers, ought to be able to frame regulations which might meet with the approval of both; but there was not sufficient unanimity amongst the men in any one county which made it possible for them to accept a committee such as he mentioned. That being so, there must be somebody to determine the different matters which arose, or else they must be left to be determined by the Courts of Law. The Select Committee were of opinion that to leave matters to be determined by the Courts would be ruinous to the men and harassing to the employers. That was not a Bill which was intended to make the man who sold his labour and the man who bought the labour hostile to one another, but it was a Bill which was intended to facilitate what was believed to be a reality in the majority of the cases—namely, a disposition on the part of the employer and employed to arrive at a just state of opinion between one another. The advantage of the Bill in this respect would be very clear. Take the case of the Council of Conciliation of Northumberland. The Committee had evidence that there were some employers who did not do their duty by the Permanent Fund there. They had evidence that in other counties the number of employers who did their duty was very small indeed. Under this Bill, if it became law even as it was, such employers would have no answer at law, because they would not have fulfilled the conditions, and any contract out of the Act they had compelled the men to make would have no effect. He trusted the House would not think he had been too intrusive in making these observations. He had only dealt in the most incomplete fashion with what he considered a great and grave question. The Committee were unanimously of opinion that the Employers' Liability Act of 1880 had done great good, that it had made the relations between employer and employed more peaceful; and it was the opinion of most of the Members of the Committee that it had done something to protect the men's lives, and to save men from injury, although he was not quite so sure of that. He had said that was the opinion of most of the Committee, and it was an opinion which must be considered, because the men were the huge majority of those concerned, and their lives and persons were to them as of great value as the property of the employers could be to them. He congratulated the Government on having made, in the main, an honest endeavour to meet some of the recommendations of the Committee. There were other recommendations which might be pressed in Committee, but he would not weary the House by specifying them now. He would only say, further, that he thought the Government might give way to the generally-expressed wish that the Bill should not be sent to the Grand Committee on Trade, though, personally, he thought this one of the Bills which it would be better not to send to a Grand Committee at all. If he asked for the Bill to be sent to the Committee on Law, it might seem selfish of him, because he happened to be a Member of that Committee. But he avowed that he devoted, in common with the rest of the Select Committee, very many hours to this question—in the examination of witnesses, and in the careful consideration of the evidence—and he should like an opportunity of utilizing the knowledge he so obtained.

Mr. Bradlaugh

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said, he was aware hon. Members opposite representing mining and artizan constituencies were better qualified to speak on this subject than he was; but he represented men who got their living on the estuary of the Thames and on the coast of the North Sea, and whose interests were occasionally somewhat indifferently safeguarded by the House, and in their interest he ventured to say a few words. He thought it was a matter of great satisfaction that shipowners had accepted the situation, and supported the proposal to include seamen within the four corners of the Bill. That was all very well as far as it went, but he thought it did not go quite far enough. Like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), who spoke last night, he could not conceive why the Government should protect sailors on the outward and not on the homeward voyage. It seemed to him that in this respect the Government were practically taking what might be called two bites at a cherry, and he hoped the Government would see their way to accept an Amendment upon this point. As time was short, he was particularly anxious not to occupy the time of the House that afternoon; but he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews), who was in charge of the Bill, would not consider that, because he did not make a long speech upon this subject, the interests of the men he represented were of minor importance.

MR. DONALD CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.) said, that although he did not entirely agree with his hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), that there was nothing in the Bill which might not be considered in Committee, and that, therefore, there was no need for a discussion on the second reading, he felt constrained to make almost an apology to the House for intervening for a few moments at so inconvenient a time. The apology was one which he was reluctant to urge, because he was entirely averse to any separation in the House of the consideration of Scotch and English interests; but, at the same time, this Bill was one of such extreme importance to his own constituents and to Scotland generally, that he hardly thought it would be desirable no voice should be heard from a Scotch point of view. Although he could not, like the hon. Member for Northampton, pose as an out-and-out champion and defender of this Government Bill, anything he had to say about it would certainly not be in the way of hostile criticism. It was a matter for great congratulation that public opinion, and the opinion of the House on both sides, had so greatly advanced within the last few years upon such an extremely difficult subject as this. There was no doubt that the arguments which were urged against the introduction of the principle contained in the present Employers' Liability Act were strong and serious arguments. There was no doubt that the fears which were entertained that the consequences of that Act would be disastrous were worthy of consideration; although subsequent experience had furnished an answer to the arguments which were then used, and shown that the fears were groundless. The criticisms he desired to make were entirely criticisms of principle, but they might lead to practical results. There were several principles in the Bill which demanded consideration. It had been said that the only principle in the Bill requiring discussion was whether it should be possible to contract out of the Act or not; but he agreed with the general tenor of what was said by the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst), that they could not leave out of view the important question of to what extent the principle of common employment was proposed to be relaxed and of how much further it ought to be relaxed. He agreed with his hon. Friend that the principle of common employment had been too tenderly dealt with in the Bill. There was at least one practical point applying to a great number of cases in which the principle of common employment should be further relaxed than it was, and that was on the subject of contracts. The subject was touched upon in the Bill, but he thought they might deal with it a little more boldly than they had done. No doubt the general principle of common employment was that while a man was responsible to the public for the negligence of his servants, he was not responsible to a fellow-servant of his servant. The justice of the distinction was not self-evident, although it must be more or less grounded upon considerations of equity or else it would not have become part of the Common Law of England. But it was not the Common Law of any other European country, and they had abandoned the principle in the present Employers' Liability Act. If the principle of common employment were sufficient for the justice of the case, there would have been no necessity to alter it, and he presumed it was because it was found to be unjust that it was altered to the extent it was altered. There was a large class of cases which was not met by the alteration of the law, so far as it had hitherto gone, or so far as he maintained it was proposed to go in the Bill. There was a whole series of such cases which occurred in Scotland. There might be two sets of persons employed on a job—say, the construction of a house; there was the plumber and his men, and there was the mason and his men. Now the Scotch Courts had decided that if the mason's man was injured by the plumber's foreman, the injured man had no recourse against the plumber, because he was not the plumber's servant. Furthermore, he had no recourse at Common Law, because it was held that he was engaged in a common employment with the plumber. The man was placed in a dilemma and deprived of any recourse at all. He had received several communications on the subject from Sheriffs, the local judges in Scotland, and, if he felt at liberty, he could quote still higher judicial authority for the opinion that the present law had proved inefficient and illusory. He did not think the contractors' clause of the present Bill would remedy the evil. He asked the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) to look at Clause 2 of the Bill, which proposed to a certain extent to extend the liability where there was a contract and sub-contract. He would not read the clause, but he asked the right hon. Gentleman's attention to what was his (Mr. Donald Crawford's) interpretation of it; and that was, that, hedged in with restrictions which were perfectly intelligible and clearly expressed, the liability of the head man was scarcely increased at all. If the plant was supplied by the contractor and it was defective, it must be defective owing to the negligence of some person for whom he was responsible. He (Mr. Donald Crawford) trusted that some such words as the hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division of Northumberland (Mr. Fenwick) suggested in regard to contracting out of the Act, would be inserted. When it was found necessary to resort to special legislation of this kind for the protection of labourers against employers, whatever might be said for or against the principle of such special legislation, the presumption was that the legislation was to be compulsory. If they had protective legislation of this kind, and they left it open to the parties to dispense with the provisions, there was an almost irresistible temptation to the employer to compel men to contract out of the Act. They had seen that in the case of the Truck Act, and other matters of the same kind. It was abundantly proved by the evidence read by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton, that it was exceedingly customary, as was the case in the large concern of the London and North-Western Railway Company, to make contracting out of the Act a condition of the hiring. He submitted that that was not a fair position to place men in if they once decided to give them the benefit of special legislation of this kind. Men ought not to be exposed to the necessity of surrendering their daily bread and employment, or else contracting out of that privilege which Parliament had given them. But it was said, "If you do not give them the choice of contracting out of the Act, you destroy a number of wholesome and useful existing arrangements; you destroy the arrangements of insurance with which there is undoubtedly evidence to show many of the men are satisfied, and you will practically put the men in a worse position than they are in at present." Now, even if there were no answer to that, he should say it was a very difficult question to decide, because he thought the preliminary argument in favour of leaving men the privilege granted by Parliament and so highly valued by most of the men was very difficult to get over. But there was another answer, because in the evidence given before the Committee, he found that a great many witnesses of experience and authority said that they saw no reason why the two systems should not stand together. For instance, Mr. Stanley Brown, the manager of the Employers' Insurance Company, said his Company never asked their clients to contract out of the Act; indeed, they rather wished they would not. He (Mr. Donald Crawford) could see no reason why there should not be insurance with the Employers' Liability Act to fall back upon, and he did not think it was at all made out that that would lead to increased litigation. In the opinion of many practical men that would be a perfectly workable system. He had a word or two to say concerning Sub-section 3 of Clause 3. It was a very ambiguous clause. He would be the last person in the world to indulge in mere verbal criticism, for he knew the difficulty of drafting such clauses. The sub-section referred to the case where a workman was insured not only for the class of accidents which fell under the Liability Act, but for all accidents whatever; and it provided that it was to be decided whether the insurance was a sufficient equivalent for the benefits under the Act, all things being taken into account. That might mean two things. It might mean that he was insured for a much larger class of accidents, that in that way he would get a much larger benefit than he would under the Act, although, in the particular class of accidents which fell under the Act, he might get a very much smaller benefit. What he (Mr. Donald Crawford) wanted to know was, whether a man would get as much money for an accident falling under the Employers' Liability Act or not, whether he had contracted out of the Act or not? He would not go into any of the details of the Bill, although there were details which were worthy of criticism. He trusted that the Scotch procedure would not be overlooked. Under the Act of 1880 all cases under the Employers'

Mr. Donald Crawford

Liability Act were sent to the Sheriff Court, and no special direction was given with regard to them. The intention, no doubt, was that they should be dealt with in a summary manner, as in England. The result was very different. There might be appeal from the Sheriff or Sheriff Substitute to the higher Courts, besides which neither party could have a jury trial, except in the superior Courts. These were things which ought to be remedied, and he thought it right to allude to them at this stage.

COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, S.W., Ince) said, that the real question that they had to consider was, whether or not a man should contract himself out of the Act, all the other questions being purely matters of detail. A very few accidents arose from fault on the part of the employers. A consideration of the facts of the case led to the conclusion that, as long as the men considered their lives were in actual danger, they would not contract themselves out of the Act. The colliers in particular would by doing so benefit themselves in a pecuniary point of view. It should be borne in mind that the Mines Acts imposed criminal penalties on colliery proprietors if they failed to provide for the safety of the men. In the colliery he owned men had not contracted out of the Act, and that had been to him a source of income of £85 a-year—perhaps the only income that the colliery had produced. But, although the men had not contracted themselves out of the Act, he was certain that so long as there was any danger to their safety, it was best for them to do so.

MR. W. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda) said, the remarks he had to make upon this question would not be of a hostile character, and, although the Bill did not meet with his full approbation, he might say of it:—"With all thy faults I love thee still." To those who said that the doctrine of common employment should be abolished altogether, it was very gratifying to find that it was being done away with by small degrees. Prior to the Act of 1880, there existed no law under which a workman could claim compensation for injuries sustained from negligence of their employers, although the right was extended to all other members of the community. The Act of 1880 was a concession on that point, and it was perfectly true that the present Bill made them another concession, and if they lived long enough he believed that in this way the whole system of common employment would be at last got rid of. He then came to the question of contracting out of the Act, which, as a Representative of the workmen, he laid great stress upon. They found fault with the Act of 1880 because it permitted this, and they found the same weakness in the present measure. Some very interesting figures had been given by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) last night, showing that a large number of workmen had agreed with their employers to contract themselves out of the Act. He did not dispute that a certain number had contracted, or allowed themselves to be contracted, out of the Act; but that this was the result of a mutual agreement never had and never could be proved. The workmen were not free agents in their arrangements with their employers, who could give or withhold the work from them which their necessities required. There could be no freedom of contract where one man held in his hand the material which another must have. There were collieries in other districts than those which had been referred to in Lancashire, where contracting out of the Act was made an absolute condition by the employers; the men could not enter on any other terms. There were three or four collieries where every man working in them were members of the provident fund, which meant that they had contracted themselves out of the Act; on the other hand, there were collieries where the matter was left to the men, and not a single man was a member of the fund. It was true that the Bill, although in a very inadequate degree, attempted to provide power to a workman to sue unless the employer rendered him proper compensation in some form. This was a fair attempt to prevent the workman from being compelled to accept frivolous compensation instead of his right; and, doubtless, this section would be received by the great body of working men with gratitude, were it not for two or three modifications of the most serious character contained in a sub-section of the clause. Section 3 said—

"That any contract, after the passing of the Act, whereby a workman deprives himself of his right under the Act, shall be void."

If the clause stood thus it would be a good one; but it went on to say—

"Unless it is made in consideration of some undertaking by the employer as is hereinafter mentioned, and that undertaking has been duly fulfilled."

Sub-section 4 contained the mode of deciding whether an employer had made sufficient provision for such cases in a manner which he and his hon. Friends were compelled strenuously to oppose. It said, if a question arose as to whether the undertaking given by the employer sufficiently completed the requirements of the sub-section, evidence that a similar undertaking had been accepted as sufficient by persons employed under the same circumstances, and in the same class of employment, would be sufficient evidence of the agreement. But, in his opinion, this at once placed the workman at the mercy of the employer; for, he was sorry to say, that an employer might at all times get persons to accept as sufficient, for want of being able to make a better bargain, that which would be very inadequate compensation indeed. It would be remembered that when the Act of 1880 was before the House, a large and influential deputation of employers of labour waited upon the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), then Prime Minister, and offered, if the Government of the day placed a compensation clause in the Bill, to pay cent per cent upon every penny which the workmen might agree to pay to compensate themselves for injuries received; but the right hon. Gentleman and the Government refused—they refused to place a monetary value upon the lives and limbs of workmen, but retained that principle in the Bill as a barrier against the effects of parsimony on the part of employers. The good employer had nothing to fear from the Bill. There were employers, he was glad to admit, who were a law to themselves; but there were some careless and small men whose action towards their workmen was of a very different character, and could not, with safety to their workmen, be left to their own free will. Sub-section 5, in his (Mr. W. Abraham's) opinion, provided a much preferable method of deciding this point by a reference to the

Mr. W. Abraham

Secretary of State; but they found the same objection to the latter part of the sub-section as they did to Sub-section 4. He might be pardoned for using a strong term in reference to this part of the Bill; and he said it was monstrous that one man should be compelled to accept the terms made by another man, when he personally knew nothing of the conditions under which they were made.

He was willing to admit that in respect of sub-contracts the Bill was an improvement upon the existing Act, although probably it would not work out to the same extent throughout all trades. But unless great care were taken, the difficulties in the way of the workmen might be increased in the matter of deciding to whom notice of action should be given. There were some difficulties in his way in this respect already, and it must be borne in mind that the multiplicity of employers would make it still more difficult when the question of notice had to be decided. He (Mr. W. Abraham) thought that this principle which was being admitted by degrees might have been carried a little further with advantage in the present Bill. In the case where inexperienced men were employed in contravention of the Act, he said that compensation should be paid to the men who were injured by the contravention of rules which were made for the protection of men's lives. He hoped the Government would give consideration to some of the suggestions which he and his hon. Friends had laid before them, the adoption of which would render the Bill much more acceptable to those whom it was intended to benefit.

Mr. COURTNEY KENNY (York, W.R., Barnsley) said, the House was greatly indebted to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) for the very clear speech in which he introduced this measure; but in all that statement there was nothing which more surprised the House than the statistics as to the litigation which had taken place under the existing Act. They were told that in 38 per cent only of the cases brought under the Act had the claimant recovered compensation—that was to say, that the workmen who sued their masters had failed in 62 cases out of 100. How did those figures compare with the statistics of ordinary County Court actions? Ordinary plaintiffs in County Courts failed only in two-and-a-half trials out of 100. The figures which the right hon. Gentleman gave the House did not inform them in how many of those cases the workman failed on the merits, and in how many he failed owing to the pitfalls and embarrassments which the Act threw in his way in connection with this matter of notice. There was no doubt that in this respect the Act did cast difficulties in the way of a just and equitable claim, and he regretted that these restrictions were actually increased. It was true that the Bill extended the time within which notice might be given; but there was a remarkable alteration with regard to what happened in case of the death of a workman. Where a workman died the Judge now might excuse the want of notice if he thought there was reason why it should not have been given; but under the Bill the Judge would not be able to accept a reasonable excuse, unless he thought that the defendant had not been embarrassed in his defence by the lack of notice. Now, that clearly placed a new difficulty in the way of the plaintiff; and it was the more unfortunate, because by the 11th section the Common Law remedy of the workman against his employer was in future to be capable of being enforced in the County Court. But, unhappily, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary saddled the right of action with the unfortunate restrictions of procedure which were engrafted on the old Act; that was to say, notice of claim must be given under the same restrictions as notice of the statutory claim. There was a point about which the right hon. Gentleman was challenged very emphatically last night, on which he gave a very positive, but, as he (Mr. Courtney Kenny) ventured to suggest, a mistaken answer. It was pointed out that in bringing a Common Law case into a County Court the workman would be restricted to the same £150 limit as if he were enforcing his statutory claim; but in his answer to the hon. and learned Member for York (Mr. Lockwood), the right hon. Gentleman denied this. If, however, hon. Members would refer to the 8th section of the Bill, he thought they would find again by a most unfortunate—though he was willing to believe entirely unintentional—divergence from the language of the existing Statute, the limit of £150 was imposed not merely upon the statutory action provided under the Bill, but upon all actions brought under the Common Law against employers for injuries sustained. Now, besides these points, in which the present Bill was actually, if unintentionally, retrogressive, there were several others in which the Bill did not bring forward that measure of reform which the House was entitled to expect. The right hon. Gentleman said the Bill was framed very carefully on the lines of the Report of the Committee which sat two years ago; but the right hon. Gentleman had omitted to refer to one recommendation—namely, that which would give the power of having a Special Jury in a case where an ordinary jury would not constitute a satisfactory tribunal. Another omission was that the Bill contained no words binding on the Crown. He thought there was no reason why the same law should not apply to the men engaged in perilous occupations in the great arsenals and dockyards as was applied to the servants of private employers. A further limitation which he much regretted to see in the Bill—and which he ventured to think was inconsistent with the language which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had himself used—was the restriction as to the kind of servants who should be able to take advantage of the Act. If a fellow servant was entitled to compensation for the injuries caused by the negligence of employers, he was equally entitled to it whether engaged in manual or non-manual labour; he was entitled even if he were a clerk, agent, or domestic servant, which classes, however, were unhappily excluded from the provisions of this Bill. They had had a very striking illustration this Session of what happened when, having an objectionable rule of law, they, instead of boldly repealing it, attempted to make limitations and exceptions to it. In the Criminal Evidence Bill—in the unanimity with which it had been received by lawyers and the public generally—they saw an evidence of the disgust with which the country had regarded an attempt to introduce limitations and exceptions to an objectionable rule of law instead of taking the simpler course of entirely repealing it. He could not help feeling that as the country came to realize the benefit which had, by general admission on the part of employers and workmen, been obtained from the Act of 1880, they would seek not only to strengthen that Act, as they proposed, by the present measure, but to carry forward the Acts to their logical consequence, make the general law universal, and put the servant in the same relation to his master as all the rest of the world. He (Mr. Courtney Kenny) had been sorry to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary last night attempt to justify our anomalous English law on this subject by reference to the law of America. He (Mr. Courtney Kenny) had for some days last Autumn the opportunity of visiting the Congress Library at Washington, as he wished to refer to statistics gathered in America relating to the labour question; and he was surprised to find the Reports of the State Bureaus unanimous in their praise of the labour legislation of this country. The American Bureaus complained of the risks to which the American labourer was exposed. They complained, for example, that the life of an iron founder in Ohio was some years shorter than that of an English iron founder; and he had been struck by the language of one of these Reports, which summed the whole matter up by saying that whilst the English workman was a mechanic, the American workman was a machine. When the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary told us that the law of America was in harmony with our Common Law on this subject, he (Mr. Courtney Kenny) regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not added to that what Her Majesty's Ambassador at Washington said, as reported in a Blue Book two years ago—namely, that legislation was being pushed forward in the United States of America with the view of getting rid of this unfortunate doctrine and working on the lines adopted in this country. He trusted that we should follow in the steps of Continental countries who had refused to accept the doctrine of common employment, and had required all masters to treat their servants with the same justice as they treated all the world.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) said, he wished to reply to some observations which had fallen from hon. Members opposite as to the clause relating to seamen. As might be supposed, he, as a naval officer, would always be in sympathy with seamen as a class and as he had no property in ships, it was impossible to suppose that he could speak upon this subject from any motive of self-interest. He desired to offer some observations on the clause, and in offering them his only wish was to do justice to the owners of merchant vessels and the sailors of the Mercantile Marine. He had read the clause relating to seamen very carefully, and also the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and he had listened carefully to the remarks of hon. Members upon the subject. He differed somewhat from some hon. Members on the matter. He, for one, had no objection to the earlier part of the clause, so long as it dealt with ships in ports, and to any personal injury happening to any one on board a ship in an English port. He thought that such a person should come within the scope of the Bill, and that anyone on board a merchant vessel in a foreign port also might very well come under the measure; but the moment a ship left an English or foreign port he thought that people on board should not come under the Bill. He had read the section which said that employers of seamen should not be liable to pay compensation for the injury unless it was caused by defect in the condition of the ship, or the tackle, furniture, apparel, machinery, or other equipments of the ship existing at the time when the ship last proceeded to sea from any port in the United Kingdom. He felt certain that no seaman had had a voice in the drafting of that sub-section, and he did not think that any seaman would have sympathy with the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary as to this clause. He did not speak of employers of seamen who would wish to shelter themselves from liability, but of those who desired to protect the seamen's lives in the best sense of the word. He believed that if Mr. Plimsoll had been a Member of that House he would not have given his support to this legislation. Let them treat ships in port as factories, if they liked, and not confine their legislation to seamen, but let the Bill apply to everyone engaged in loading or unloading the ship; but if they made this mischievous sub-section to which he had referred part of their law, he maintained that it would embarrass captains of ships unduly, and would make a captain hesitate before sending a man aloft in bad weather, as it might be necessary for the safety of the vessel that he should do. The captain of a vessel might fear that some hidden defect might exist in the ship's rigging, and that an accident might result, and thereby, through hesitation in many cases, it was quite possible that the interests of a ship owner, as well as the safety of the ship and the lives of the men on board, might be jeopardized in a time of danger and difficulty. Seamen understood the risks of their profession, and what they wanted, better than landmen; and he made bold enough to say that they did not require protection involving such restrictions, and that they did not desire the provisions of this Bill. What he wanted to see, in the interests of seamen and for the preservation of life, was the adoption of proper measures to guard against the vicious practice of over insurance and of undermanning, overloading, and of unseaworthiness, and to guard the seamen against bad provisions and bad accommodation. If they would, by legislation, guard the seamen in these respects, they would do that which the seamen wanted; but to talk about no notice being taken of any defect in the condition of a ship, or the tackle, furniture, apparel, machinery or other equipments of a ship, unless it existed at the time when the ship last proceeded to sea from a port in the United Kingdom, was absurd. When a ship "last proceeded to sea from a port in the United Kingdom," was the time when she was in the very best possible condition. Her running gear was in the best possible condition, whether new or old; but when she left the foreign port on her return journey the gear might be in a condition far from satisfactory. To the gear at that time, however, the Bill would not apply. Then there was a clause at the bottom of the page which gave protection—or supposed protection. It said that if the employer complied with the Regulations made from time to time by the Board of Trade

Mr. Courtney Kenny

"With respect to the ships of the class to which the ship belongs, and where those Regulations have been annexed to the agreement with the ship's crew, the ship and the tackle, furniture, apparel, machinery, or other equipments thereof shall be deemed not to have been defective within the meaning of this section."

That provision, he maintained, opened the door very widely indeed to any amount of jobbery. How could they lay down Board of Trade Regulations for thousands of steamers carrying on different trades? And think what an army of Inspectors would be necessary to prevent the Regulations from being evaded. His own view was that, if they wished to legislate in the interest of seamen as a class, they should do it by an amendment of the Merchant Shipping Act, and not in a Bill which applied merely to workmen on shore. If they wanted the Bill to apply to seamen, then his advice would be to limit it to ships whilst in port or harbour, and not to worry sailors with a lot of unnecessary restrictions.

MR. PICKARD (York, W.R., Northampton) said, he would not take up much of the time of the House. He was in hopes last night, when the adjournment was about to take place, that it would be possible to-day to commence the discussion of the Bill at 2 o'clock, and he was surprised that it had not been possible to do so. He was glad to find that there was a different tone adopted with regard to the Bill to that which was adopted when the measure of 1880 was brought in. They were told in 1880 that if such a Bill as that was passed into law our trade would be driven into other countries, and there would be nothing but bitterness between the employers and the working men. He was satisfied, however, that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department would admit that this class of legislation ran in the direction of trying to take away bitterness between employers and employed. So far as the miners were concerned they were not asking for money value in this Bill, but for legislation which would provide protection for working men. The miners were asking for that which would make their lives safe when they were down in the mine, rather than for something to annoy the employers, to bring about litigation in the Courts, and to destroy the confidence existing between employers and employed. He was glad to find that all arguments founded upon charges of that kind had ceased to be used. There was not much he wished to trouble the House with on this occasion; but he did desire to say this—that so far as the doctrine of common employment was concerned, the men with whom he was associated were totally opposed to it, and were for its total abolition. In so far as contracting out of the Bill was concerned, he could speak positively for the miners of Yorkshire—and he did not desire to speak for the working men of any other county—and could assure the House that they were against contracting out of the legislation, either by insurance or in any other way. The employers were saying they were making no profit, and the old argument used some time ago still existed—namely, that if there was to be an insurance on the part of the workmen it would simply exist at the expense of wages—that the men would simply get less wages. The effect of either contracting or insuring out of the Employers' Liability Act simply would be that the masters would not carry on their businesses in the way they would if they were bound to find fit and safe places for their men to work in. Certain statements had been made to the effect that employers did not force their men to contract out of the Act. Well, when he was in Lancashire in 1880, he found that the workmen there were forced to contract out of the Act. He found that the largest firms in Lancashire—such as Messrs. Knowles—and no one would dispute that they were one of the largest firms—made it a condition of hiring that the men should contract out of the Act. The evidence produced since then all tended to show that, with rare exceptions, the masters in Lancashire forced their labourers out of the Act. He was glad to hear the hon. Member opposite (Colonel Blundell) say that he believed that it was the highest and the best duty of an employer to see that they worked in places and under conditions which gave them the greatest security for life and limb, and he was glad that the hon. Member and many other hon. Members in this House did not fear this Act. The miners of Yorkshire, Northumberland, and Durham were practically content to remain in their present position, and had no desire for the opportunity of contracting out of the Act, either by means of Insurance Companies—who were advertising themselves forward wherever there were working men or employers—who were pestering everyone all over the country, either asking promises or making suggestions that men should insure themselves. What were they to insure for? Why, these appeals were made simply to draw money from the working classes and the employers. Instead of dealing with this insurance question, let the House take the bolder course and leave the Act free. If they must adopt the principle of insurance, let them do it as proposed to be done in Scotland, instead of having Insurance Societies established over all classes and conditions of men. At the same time, he must say he did not believe in the principle of insuring out of any Act condoning neglect. If they were to have an insurance system, why not have a Bill passed into law which would make it compulsory on all classes of workmen and employers, at all classes of works, to insure, and let the insurance cover old age, as well as accidents themselves; and many other questions, which would turn up in Committee, no doubt, would be fully discussed? He was pleased to think that seamen were now put, at all events, on the first round of the ladder; and he was glad to think that the present Government had given the interpretation which had been announced to the clause in the Bill dealing with seamen. He trusted, however, that the provision would have its scope enlarged in Committee. He should like to ask the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) what position sub-contractors would hold under this Bill? He was not a lawyer, and did not pretend to understand the point himself; but he was told that a colliery owner would be in exactly a similar position to a contractor who contracted to build a house—say, for a Member of Parliament—but he (Mr. Pickard) failed to see, in reading the various sub-sections of the clause, that a colliery owner would be held responsible for the action of a sub-contractor. So far as he understood it, it meant this—that a colliery owner let his colliery to a contractor; that contractor sub-let the work to another contractor; and that that sub-contractor would be the only person that could be held responsible under the Bill. He trusted that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department in his reply would put that matter straight, and tell him whether or not he was right in his conjecture. In Yorkshire, in a great many instances, the men found their own materials to carry on their trade—their picks, shovels, and all their other tools to carry on their work, and were said to be “in charge” of certain “working places.” He trusted the question of sub-contracting would be clearly explained, so that they would be alive to the fact that every man in a pit who received an injury in the mine, whether under the contractor or sub-contractor, would receive compensation for injury. He desired, then, to emphasize this point—that when the Bill left this House it should go, not to the Grand Committee on Trade, but to the Grand Committee on Law. He hoped the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State would take that into consideration, and that, so far as he was concerned, the House would have a pledge from him that the Bill should go to the Committee he (Mr. Pickard) suggested. He would conclude his remarks on the measure at this point, because there would be little time left for other hon. Members who might desire to speak before 7 o'clock.

Mr. Pickard

MR. PAULTON (Durham, Bishop Auckland) said, he would not detain the House for more than two minutes; but one argument had been used by the hon. and learned Member for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson), and by other hon. Members, to which he thought a very practical answer could be given. He fully reciprocated the views of the hon. and learned Member for Preston when he said that this legislation should be, and was designed, to promote good feeling between masters and men, and should not, in any way, accentuate difficulties or disagreement; but for that reason he (Mr. Paulton) entirely disagreed with the hon. and learned Member as to the question of contracting out of the Act. He thought there could be no question that there was more friction produced by the desire of the employers, in many cases, to make their men contract out of the Act than by anything to the contrary. Take the case of Durham alone. He would not have ventured to intrude even for two minutes on the House if it had not been that this Bill was of the greatest possible importance to his constituents. He could safely say that the view of his constituents, and he believed of all the Durham miners, was against contracting out of the Act. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the Normanton Division of York (Mr. Pickard) had said the same thing as to Yorkshire. The hon. and learned Member for Preston had stated that in Lancashire employers and men very largely contracted out of the Act, and that it saved a great deal of litigation, and prevented a great deal of difficulty; but his experience went directly to the contrary. He believed there had not been a single case in Durham under the Act. The men absolutely refused to contract out of it. They had always done so, and yet there had been no litigation whatever. He ventured to say that nowhere was there a better feeling amongst owners and men than there was in Durham. With regard to insurance, it was stated before the Select Committee that in 1878, before the passing of the Act, the contributions towards the Durham Miners Permanent Relief Fund were £39,000 from the men and £5,000 from the masters; and that in 1885—five years after the passing of the Act—the contributions from the men had risen to £61,000, whilst the contributions from the masters had fallen to £4,000. He (Mr. Paulton) thought that was a tolerably strong argument to show that the men want security rather than compensation; but the only point he had risen to emphasize was the fact that to do away with contracting out of the Act would not in any way increase litigation or ill-feeling between owners and men.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) said, that at that hour he would only refer to a single point, and that was the clause requiring notice to be given, inserted in the Act of 1880, and so unhappily continued in the present Bill. It had been pointed out that this requirement of notice, with all its attendant formalities, was a terrible pitfall to an honest complainant; whilst, on the other hand, it had not been shown that it provided any protection to the employer against bogus complaints. On this point he fortified himself behind the authority of Mr. Ruegg, a barrister of exceptional experience in litigation of this kind, who had usually been instructed on behalf of employers, and not on behalf of the men; and this gentleman, before the Select Committee, expressed a very strong opinion that these requirements were unnecessary. He should like to see the notice done away with altogether. He was quite aware that the Committee which sat last year did not go that length; but it did propose that the absence of notice should not be fatal, if the claimant could satisfy the Court that there was a reasonable excuse for his failure to comply with the requirement of the Act in this respect. Therefore, if they were not to get rid of the notice altogether, that, he submitted, would be a fair compromise. But, unfortunately, the Bill was not confined to carrying out the recommendations of the Select Committee; but it imposed a second condition besides a reasonable excuse on the part of the plaintiff, that other condition that the defendant should not have been prejudiced in his defence. Now, he thought that this second condition might operate very unfairly and oppressively; and he would tell the House, in illustration of this, something which had happened in a particular case. Suppose a man met with a terrible accident, was picked up in a mutilated condition and carried off to hospital, and was unable to move hand or foot for three months; suppose that while he was lying helpless there was no one to give notice on his behalf. There could be no doubt that, in these circumstances, a Court would hold that there was reasonable excuse on the part of the plaintiff. But was such a man to be deprived of all claim to compensation because the defendant came into Court and said that he had been prejudiced because, owing to the absence of notice, he had not been able to trace, and, therefore, unable to call, a witness whom he alleged was a material witness on his behalf? He (Mr. Pickersgill) thought that in such a case as he had described the absolute impossibility of giving notice ought to over-ride the prejudice, if any was suggested by the defendant. But, bad as the requirement of notice was in all cases, it became absolutely monstrous in the cases provided for by the 11th clause of this Bill. What did that clause do? Men had a right existing at Common Law at the present time; but the Bill said that the man who had that Common Law right should in the future be debarred from the opportunity of pursuing his remedy in the course prescribed by the Common Law, and should bring his action only in the manner which was prescribed by this Bill. He was afraid that the requirement of notice would prove a pitfall to many a man who was injured.

Mr. Pickersgill

Mr. ERNEST SPENCER (West Bromwich) said, that as he had the honour to represent a large manufacturing constituency, he desired to express his approval both of the scope and methods of the Bill. He quite agreed that where an employer delegated his authority he should be responsible, and he understood that delegation was one of the chief principles of the Bill. He would, however, prefer to see the delegation defined in a way sufficiently clear to make the Bill work in an unmistakable manner. From the 1st clause, Sub-section (b), one would suppose the employer was only responsible for the laches of himself, or some person to whom he had delegated his authority; but Sub-section (c) went much further than that, for it made the employer responsible for the negligence of any person in his service whose orders or directions the workman at the time of the injury was bound to conform to. He was afraid this would prove most confusing, for it clearly abandoned the principle of delegation. For example, take the two cases of a blacksmith and his striker, and a bricklayer and his assistant. In both of those cases the second workman was clearly under the orders of the other, and bound to obey those orders; and yet there was not what could be termed a delegation of authority by the employer except as it were of an involuntary nature, and resulted rather from the customs and necessities of the trade than from any special authority of which the employer had divested himself. He had no wish to detain the House, and upon the question of notice he would simply say he was perfectly in sympathy with working men having every opportunity of bringing their actions under the Bill; but, at the same time, he thought, considering the surrounding circumstances and the migratory habits of many workmen, there should be some notice of action required.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday 31st May.

Mr. FENWICK said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury whether he was now in a position to say to what Committee he was prepared to send the Bill—whether it was the Committee on Law, the Committee on Trade, or the Committee of the Whole House?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he stated last night that when the House re-assembled after the holidays he would state to what Committee the Government proposed to refer the Bill. He was afraid it would not be possible to take the Bill in Committee of the Whole House with advantage to the measure itself; and he also said that the Government had no prejudice as to which of the two Grand Committees it should be sent. They would endeavour to gather the opinions of hon. Gentlemen who were interested in the question, and the opinion of the House generally, and they would propose such arrangements as they thought, on the whole, would meet the views of those most deeply interested.

MOTIONS.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 8) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the Boroughs of Aberystwyth and Leeds, the Hartlepool Joint Hospital District, the Improvement Act District of Lytham, and the Local Government Districts of Normanby, Openshaw, and Oswaldtwistle, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 271.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDER (POOR LAW) (NO. 7) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order of the Local Government Board under the provisions of "The Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867," as amended by "The Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868," and extended by "The Poor Law Act, 1879," relating to the Parish of Saint Mary Abbots, Kensington, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 272.]

House adjourned at five minutes after Six o'clock till Thursday 31st May.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 31st May, 1888.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES; CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS, Vote 7; CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS, Vote 5

Resolutions [May 17] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Waltham Abbey Gunpowder Factory* [273].

Committee—Reformatory Schools Act (1866) Amendment [161]—R.P.; Electric Lighting Act (1882) Amendment [233]—R.P.

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS—Second Reading—Gas and Water* [247]; Gas (No. 1)* [244]; Gas (No. 2)* [245]; Tramways (No. 2)* [242]; Water (No. 2)* [246].

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887 (IMPRISONMENT OF MR. CONDON).

MR. SPEAKER acquainted the House that he had received the following Letter, relating to the Imprisonment of a Member of this House:—

"Mitchelstown,
Co. Cork, Ireland,
21st May, 1888:

Sir,
I have the honor to inform you that Mr. Thos. Condon, M.P., has been tried and convicted of an offence under the 2nd section of 'The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887,' and sentenced on this date to one calendar month's imprisonment without hard labour in the County Gaol at Cork, by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction constituted under the said Act, of which I was Chairman.

I have the honor to be,

Sir,

Your obedient Servant,

J. B. IRWIN,

Resid. Magistrate.

The Right Honble. The Speaker, House of Commons, London."

QUESTIONS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS (IRELAND)—ALLEGED REFUSAL OF A PUBLIC HALL AT NEWTOWNARDS TO MR. JOHN DILLON.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, immediately preceding the visit of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) to Newtownards at the end of April, the District Inspector and Head Constable of Police visited the proprietress of the Ulster Hotel, and urged her not to let the hall on her premises (in which the farmers of the district usually hold their meetings) for any meeting at which the hon. Member was to be present; and, whether, on the meeting of the farmers of the district addressed by the hon. Member being held elsewhere, constables were posted at the entrance to the room, and what was the object of this proceeding?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, that the District Inspector at Newtownards answered all the paragraphs of the Question in the negative.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND) —
IMPRISONMENT OF MR. THOMAS MORONEY, OF HERBERTSTOWN, FOR CONTEMPT OF COURT.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, as Thomas Moroney, of Herbertstown, has now been imprisoned since the 21st of January, 1887, for "contempt of Court"—namely, for "refusing to be sworn," and his mental condition is described officially as "indifferent" (Return, No. 110), he will submit the case to the Lord Lieutenant, with a view to the exercise of Her Majesty's clemency?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): As has been already explained in reply to previous Questions, Moroney was committed for refusing to be sworn in the Court of Bankruptcy in reference to certain moneys concealed by him. The Government have no power to interfere in the matter. It has always been, and is still, open to Moroney to obtain his immediate release from prison by submitting himself to be sworn.

MR. J. E. ELLIS asked, if the right hon. Gentleman wished to convey to the House that he had no power to suggest to the Lord Lieutenant to exercise his clemency in the case?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that was so.

Mr. J. E. Ellis

BURMAH — THE IRRAWADDY FLOTILLA COMPANY AND THE STAMP DUTIES.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Irrawaddy Flotilla Company are allowed to issue shipping orders and mates' receipts on bills of lading unstamped; whether the Stamp Laws are strictly enforced against Natives in Burmah; why any exemption is accorded to the Irrawaddy Flotilla Company; and, whether he can now reply as to the Return asked for more than two months since, and on which the Secretary of State promised to consult the Government of India—namely, a Return showing the amounts paid during the past three years by the Government of India to the Irrawaddy Flotilla Company, showing in what respect, at what rates, under what conditions, and for what services such moneys have been paid?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The Secretary of State has received a telegram from the Government of India to the effect that there is no difference in regard to exemption from Stamp Duties between the Irrawaddy Flotilla Company and other firms or persons, European or Native; but the Chief Commissioner reports that the Company are endeavouring to escape the Stamp Duty by substituting mates' receipts for bills of lading. The matter is under the consideration of the Chief Commissioner and the Law Officers. The Stamp Laws are not in full force in Upper Burmah, but exemptions apply to all parties alike. As regards the General Return, I must point out that it involves the close examination of a war expenditure of two years, and has necessarily taken time. But the Secretary of State has reason to believe that the Return is practically completed, and will shortly be sent home.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND) —
LODGING AND MAINTENANCE OF CROWN WITNESSES.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact, as sworn by Cullinane, the Crown witness in the Lisdoonvarna

Moonlighting case, that he and others had been kept in the pay of the police, and housed and maintained in a certain house in or near the Ballybough Road, Dublin; whether he can state the cost of maintaining such lodging house, and whether it is accounted for under any, and which, head of the Irish Votes; and, whether he will state the number of Crown witnesses who have been thus housed and maintained during the last three years, and whether any, and which, of them have been convicted of any, and what, offences?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Deputy Inspector General of Constabulary reports that the Crown witness referred to was housed and maintained for one night at the Crown witness depôt at Clontarf. The cost of maintenance of this house was for the past financial year £161. It is a charge against the Vote for Public Buildings (Ireland). Thirty-one Crown witnesses, together with 17 members of their families, were housed and maintained at different times during the last three years. No records are kept at the witness depôt which would furnish a reply to the concluding portion of the Question.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER — ST. STEPHEN'S CHAPEL — VISITATION BY MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE AND FRIENDS.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether, seeing that the entrance to the St. Stephen's Chapel is through the Members' Cloak Room, there is any reason why hon. Members and their friends should not have the privilege of visiting and showing to their friends this interesting and beautiful portion of the Parliament House; and, whether he will make arrangements to enable them to do so?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University), in reply, said, that he had been informed by the Home Secretary that, after consultation with the Police Authorities, he saw no objection to Members and their friends passing through the Members' Cloak Room to St. Stephen's Chapel. The same Regulations would be put in force as formerly — namely, that application should be made by Members to Mr. Cole, an officer of the House stationed in the Cloak Room, for the key of the gate leading to the crypt; but as regarded entrance into the crypt, the party would have to be attended by an officer of the House.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO WORKMEN BILL.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked, If the Government had decided to what Grand Committee the Employers' Liability Bill should be sent?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in reply, said, he had not yet been able to consult his Colleagues on the point referred to.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (IRELAND) SUPERVISION OF THE BALLINASLOE BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it was true that the Ballinasloe Board of Guardians had been superseded by the Irish Local Government Board; and, if so, upon what grounds?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, it was true that the Board of Guardians referred to had been superseded by vice-Guardians appointed by the Local Government Board. Speaking without Notice, he could only say that the Guardians were superseded because they had shown themselves unfit for the discharge of their duties; but if the hon. Gentleman would put a Question on the Paper, he should be happy to get fuller particulars.

METROPOLITAN POLICE—CASES OF ASSAULT ON THE PUBLIC—THE RETURN.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) inquired, When the Return he had asked for, with regard to the number of police assaults in the Metropolis, would be ready for delivery?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam), in reply, said, he hoped it would shortly be laid on the Table; but, having received no Notice of the Question, he could not definitely state when.

MR. BRADLAUGH asked the First Lord of the Treasury, whether the Police Vote would be taken before the Return was laid on the Table? It would be impossible to adequately discuss the Vote without the Return.

THE FIRST LORD (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in reply, said, that he could not answer the Question then; but he might be able to do so later in the evening.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that he had given Notice for the Return early before the Recess; and if he did not get an answer, he should delay the Police Vote by every means in his power.

AUSTRALIA—NEW SOUTH WALES—CHINESE IMMIGRANTS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government are now in a position to furnish any further information respecting the negotiations with China relative to the action of the Australian Governments in restricting the immigration of Chinese; has he any objection to lay on the Table of the House a copy of the despatch of the Envoy of China to Lord Salisbury, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and the reply of the Prime Ministers of New South Wales and Victoria to that document; is he aware that that correspondence has already been printed and published by the Australasian Governments; and is the correspondence between the Australian Governments and the Home Government conducted through the Agents General of the several Colonies, or direct between the Foreign and Colonial Offices and the Governors of those Colonies?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The Correspondence on this subject is being printed, and will shortly be presented. In the meantime it is not expedient to publish portions of it. I am not aware that some portions have already been published in Australia, but it is very probable. I am informed that the correspondence with the Australian Governments is conducted in the usual way—that is to say, between the Secretary of State and the Governors.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ORDER OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham) asked, When the Government proposed to move the Speaker out of the Chair on the Local Government Bill; and, whether they proposed to proceed with the Bill de die in diem.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in reply, said, it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to ask the House to go into Committee on the Local Government Bill on Thursday next, and when in Committee the Government proposed to proceed with the Bill on Government days—namely, Mondays and Thursdays, subject to the demands of Supply—and also on Tuesdays and Fridays at Morning Sitzings.

MR. HERBERT GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden) asked, when the Government proposed to proceed with the Tithes Bill?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the Local Government Bill must, for the present, take precedence of all other measures of the Session.

MR. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.) asked, what the Business would be on Monday, and whether it would include the Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland Bill or any other Irish Business?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the first Order would be the Resolution with regard to Imperial Defence, and the second Order would be the National Defence Bill, which, he presumed, would only occupy two or three minutes. Then advantage would be taken of the occasion to move for the introduction of three Drainage Bills for Ireland relating to the Bann, the Barrow, and the Shannon, which, he thought, were not likely to meet with any opposition from Irish Members, and after that the Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland Bill would be taken.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—o—

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolution [17th May] reported.

Resolution read a second time.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) said, he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) to the manner in which the Ballinasloe Board of Guardians had been treated by the Local Government Board in Dublin. The Board of Guardians seemed in some way to have incurred the disapprobation of the Local Government Board, who had declared them incapable of discharging their duties, and had superseded them by paid officials. This was a very serious step for a large Government Department to take, and could only be justified in a case of extreme necessity and on good cause being shown. The action of the Local Government Board might or might not be justifiable in the present case; but it was a strong thing to ask the House to pass a Vote on Account, which, if granted, would enable the Local Government Board to go on without any further Vote until the fag end of the Session, when any practical discussion in regard to the proceedings of the Irish Local Government Board could scarcely be hoped for. Under these circumstances, he would move that the Vote which had just been put from the Chair should be reduced by a sum of £10,000 on account of the Local Government Board in Ireland. It was, however, a Motion which, of course, he should not press if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary could show that there was substantial grounds for the serious action taken by the Local Government Board in reference to the Guardians of the Ballinasloe Union.

Amendment proposed, to leave out "£4,205,300," in order to insert "£4,195,300,"—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That '£4,205,300' stand part of the Resolution."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.) said, the hon. Gentleman was, no doubt, entirely within his right in raising the question; but he was sorry the hon. Gentleman had not given him Notice of his intention to do so.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that he had had no opportunity.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that if the hon. Gentleman had communicated with him by note he would have been able to come down to the House prepared to deal with the matter; whereas, being unprepared, he was unable to give any information except in the most general way. What had occurred in regard to the Ballinasloe Board of Guardians was this. The Union had been, for a long time, distinguished for disorderly conduct, and remonstrances had been addressed to them by the Local Government Board, but no improvement took place. On the contrary, the Ballinasloe Board repeated their offence, under aggravated circumstances. The hon. Gentleman would be aware that by Statute not only the right, but the duty was conferred on the Local Government Board of seeing that Boards of Guardians discharged their functions; and there was no choice in the present case but to take the step which had been taken. It was with very great reluctance that the Local Government Board had felt themselves obliged to supersede the Ballinasloe Board, and to substitute for them paid Guardians. He would be happy to-morrow to give full and detailed account of all that had taken place, so far as he could within the limits of an answer to a Question; but, at the present moment, he was afraid he could not give the House any more complete information than that which he had given.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) said, he was sorry the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was unable to give the House more complete information in regard to the supersession of the Ballinasloe Board of Guardians. He thought the House ought to have something more than vague generalities as to the disagreements which had occurred—some of them attended, he was given to understand, by acts of personal violence. He had, however, been reading newspapers in this country which gave accounts of the proceedings at Vestry meetings and others which were set up as the morals of what local government should be in Ireland. He found that scenes quite as disorderly occurred in some of them as those which had taken place in Ireland. In fact, the Government were in the habit of using the telescope from different ends, and in viewing matters in Ireland and in England they minimized English affairs and magnified whatever might take place in the way of disorder in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had made a very lame excuse for the action of the Local Government Board. He (Mr. E. Harrington) could say, from experience of what the Local Government Board was doing in reference to the Boards of Guardians in Ireland, that it was within his knowledge that the grossest partiality was practised. Wherever there was a popular Board, the Local Government Board were ready to come down on them on the slightest dereliction of duty; whereas grave scandals were not only permitted, but fostered with reference to other Boards which did not represent the popular majority. He might mention the case of a man who had recently received an appointment in connection with the Listowel Union. This man, because he was supposed to belong to the popular Party, had his previous record inquired into, and it was found that some years ago, when he held a public-house licence, he had been convicted for an illegal sale of liquor, and on that account the Irish Board of Guardians refused to ratify the appointment, and by so doing got rid of one whom they looked upon as an opponent. In another case a man held the position of clerk of a Union; he went drunk to the office every day, and there were even more gross charges against him. It was only, however, when he stayed away altogether from his business, that the Local Government Board consented to dismiss him. He maintained that the action of the Board in Ireland was simply an illustration of the way in which the government of that country was carried on generally, and in order to render the job more perfect it was now proposed to place the Parliamentary Under Secretary at the head of the Board. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary shook his head; but he wished to know whether the Licensing Clauses of the Local Government Bill would not have that effect? Was he to understand that by a shake of the head the right hon. Gentleman desired to convey to the House that all idea of placing the Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland at the head of the Local Government Board had been abandoned? At the present moment the right hon. Gentleman was himself at the head of the Board, and was responsible for those things which the Irish Members had complained of from time to time. If the Ballinasloe Board of Guardians had been guilty of any misappropriation of funds, or of serious neglect of duty, how was it that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was not able to come down to the House with facts? The right hon. Gentleman had not stated a single charge against the Board, although it was quite possible that, on behalf of the Local Government Board of which he was the head, he had signed the order for superseding the Ballinasloe Board. Nevertheless, although the Local Government Board superseded this Board of Guardians, the Head of the Irish Office was unable to give one tittle of information as to the reason. It was well known to the people of Ireland that the grossest scandals could be carried on in Ireland as long as they were confined to one Party, whereas the slightest slip on the other side was visited with the direst punishment. The right hon. Gentleman had been pleased to say that to-morrow he would give ample information to the House, although he limited the offer by saying "such information as could be conveyed within the limits of an answer to a Question." They knew very well what the character of the answers given by the right hon. Gentleman to Questions was. The right hon. Gentleman invariably attempted to score from the Irish Members every time they asked a Question. Whenever they spoke about the maladministration of Irish affairs, the right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to make them look as ridiculous as possible. The right hon. Gentleman had promised the hon. Member for East Donegal (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) to give detailed information to-morrow; but he (Mr. E. Harrington) failed to see why he had not come down to the House that day in full possession of all the facts of the case. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would give directions for an ample search to be made, so that the House should be informed why these Boards of Guardians had been superseded, and why paid Guardians had been appointed. The appointment of paid Guardians would saddle the unfortunate ratepayers of the Union with the sum of £1,000 a-year. It was all very well to say that the Irish Members were constantly raising imaginary grievances because they were Representatives of a popular Party; but there was this question of £1,000 a-year which the poor people of the locality would have to pay. It was important that the whole facts of the matter should be laid before the House, in order that hon. Members might be able to arrive at a correct and distinct opinion as to whether the Local Government Board had been within their right in superseding the Ballinasloe Board of Guardians.

Mr. Edward Harrington

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.) said, the hon. Member for East Donegal owed no apology to the House for having raised this question, because there was reason to suspect that the Local Government Board were determined to discredit and discourage Local Boards in Ireland. There were some 276 Boards of Guardians in Ireland, and in no instance had one of them been dissolved until recent years on account of the maladministration of its affairs. A change seemed now to have come over the spirit of the dream of the Local Government Board. Only a very short time ago a Board of Guardians in the county of Wicklow was dissolved because it insisted on the free exercise of its powers. There was no occasion on which an hon. Member rose in that House to maintain that the Irish people were unfit to carry on the local government of their own country when the action of the Boards of Guardians was not cited. A few days ago he had risen in his place in that House to defend a Board of Guardians which he had the honour to represent. On investigating the matter, he found that the Board of Guardians in question managed its business so well that it had reduced the expenditure of the Union per head, and largely reduced the amount of rates imposed on the people. The only thing that could be brought against the Board was that there was a large outstanding debt which it was impossible to collect owing to the state of the country. So long as Members of the National Party had seats in that House it would be their duty to regard with great jealousy the character and the action of the Local Government Board in Ireland in reference to the Boards of Guardians. So far as the Ballinasloe Union was concerned, there had undoubtedly been disgraceful scenes there. He had read of some of them himself, and he regretted them exceedingly; but he protested against the course pursued by the Government. He also regretted the ignorance of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary in the matter. If the right hon. Gentleman attended properly to the duties of his Office, he ought to have had at his fingers' ends all the information necessary for the satisfaction of Members who might question him on the subject. Not only was it the duty of the House to regard with jealousy the character of the administration of Irish affairs by the Local Government Board, but it was their duty also to protest against the representatives of the people being superseded and removed in an autocratic manner by an irresponsible Board, at the head of which stood the right hon. Gentlemen himself—a right hon. Gentleman who was supposed to know everything, but who was actually ignorant of the orders given by the Board over which he presided. He was glad that his hon. Friend had raised the question, and he trusted that he would press it to a Division, in order that it might have the effect, at any rate, of imposing some check upon the arbitrary exercise of the power of the Local Government Board. No doubt in the past there were many jobs perpetrated by Local Boards, but at present the Boards of Guardians were performing their duty well. If they were in difficulties it was not their fault, but it was owing to the circumstances of the case. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would take warning and seek some other means of rectifying any error that might arise in the administration of affairs. He (Mr. J. O'Connor) had had some experience of the administration of affairs in Ireland, having been a member of Councils and Boards, and he knew how carefully those who were elected to such responsible positions performed their duty. For that reason he felt it right to support his hon. Friend in resenting the indignity put by the Local Government Board upon the Ballinasloe Union, and he should vote for the Motion his hon. Friend had moved, with a view of impressing upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary the necessity of being firm in the exercise of his powers, and of warning those who were engaged in the administration of the law under him that it was their duty to be careful also. He sincerely hoped that his hon. Friend would carry the Motion to a Division, unless the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary rose again in his place and promised to investigate the matter closely in order to see whether the grievances complained of could be remedied, and whether the people, who were already much overtaxed, should have their money squandered by the appointment of paid officials.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £4,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889, for the Extension of Admiralty Buildings."

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.) said, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) would not press this Vote at present, in the absence of a large number of Members who took great interest in the question. He thought it was desirable that the House of Commons should carefully consider the course upon which it was now asked to embark. Last year the House resolved that a Select Committee should be appointed to reconsider the plans and proposals for an Admiralty and War Office, and it was ordered—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to report whether some or all of the existing buildings of the Admiralty may with advantage be retained."—(3 Hansard, [311] 1361.)

That Resolution of the House of Commons was referred to a Committee consisting of 17 Members, and that Committee had now made an extremely lame Report. What did the Report say? It said, in the first place—

"That the want of sufficient space in the Admiralty and War Office, respectively, for all their Departments, has long been a source of inconvenience to the Public Service, and the practice, which has been already frequently condemned by Parliamentary Committees of hiring houses for the purpose of providing the additional accommodation required, is shown to be most unsatisfactory on grounds both of efficiency and economy."

With the exception of the right hon. Gentleman the present First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), there had hardly been any difference of opinion upon this point among successive First Lords of the Admiralty. It was almost universally agreed that it would be desirable, if possible, to unite under one roof the War Office and the Admiralty Departments, not only for purposes of communication, but also because this contiguity would lead to many economies. That opinion was shared by persons who had had considerable experience in the Public Service. The Committee recommended—

"With a view to remedying these evils, the Government in 1882 acquired a site to the west of Charing Cross and Parliament Street—known as the Spring Gardens site—for the purpose of erecting there a new Admiralty and War Office; and in 1884 designs for the proposed buildings, prepared by Messrs. Leeming and Leeming, architects, of Halifax, were, as the result of public competition, selected. The execution of those designs involved the demolition of the present Admiralty, and all the other offices and houses standing on the Spring Gardens site. Upon the land thus cleared Messrs. Leeming and Leeming proposed to erect a lofty stone structure, capable of containing under one roof all the Departments both of the Admiralty and War Office. The edifice was to be of an elaborate and ornate character, and was estimated to cost £700,000. It was further proposed to divide the building into two blocks, one of which should be finished in four years, and the whole within 10 years."

Nevertheless, in paragraph 5 of the Report it would be seen that the Committee came to an entirely different decision, although they did not state the reasons which had induced them to come to a different conclusion. They said—

"It is not necessary for us to express any opinion upon these controversies, because we have come to the conclusion that, apart from any question of architectural merit or demerit, the scheme should be abandoned. We are satisfied that, by making additions to the present Admiralty, all the requirements of that Department may be suitably provided for; that this work, including some repairs and improvements to the existing building, can be done at a moderate cost, and may be completed within two or, at most, three years; that a very large reduction of expense for buildings would thus be secured, and to this must be added, as against the cost of erecting a new War Office, the value, estimated at £268,000, of the portions of the Spring Gardens site which would be preserved, after providing for the suggested additions to the Admiralty, and for the opening of the Mall into Charing Cross. We, therefore, recommend that the entire official staff of the Admiralty and War Office respectively should each, as soon as possible, be placed under one roof; and that the two buildings should be situated at no great distance from each other."

Mr. J. O'Connor

If they were to be under one roof, it was hardly possible that the two buildings could be situated at a distance from each other. It would be necessary that there should be a separate building for each Department, and he failed to see how two separate buildings could be under one roof. That, however, was a matter for the right hon. Gentleman to explain. The Committee went on to say—

"But we are of opinion that these recommendations can be carried out, and that a great saving of money and time can be secured, by adopting other plans instead of those which have been referred to us for consideration; and we find that the main buildings of the Admiralty may, with advantage, be retained. We further recommend that steps should be at once taken to insure greater economy and efficiency by bringing the clerks of each Department to work together in greater numbers, and in fewer rooms, and that the estimate of accommodation required for the staffs of the two Offices should be based upon such rearrangements."

That was the substance of the Report, and he (Sir Julian Goldsmid) had read all the material points contained in it. He thought hon. Members would see that the information supplied to Parliament was very bald. It was now proposed that the existing Admiralty building should be left standing and that an addition should be built; but this addition would be larger than the existing building. No information was given by the Committee in regard to the War Office. The Admiralty contained, for the purposes of the Department, a space of 28,000 superficial feet, and the addition it was proposed to make to it would cover 70,000 superficial feet. Was there any advantage, from a public point of view, in arriving at this decision? Every First Lord of the Admiralty and every public official had told them, over and over again, that the existing building was entirely unsuited for the purposes to which it was put. The rooms were dark, and the ventilation extremely bad, and altogether the building was wholly unfit for the work of the Department. The result was that Parliament was asked to retain this unsuitable building, which would require very great alteration, and to erect another and a larger building as well. He now came to the point whether the existing building was capable of alteration, and what would be the result of altering it. The late Sir James Pennethorne, in 1855, presented a Report on the main building of the Admiralty with reference to the proposed construction of an attic storey upon it. Sir James Pennethorne was a high authority, and his opinion could be entirely relied upon. In his Report he said—

"The building may be described as resting altogether upon a timber platform or raft; the first layer consists of 4-inch oak planks, 3 feet wider than the brickwork above, upon which rest oak sleepers about 9 inches by 9 inches. The planks under the external walls are about 5 feet 6 inches below the basement floor, and those under the interior walls about 4 feet by 6 inches, except one of the main cross walls from west to east, near the south end of the building (in the line of an old main sewer), where they are about 11 feet deep. All these timbers that have been seen are sound. All the walls are unusually strong, the external being 4 feet 6 inches thick above the footings, and the work extremely well done. The whole building, therefore, would have been perfectly sound and substantial; but, unfortunately, the timber platform appears to rest upon a bed of river deposit 6 or 7 feet thick, which is soft and full of water, the consequence of which is that it has settled more or less in every part, except the cross wall from west to east before referred to."

It was perfectly obvious that any attempt to alter a building raised on such a platform was likely to cause subsidence in a very short time and other structural disturbance. He had recently consulted one high authority as to whether it would be necessary to excavate far below the present building for the purpose of making the very large addition to the Admiralty which the Committee recommended, and he was told that it would, and that the excavation would cause the water to escape into the hole thus made, and that a considerable quantity of water would be removed from beneath the platform on which the Admiralty was built. If that were so—and he was assured on all hands that it would be the case—the result might be dangerous. The consequence was that for the purpose of keeping a building which only contained 28,000 superficial feet, it would be necessary to make arrangements which were admitted by everyone to be of the most unsatisfactory character. It was said that if the proposal were carried out there would be an economy effected to the amount of £200,000. Now he had always found that calculations in regard to economy were very erroneous. In the first place, the amount of economy must depend greatly on the value of the surplus land. In this case he did not believe that the Government would be able to sell the surplus land—for two reasons. In the first place, a great part of it would consist of back land removed from the main thoroughfares; and, in the second place, the Government would hardly be justified in selling land which they would probably have to repurchase later at advanced terms. That was a still larger question. The Committee told them—in the Report to which he referred—that it was desirable that these two Offices, the Admiralty and the War Office, should be under one roof, or contained in a contiguous building. But in this case there seemed to be a possibility of having the War Office on the other side of Whitehall. Now, it was perfectly obvious that the area on the Admiralty site, as it was called, was amply sufficient for the purposes of both Departments, and it would not be an economy, but an extravagance, to take two sites where only one was necessary. If they were to build a War Office on the other side, instead of effecting an economy to the extent of £160,000, he was afraid that it would be found that the account would stand entirely the other way, and that they would be guilty of the most extravagant and wasteful expenditure which had taken place for a long time. It must not be supposed that in the remarks he was making he was addressing the Committee in support of the plan of Messrs. Leeming. His only desire was to secure the proper utilization of the area already in the possession of the Government. It would be extravagant to utilize it simply for the purposes of the Admiralty, and he believed there were architects in England who were able to prepare a plan by which the site would be devoted to provide suitable accommodation for the two Departments of the Government that were concerned. Of course, the figures submitted by Messrs. Leeming and other architects were erroneous, because they were all based on the assumption that the building would be erected on the existing site. At the time their plans were prepared it was not deemed probable that any attempt would be made to commit the extravagance of covering the site with a building which was only to be used by the Admiralty. The noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) was well aware of the requirements of the Service, and must know that great economy in regard to space could be effected by placing a certain number of clerks in the same room, as was done largely in other Departments. He was of opinion that that principle might be extended much further. All the facts went to show that it was not desirable for the requirements of one Public Department only to cover so large an extent of ground. He could only assume that the object the Committee had in view was to save the old building, which, however, was worth very little for the Public Service. Its retention was hardly desirable, as it probably would not last long. He, therefore, hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works would reconsider the matter and submit some new proposal to Parliament. This might be done by the appointment of a Departmental Committee, or in any other way that was deemed desirable. All such a Committee would have to do would be to consider whether it would not be advantageous to do what was originally intended—namely, to utilize the existing site for the purposes of these two great Public Departments. He was satisfied that it would be the most economical course, and he asked the right hon. Gentleman to exercise his ability in accomplishing that object. He had only risen for the purpose of drawing attention to one or two salient points in the matter, because, after this sum of £5,000 had been voted, the Committee would be precluded from raising the question. He, therefore, trusted that, at any rate, the Government would see their way to postponing the matter, and, in order to insure discussion, he would move the rejection of the Vote.

Mr. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne) said, he had listened attentively to the speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for South St. Pancras (Sir Julian Goldsmid), and, having carefully examined the plans of the proposed buildings, he felt bound to say that he could not concur with the views expressed by the hon. Baronet. On the contrary, he congratulated the Government upon having for once, in the matter of public buildings, done a very wise and prudent thing. The hon. Baronet said that calculations, even of economy, often proved erroneous. That was quite true, especially in the case of public buildings; but it would be very easy indeed to show that the course suggested by the hon. Baronet would not promote economy, because, apparently, his object was to secure that the present Admiralty buildings should be entirely pulled down. That Admiralty building the hon. Baronet described as paltry and poor; but that was not the opinion of most of those who had been accustomed to see it.

Sir Julian Goldsmid

SIR GEORGE BALFOUR (Kincardine): The remark applied to the interior of the building.

MR. ADDISON said, he had been inside the edifice, and, as far as he knew and could judge, it was a very good building inside. Designed by Adams, it was a building which anybody who looked at it would describe as simple, stately, and effective. They were told that it covered 28,000 square feet, and to threaten with destruction a building which was sufficient for the purposes of the Admiralty, and, looked at from outside, was one of the features of London architecture, would not be true economy. It was proposed to add to the existing building, and anybody who looked at the plans would see that they were simple and effective as far as elevation was concerned. It seemed, however, that there was a natural desire in the Architectural Profession to make a clean sweep of the whole thing, and erect one of those great buildings, such as the Law Courts, of which he had had considerable experience, and of which there were already too many in London. It was suggested that the Government might not be able to sell the surplus land, seeing that it was back land. He was very glad to hear that that was likely to be the case; and he was sure most hon. Members would agree with him when he said that it was very much to the advantage of the public to preserve every open space and piece of surplus land which could be obtained in this particular locality. Instead of being a disadvantage, that was one of the points which, to his mind, told in favour of the new design. It was not desirable to have one of those enormous buildings which they saw about St. James's Park; and what struck him most in favour of the new designs was that they presented a handsome and pleasing elevation which, while not crushing the Horse Guards, admitted some air and some light to get into St. James's Park. It was impossible to look at the space now covered by other Public Offices in the neighbourhood of Whitehall without seeing that it would have been much better to have erected the buildings under some such design as that which was now submitted. He certainly saw no reason why they should pull down the existing Admiralty so long as it was a good and effective building, fully adequate to the performance of the services for which it was required. He would not suggest for a moment that the plans now submitted to the House were opposed to the interests of any particular architect; but, for his own part, he supported them because he objected to the idea of continuing the erection of large, enormous, and often most inconvenient buildings.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central) said, that in rising to enter his protest against the scheme now before the House, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket), who had proposed it, that it was with great regret he found himself unable to support him in any scheme for the improvement of London which he might propose. He had never thought it worth while to make a Party question of any matters affecting the Department. When he held the post of First Commissioner of Works he knew the great danger which arose from treating matters of this kind in a Party spirit, and he believed that that was the reason why so many defects had found their way into our public buildings. He had always endeavoured to obtain the co-operation of those who sat opposite in the many schemes which it fell to him to propose, and he would willingly co-operate with the right hon. Gentleman in any scheme for the improvement of our public buildings. He would also assure the right hon. Gentleman that he was not actuated by any feeling of retrospective regret for the scheme for which he was responsible for dealing with the Admiralty and War Office—a scheme which had the approval of the last Parliament, but which was rejected by the Committee appointed last year. He did not think it necessary to enter into the merits of that scheme. If it were at all necessary, he should be prepared to defend it; but he must admit that it was dead. It was killed by a combination of opponents, some of whom thought it too expensive, while others considered it not expensive enough, and others also objected to the style of architecture of Messrs. Leeming's original building. As he had said, he thought it a good scheme, and he was quite prepared to defend it; but he admitted that it was now dead. He did not think the scheme received quite a fair consideration from the Committee, especially in its financial aspects; but that was past and gone, and it was of no use to revive past controversies. They had now to consider another scheme, and whether the plan now before them was on its own merits a good one, and one which would be a credit to the Government and the Metropolis. Upon that point he had been obliged to come to an adverse opinion. In the first place, he might observe that it came before them without any professional authority whatever. It did not appear to him that there was any professional opinion in favour of it. He challenged the right hon. Gentleman opposite to say whether he could produce a single professional man of high repute who had expressed himself in favour of the scheme. His impression was that the right hon. Gentleman would not find it possible to produce a single authority on architectural questions who would approve of it. There was no one who would say that the scheme was a good one, architecturally or financially, and one that ought to be carried out. It had been condemned by the Institute of Architects, he believed, unanimously, and he had received communications personally from several distinguished architects who declared that the scheme was a thoroughly bad one from every point of view. In the Office of Works there were several gentlemen called surveyors, but really most efficient architects, to whom they owed the post offices which had been erected throughout the country in such places as Birmingham, Manchester, Bradford, and, particularly, the General Post Office in London. Those buildings gave great satisfaction. Among these gentlemen was Mr. Taylor, who had recently erected the addition to the National Gallery, which had given such great satisfaction to the Metropolis. Mr. Taylor was also responsible for remodelling the Royal Mint, which saved the country at least £250,000. He knew better than anyone the requirements of the Departments, and he would sooner take Mr. Taylor's opinion than that of any other professional man. He asked the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner whether Mr. Taylor or any other of his staff approved of this scheme, or were responsible for it, and whether it was not a fact that they all united in condemning the proposed extension of the Admiralty as most unwise from a professional point of view? He would go further, and ask whether it was not a fact that the architects themselves, the Messrs. Leeming, who were directed to prepare plans for the extension of the Admiralty, had recommended the adoption of this scheme? Turning to the evidence given before the Committee of last year, he found that Mr. Leeming said—

“ I must emphasize the objection which Mr. Taylor raised to extending the building on the lines of the existing Admiralty. It is not wise to add in the same style to a building already admittedly deficient.”

As he had said, Messrs. Leeming were afterwards invited to prepare plans for carrying out the new design; and when young architects were asked to undertake works of that kind it was not natural that they would refuse to do so. But he was satisfied that if Messrs. Leeming were asked whether they considered the scheme one that ought to be carried out, they would reply that it was not one they should recommend. Then, again, he should like to know the opinion of his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works himself, and whether he thought, on the whole, that the scheme he was now proposing was one which would add dignity to the Metropolis and was a work which ought to be carried out? For his own part, he was always unwilling to obtrude on matters of taste, and he had always submitted the schemes he had laid before the House upon the authority of professional men. He had certainly never obtruded his own views in regard to architectural matters or matters of taste. He would, however, in this instance go further than usual, and express the objections which he entertained to the scheme. He objected to it on three grounds—first, upon administrative grounds; secondly, upon financial grounds; and, thirdly, upon architectural grounds. In regard to the administrative grounds, he objected to the scheme because it precluded from all time to come the possibility of bringing together the Admiralty and the War Office; he objected to it on financial grounds, because he believed it to involve a most wasteful use of the site which the Government had bought at considerable expense in Spring Gardens, and because he felt that, under the plea of economy, it would result in much greater expenditure of public money than if a single building were erected for both Departments. In the third place, he objected to it on architectural grounds, because the addition to the existing Admiralty works, costing nearly £200,000, and adding them to a building which was certainly not worth more than £60,000 or £70,000, was an unwise expenditure of money, inasmuch as it would be a miserable bit of patchwork, perpetuating all the defects of an existing building, and would result in a building which, according to all the best authorities, would be a discredit to the State and to the Metropolis. On the first of these points he might observe that in the last 30 or 40 years it had been the object of nearly everyone concerned with the Admiralty and the War Office to bring these two great Departments together.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): No.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The noble Lord said "No;" but he adhered to the opinion he had expressed. That was certainly the view of the Duke of Somerset, Mr. Corry, Sir John Pakington, Lord Northbrook, and his right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers). His right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh was undoubtedly a high authority upon the matter, because he had acquired experience in this respect during a very important naval and military operation—namely, the Egyptian Expedition, and he gave the strongest evidence upon the point before the Committee. He said—

"In time of peace it is important, officially convenient, and economic that the two Departments should be close together, but in time of war it is absolutely necessary; and the keeping of the two Departments asunder is the cause of weakness, and may be the cause of disaster."

He (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) could confirm that from his own experience, although he was not at the Admiralty when any such important expedition as that to Egypt was being carried out. But he was at the Admiralty when a smaller expedition was undertaken, and he was satisfied that the separation of the two Departments, and the want of communication between them, was the cause of wasteful expenditure and want of harmony. He had no hesitation in saying that it was of the utmost importance to bring the two Departments together. The only two Heads of Departments who were of a contrary opinion were the right hon. Gentleman the present First Lord of the Treasury and the noble Lord who sat beside him—the First Lord of the Admiralty. No doubt, the right hon. Gentleman the first Lord of the Treasury was a high authority, because he had been employed both at the Admiralty and the War Office; but he was not connected with either of those Departments when an important expedition or military or naval operation was being undertaken. However hon. Members might differ from that point of view, they would, at all events, be of opinion that it was desirable to secure the advantage of the juxtaposition of the two Departments, if it could be obtained without any great expenditure. It was most desirable to accomplish that object, both for administrative and financial purposes. He now came to the financial part of his argument. Without reverting to the scheme of last year, it was absolutely certain that the site which had been purchased by the Government already was amply sufficient for the Admiralty and War Office. It was now certain that the requirements of the two Departments were not so great as they were two years ago, on account of the reduction of staff and the wise plan adopted by the present Government of requiring that the clerks should be collected together in large rooms, instead of being dispersed in smaller rooms. He had endeavoured to persuade the two Departments to adopt that suggestion three years ago, but without success. He was glad to find that the requirements of the two Departments were not what they were three or four years ago, and that a smaller building would suffice for all purposes. There could not be a doubt that for a sum of £600,000 a building could be erected on the present site, without the towers and other defects in Messrs. Leemings' original building, and that the building so erected would be large enough to accommodate both the Admiralty and War Office. He would ask the Committee to look at the financial alternative in the present proposal. They were asked to spend £200,000 or thereabouts in adding to the existing Admiralty; but by doing so the site could not be made available for the War Office also. The surplus land could only be of small amount, and the scheme would necessitate another site being found for the War Office, seeing that it was wholly impossible that the War Office could remain where it was. He thought the Government were quite right in saying that they had not contemplated leaving the War Office where it was. Everybody admitted that it must be moved. It was impossible to retain it on the present site; and, on the other hand, it was necessary to bring together all the Departments that were connected with it. The only alternative site which had been suggested for the War Office was a site in Whitehall, immediately opposite the Admiralty, and it was said in evidence before the Committee last year that to purchase that site would cost about £400,000. He did not believe it would be possible to obtain any site for a War Office at Whitehall lower down at a lower cost than that. He assumed, therefore, that the cost of the site would be £400,000, and it then became necessary to erect the building, which he put down at £340,000. They had thus an expenditure of £200,000 for the extension of the existing Admiralty, £400,000 for the purchase of a site for the War Office, and £340,000 for the erection of the building, making £940,000, as against £600,000, the cost of a single building on the Spring

Gardens site—a difference of £340,000. Against this it was hoped to set off the value of the surplus land, if the present proposal were adopted, and this was valued at £160,000. He much doubted whether that sum would ever be realized, either by selling the land or using it for other public buildings; but, even if it were realized, there was still a very considerable margin against the expenditure the Government now proposed. Therefore, it appeared to him that the present scheme fell through, from a financial point of view; and it was absolutely certain, if they assumed that a new site was to be found for the War Office, that the scheme would result in a much greater expenditure than if they utilized the Spring Gardens site for both Departments. He was perfectly convinced that, before long, the Government would come down to Parliament, and ask for additional money; and the total expenditure would be very much greater than if the scheme were restricted to the erection of a single building on the existing site. Of the two alternatives, he was satisfied that the scheme of the Government would land the country in a very large and unnecessary expenditure of money. Where, he thought, the Committee of last year made a great mistake was not so much in rejecting Messrs. Leemings' first plans, as in not considering in what other way the Admiralty site might be utilized for both the Admiralty and War Office. He came now to the architectural question. The Government asked the House to vote a sum of £192,000 for the purpose of adding to a building the true value of which, if new, could not be more than £80,000 or £90,000. It was valued by Mr. Taylor, in his evidence before the Committee last year, at £90,000 if new; but if they took into account the whole superficial base it contained, it would not be worth so much. A new building could be erected if estimated in proportion to its area, and would give the same accommodation for office purposes for the sum of £70,000. Therefore, they were asked to spend £192,000 for a building which would only be worth, if new, £70,000. The present building was a very old one—130 years old, he believed. It had almost all the defects which old buildings possessed; it was badly lighted, it was necessary to burn gas in the passages, and it was ill-

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

ventilated. They were also told by high authority that the foundations of the building were so bad that it was impossible to add another storey to it; any disturbance of the foundations was likely to bring it down to the ground. Apart from that question, it appeared to him most unwise to add to a building admittedly so defective to the great extent now proposed. By adding to the Admiralty in this matter, they would perpetuate all the defects of the existing building, and would practically extend them to the building they were proposing to erect. The attic storey of the Admiralty was useless, and it was proposed to throw it into the upper storey, which was also very low. The Whitehall front of the building was confessedly one of the most hideous and unsightly in London. The Park front was plain, and without any architectural merit. To expend £200,000 in adding to this building and in perpetuating all its defects, was, according to the view of every architect of eminence, an act of the greatest folly, and such as no private person in his senses would perpetrate. It would also, in their view, result in a building of exceedingly bad proportions and very unsightly—one quite unworthy of the site, which was one of the most august and conspicuous in the Metropolis. Among the architects who had been authorized to speak for them in this sense were Mr. Pearson, Mr. Christian, Mr. Blomfield, and Mr. Hardwick—men of high position and eminence in the architectural world. They were united in condemning the proposal of the Government, both from an architectural and from a financial point of view. The hon. secretary of the Institute of Architects had written to say that that Body also condemned the scheme from a financial and architectural point of view. For all these reasons, it appeared to him that it would be most unwise for the Government to go further with the scheme, and he would ask the Committee to pause before committing the country irrevocably to so bad a plan. What he would suggest was, that a small Commission of experts, including some architects of eminence and some financial authorities from the Treasury, should be appointed, who should examine the whole question from a financial and architectural point of view, especially in connection with the War Office. For his own part, he felt confident that when this scheme was thoroughly examined, it would be found that it was as financially unsound as it was architecturally bad, and, if carried out, it would be a discredit to the House as well as to the Metropolis.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University) said, he had listened carefully to the remarks which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, and by his hon. Friend the Member for South St. Pancras (Sir Julian Goldsmid), and he had nothing to complain of in the spirit which the subject had been discussed, while he was much obliged for the flattering manner in which he had been referred to personally. What he was asked to do was to drop the Vote altogether and to postpone the settlement of the question until, in the opinion of the hon. Member for South St. Pancras, a small number of experts had been consulted on the matter, or, in the opinion of the right hon. Member for Central Bradford (Mr Shaw Lefevre), until a small Commission had reported what was best to be done. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that no one could have greater respect for anything that fell from him upon this subject than he had, and he was placed in an extremely difficult position in having to oppose any suggestion made by the right hon. Gentleman, considering his great experience in such matters. But he would ask the House to bear in mind that this controversy with regard to what was to be done with the great Public Departments had been going on, in an acute sense as to the War Office and the Admiralty, for 20 years or more, and, as regarded public buildings generally, for more than half-a-century. He would ask the House, further, to remember that the subject had been considered by one Commission and Committee after another, and that it had been debated over and over again in the House itself. There was one point, however, upon which all Commissions, and all the opinions expressed by hon. Members who had taken part in the debates, were agreed, and it was that the present state of the accommodation in the War Office and the Admiralty was really scandalous, and that for the purposes of administrative efficiency, as well as of economy, it was absolutely necessary that the various scattered departments of the Admiralty and the War Office respectively should be brought together, while some went so far as to say that all should be under one roof. The hon. Member for South St. Pancras commented upon one passage in the Report of last year in which the Committee recommended that the official staff of the Admiralty and War Office should each, as soon as possible, be placed under one roof, and that the two buildings should be situated at no great distance from each other. There was no mistake in that passage, and if the hon. Baronet would read it attentively he would see that the grammar was perfectly correct. It was only recommended that the official staff of each Department should, as soon as possible, be placed under one roof. The use of the word "respectively" showed that it was each Department that was to be placed under its own roof and not that the two were to be under one roof, although they were to be as near to each other as could be conveniently arranged. What was proposed was to bring all the separate departments of each into one building. He could not go with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford in the sweeping statement he had made that all high authorities had been in favour of placing both Departments under the same roof. The Committee of last year thoroughly threshed out that question by the careful examination and cross-examination of witnesses, and what the evidence came to was this—that whereas some of the authorities were in favour of bringing both Departments under one roof, and others were directly opposed to that suggestion, all were agreed that the two should not be placed at an inconvenient distance from each other. That was the effect of the Report of the Committee of last year. Both the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for South St. Pancras asked—"Why on earth do you propose to make this addition to the existing Admiralty, if it is not merely for the purpose of retaining the old building?" and they argued that that would be a very costly and expensive indulgence in one's fancy. Now, hon. Members must not suppose for a moment that the Report of the Committee was founded on any such reason as that. No doubt there was a strong feeling in favour of maintaining the architectural features of the old Admiralty, but that was not the ground on which the recommendation was made at all. He would remind hon. Members why the Committee of last year was appointed, of whom it consisted, and for what purpose it was appointed. A controversy had been going on for many years as to how a new Admiralty and a new War Office were to be provided. It was sufficient, however, to say that in 1885 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford obtained a Vote of £10,000 in the House of Commons as the commencement of the much larger sum of £700,000 which he proposed to apply to the purpose of building a War Office and Admiralty, and bringing them under one roof, on what was known as the Spring Gardens site. The proposed expenditure staggered a great many people. The right hon. Gentleman the present Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. W. H. Smith), being then in Opposition, asked the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), whether he would agree to the appointment of a Committee to reconsider the plans involving so large an expenditure? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby willingly agreed to the appointment in 1886; but the Dissolution soon followed, and prevented the appointment of the Committee until 1887. In that year a Committee was appointed to reconsider the plans for the proposed Admiralty and War Office, and they were further instructed to inquire whether all, or some part, of the existing Admiralty might not with advantage be retained. Who were the Members appointed to serve on that Committee? He found that the names were these—Sir William Harcourt, Lord George Hamilton, Mr. Henry H. Fowler, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Selater-Booth, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Colonel Malcolm, Mr. Howell, Mr. Isaacs, Mr. Dillwyn, Mr. Edward Hardcastle, Mr. William Bright, Mr. Seager Hunt, Mr. William Crossman, Mr. Patrick Joseph Power, Mr. Byrne, and Mr. David Plunket. He thought it might be fairly said that that was a Committee of some authority. He quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford that nothing could be more fatal to arriving at a sound conclusion than that the matter should be dealt with as a Party question. It had not been in any sense dealt with by the Committee as a Party question, as was evidenced by the fact that two of the strongest supporters of the present First Lord of the Admiralty were the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler). Therefore, hon. Members would fully understand that the matter was not dealt with as a Party question, but in the Committee an honest endeavour was made to see whether there was some more economical and satisfactory way of treating the question than that to which the House was supposed at the time to be committed—namely, the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford. In fact, the ground upon which the Committee rejected that proposal and made a more modest suggestion was that they found that a great saving of time and expense would be effected by the suggested alternative. The original scheme was to cost £700,000, and it was to take 10 years before it was completed.

Mr. Plunket

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The War Office part of it.

MR. PLUNKET said, the scheme which combined the War Office and the Admiralty was, he thought, to take four years for the Admiralty and the remainder of the time for the War Office.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE remarked that the time was afterwards reduced to three years.

MR. PLUNKET said, it was found that the wants of the Admiralty could be met by additions to the existing building, which could be made for £192,000, and which could be completed within three years. He was advised by Messrs. Leeming, to whom it was his intention to entrust the work, that they would be able to complete the additions to the existing Admiralty within two and a-half years, and the sum it would cost would be £5,000 less than the sum named in the Estimates, or for something like £188,000. Of course they did not mean to set off this sum of £188,000 or £192,000 against the sum of £700,000 for providing both a War Office and Admiralty. But of the £700,000, the proportion allocated to the Admiralty was £380,000, and the new proposal, therefore, involved the saving of £188,000. The right hon. Gentleman had now expressed his belief that his original idea of combining the two offices of the Admiralty and the War Office under one roof on the Spring Gardens site could be carried out for £600,000. He knew that when the matter was before the Committee the right hon. Gentleman made a suggestion of that kind, but the right hon. Gentleman had not been able to put his revised estimates before the Committee in such a way as to induce them to accept them, and seeing that so large a sum had been knocked off the original estimate the Committee were unwilling to rely confidently upon the revised estimate. The right hon. Gentleman said that they would have to build a War Office by-and-bye at a cost of £400,000 for a site, and £340,000 for the building, or £740,000 altogether; but he was prepared to admit that a new War Office could not be provided for a much smaller sum than the right hon. Gentleman named. The view taken by the Committee on this question was, he thought, that given by the First Lord of the Treasury in answer to a question by the right hon. Member for Derby as to whether a very great expense would be incurred in providing a new office upon a new site. The First Lord of the Treasury was asked in Question 1,289—

“It is proposed upon this space to find room for the War Office as well as the Admiralty, and the most important question I have to ask you is this. Whether you think, having regard to the expediency of utilizing the present Admiralty buildings, there would be any insuperable objection to postponing for further consideration the making of the new War Office?—Answer: No, I do not think there would be any insuperable objection. In the first place, as I understand it, the scheme will only provide for a completed War Office in about 10 years from the present time, whilst it would be practicable, I think, after full consideration, to provide a new War Office, I hope economically, without utilizing this site, or adopting this scheme, even in less time than 10 years, taking a different and distinct site as a place on which the building should be erected if it is found to be absolutely necessary that a new War Office should be erected.”

That was, he believed, the view ultimately taken by the Committee, so that when there was an Amendment proposed on the consideration of the Report of the Committee in these words—

“ We think that no commencement should be made with the proposed addition to the Admiralty until the Government has laid before Parliament its proposals for dealing with the War Office.”

And when, upon that Amendment, there was a Division, the Amendment itself was supported only by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Swansea Town (Mr. Dillwyn), while among those—eight in number—who voted against it were the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and the hon. Gentleman the Member for North East Bethnal Green (Mr. Howell). Therefore all these matters came before the Committee before they adopted their Report, and upon the Main Question as between the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford and those who differed from him, when the Division was taken, the numbers were 9 to 3 against the right hon. Gentleman. He (Mr. Plunket) had been challenged to say whether any architect of eminence had approved of the present proposal now submitted to the House, but he should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford whether he could call any eminent architect who was altogether in favour of his scheme. Something had been said about the opinion which had been expressed by the Royal Institute of Architects; but, speaking of them with great and sincere respect, he must say that he would not go to them for a favourable or encouraging opinion upon any scheme which might be proposed for this purpose. No doubt they took a high-toned view as to what a public building should be; but they were not likely to approve of any proposal that could have been made. Here was what the Institute of British Architects said on the 2nd of March, 1866, according to The Times, as to the scheme of the right hon. Member for Bradford:—

“ A deputation from the Royal Institute of British Architects was received by the First Commissioner of Works (the Earl of Morley). Mr. McVicar Anderson, Hon. Secretary, read a Memorial in which the objections of the Institute to the proposed treatment of the Spring Gardens site were stated, and having dwelt on the inadequacy of the Whitehall thoroughfare at Charing Cross, they went on, apart however from the necessity of thus providing for the exigencies of the traffic, the widening of Whitehall and Charing Cross is essential in view of the erection of a monumental edifice on the western frontage. The unsatisfactory effect of placing lofty structures on the frontages of even wide thoroughfares is strikingly illustrated in Northumberland Avenue, and it is much to be desired that in the present instance a like result should not have to be deplored. To erect a building of great magnitude on the site in question without sufficiently providing, by the widening of Whitehall and Charing Cross, the space which is absolutely essential to the attainment of a satisfactory result—a national monument moreover the principal frontage of which according to the official scheme will remain partially occupied by buildings of an inferior nature, such as shops and a tavern, is in our judgment unworthy of the country.”

His (Mr. Plunket's) scheme was not, therefore, to be deemed unsatisfactory merely because it was criticized by architects who had schemes of their own. The name of Mr. Taylor had been mentioned, and he (Mr. Plunket) would gladly join in and emphasize everything that had been said in his commendation; but all the evidence given by that gentleman before the Committee had reference to a comparison between the two schemes—namely, that of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, which was to cost £700,000, and that which was submitted at the present moment; and it must be borne in mind that he and other witnesses were already committed to the former of those schemes, although, no doubt, they gave their evidence honestly. The Government had submitted to the House an elevation which, as far as the exterior decorations were concerned, was not ambitious or pretentious; but everyone would agree that it was satisfactory and agreeable to the eye, and in sympathy and harmony with the surrounding buildings. The Vote he was now asking for was not merely to make an addition to the existing Admiralty, but also to improve it. It was proposed to take out the attic floor, and to use a portion of the space in the roof; and he was assured by eminent architects that when so altered the upper storey would be well adapted for the purposes of the Admiralty. It was said that the scheme of the Government would perpetuate in the new buildings all the defects of the old. That was absolutely inaccurate and not the fact. The architects had undertaken to give a considerable increased height to each of the floors in the new buildings, and not only so, but they had adopted, or would adopt in it, if the Committee agreed to the proposal, every improvement which modern science had invented as to light and air and ventilation and drainage, so that a new building would be supplied in these matters on the best pattern science could now devise. The system of ventilation would in one respect be even a better system than that proposed by the right hon. Member for Central Bradford, because, the height of the building being less in proportion to the size of the Court yards, the ventilation would be better. It was said, and he had seen the statement repeated in the newspapers that morning, that if they did any excavating work, and interfered with the foundations of the existing building, they would bring down the old edifice. It would, however, have been necessary to make excavations even under the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman, because he proposed to preserve all the staff of the Admiralty in the old building for three or four years while providing the foundations for the new building. That, however, was a matter for architects to decide. He did not venture any opinion of his own; but he had that day been assured by Messrs. Leeming that there was no ground whatever for any of the fears that had been expressed. He thought he had now dealt with all the objections which had been raised, and he must apologize to the Committee for the length to which his remarks had extended. He believed that if they were to wait until they had a plan to which they could get all the architects to agree, they would have to wait a very long time, and the scandalous state of things which now existed in some parts of the Admiralty buildings and also in some parts of the War Office would continue; not only so, but they would have to go on paying a sum of no less than £4,400 a-year, which they now paid for the hire of premises for those officials of the Admiralty for whom accommodation could not be found in the existing building, while the Service would still suffer great administrative inconvenience. If the Committee adopted this estimate the work would be commenced at once, and within two and a-half years—he was informed by Messrs. Leeming that it would take about two years and four months—they would be able to complete the building. He trusted that under these circumstances the Committee would agree to the Vote.

Mr. Plunket

Mr. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) said, he looked with a considerable degree of alarm at the proposal now before the House. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Plunket), and other hon. Gentlemen who were Members of the Committee would remember that he had expressed his ideas in the same sense when it came before the Committee of last year. He regarded the present scheme as an absolute perpetuation of the present system under which the affairs of the Admiralty were managed. The Committee last year were at some disadvantage in having no definite set of alternate plans before them, and they found it difficult, therefore, to arrive at a decision. Nevertheless, the Members of the Committee were impressed with the absolute necessity for making some sweeping change in the position in which the clerks and other officials at the Board of Admiralty were placed. Leaving out of view the War Office altogether and dealing with the Admiralty alone, they were asked to give a sum of money nearly equal to one-third of the total amount that would have had to be provided to carry out the designs that were rejected by the Committee last year. He could only say, as a Member of the Committee, that he had gone over the present Admiralty building, and he had had to go there since on matters of public business, and he must say that the difficulty first of finding his way into the place, and, secondly, of finding his way out again, owing to the peculiar arrangement of the different staircases and passages, was something marvellous. It was impossible, without making large structural alterations in the present Admiralty buildings, to make them suitable and convenient for the proper supervision of the staff of clerks employed in them and the economical performance of the work they had to do there. The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works had said that a large amount of money was expended every year in order to supply the clerks and other officials with suitable accommodation outside the present Admiralty buildings; but if the designs which were rejected by the Committee last year had been adopted, all the clerks would have been brought under one roof, where they would have been properly supervised, and would have been able to do their duty satisfactorily and economically for the benefit of the country. He spoke with some knowledge upon the matter, having had a long acquaintance with structural alterations, and however lightly architects might think of underpinning, builders did not think lightly of it; at any rate, it was a work which entailed large extra expenditure. There was always danger unless the foundations, in the first place, were absolutely good; and, so far as the foundations of the Admiralty were concerned, they were not only not good, but bad. When once they commenced to touch the foundations they would never know where they were going to end. He had no wish to prolong the debate; but he had expressed these views and the fears he entertained before the Committee upstairs. He still entertained the same fears. They were now asked to vote the sum of £192,000; but if they could get out of it with £250,000 at the end of three years they might consider themselves exceedingly well off. Even then they would simply have perpetuated in a milder degree the scandalous state of things which now existed in regard to the accommodation at the Admiralty Office. He was thoroughly opposed to anything like wasteful expenditure, and he was earnest in his desire to secure economy. He maintained, however, that the best economy, when they found anything structurally bad in a building of this description, was to sweep it away and to erect a new building adequate and suitable to the requirements of the nation. He had no objection to the erection of a grand building—that was to say, grand, not in the sense of external decoration, but in the sense of the useful purpose it was to serve. The plans rejected last year were doubtless grand designs, and the decorative work would, in some respects, be superb. Probably all the decorations involved were not needed for all public offices; but even admitting that the ornamentation was more than necessary, he ventured to assert that it would have been wiser economy in the long run to have adopted those plans with all their accessories than to vote money for a scheme which would have to be supplemented hereafter by other large sums of money. Even when the work was complete, the complaint which had been made from time to time would not be removed. The officials would not be gathered together in large rooms; but one man would be in one room, while another engaged in the same kind of work would be in another room. It was necessary that they should be closely associated together if they were to make the building useful and efficient for its purpose. He supposed that the Vote under discussion would be agreed to; but they might depend upon it that the sum of £192,000 would not be sufficient to cover the whole of the alterations, and they would find, when the building was ready to be handed over, the cost would inevitably have to be supplemented by other large sums, and they would find, in the long run, that it would have been more economical to have provided a new building.

MR. ISAACS (Newington, Walworth) said, he would ask for the indulgence of the Committee while, as a Member of the Committee to which the question was referred last year, he ventured to state the views which he entertained on the subject. The question really resolved itself into this—Were the designs which had been placed in the Tea Room of the House, or the designs which were first submitted to the Committee, to be carried into effect? As far as his personal predilections were concerned, he went into the Committee with a perfectly open mind. If he had any bias, it was rather in favour of the designs of Messrs. Leeming, which he had seen before, and could not fail to admire. But after the evidence adduced before the Committee day by day, he had come to the conclusion that it would not have been advisable to have adopted the designs which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) advocated. It was pointed out that, coming next to the Horse Guards, the proposed new building would have dwarfed that structure, and the first thing which the right hon. Member for Bradford did was to eliminate the South-Eastern wing of the building in deference to the adverse criticisms made upon it; and thus, at one stroke, to save a sum of no less than £30,000 in the cost of the work. But that was not a sufficient saving, and it was necessary to do more. It was proposed to eliminate the whole of the features of the design above the roof, as also the columns and pilasters of the several facades, and by that means the main features of the design were sacrificed. The cost of the building was thus reduced to £561,000, of which sum £261,000 was allocated to the Admiralty buildings, and the remaining £300,000 to the War Office. But he ventured to say that the whole of the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman opposite founded on that Estimate of £561,000 were absolutely fallacious. The building to which the right hon. Gentleman referred was what might be described as a "bogus" building, because the great charm of Messrs. Leeming's design consisted very much in the features above the roof, its domes, cupolas, and other matters; but it was now proposed to cut down these features as well as the columns and pilasters, and very much of the ornamentation, so that the building would entirely lose its character. Apart, however, from the question of the style of architecture, there were grave doubts on the part of the Committee as to whether the internal corridors would be sufficiently lighted, and whether the other arrangements were quite of the character suited for a large assembly of clerks. On the whole, the Committee failed to be impressed with the opinion that the building would do the work for which it was intended, from an economical and practical point of view. Thereupon the Committee took an early opportunity of viewing the existing Admiralty buildings, in order to ascertain whether it was possible to adapt and retain any portion of the existing structure. He was sorry to find himself at issue on this point with the hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Howell), because he believed the hon. Member to be a practical man, who had claims to be considered an authority in these matters. But he went carefully over the building, and after paying great attention to the whole of the internal arrangements, he came to an exactly opposite conclusion to that of the hon. Member. He thought it would be possible to alter the internal arrangements of the existing Admiralty in such a way as to render it unnecessary to make any great structural alteration; and it would be possible to put together several rooms so as to facilitate the concentration of clerks without any danger to the existing building. Of course, he was prepared to admit, that when they came to deal with foundations like those of the existing Admiralty buildings it would be necessary to proceed with the utmost caution. He knew what it was to deal with large volumes of water in the foundations of buildings. He had had experience of water in foundations, and he knew the expense the getting rid of that water entailed; but he ventured to tell the hon. Member for Bethnal Green that in these days work of that kind was not regarded by practical men as one which ought to appal them or deter them from pushing forward with it. Within the last three or four years the foundations of so important a structure as Waterloo Bridge had been dealt with without any serious difficulty. The old piles on which the Bridge stood were removed while the public were continually using the structure, and absolutely ignorant of the nature of the work in progress. That structure at present stood without the slightest sign of subsidence being shown. If it were possible to deal with such a bridge as that it would be infinitely more easy to overcome any difficulties connected with the foundations of the Admiralty. In Committee they had the evidence of experts as to the cost of carrying out the building designed by Messrs. Leeming, and he ventured to say that the figures given were too low, and that instead of 1s. per cubic foot in one case, 1s. 2d. would be nearer the mark, and in another, instead of 1s. 6d., 1s. 8d. per cubic foot. When they came to consider the case of the alternative scheme they had figures given to them from which it would appear that the cost of the proposed addition to the Admiralty would not be more than 11d. per cubic foot. The right hon. Member for Bradford, in the Report he had submitted to the Committee, said that he had cut down the estimates of Messrs. Leeming for the alternative scheme from £700,000 to £561,000, of which £261,000 was the amount allocated to the Admiralty, and £300,000 to the War Office. Taking the alternative scheme of Messrs. Leeming at 11*d.* per cubic foot, they reached a total of £185,000, and adding £7,500 for under-pinning the existing Admiralty structure they arrived at £192,500. Taking this figure as £192,000, he would ask the Committee to bear with him while he gave another set of figures which he would desire them to accept instead of those of the right hon. Gentleman. The cost of the Admiralty and War Office, instead of being £700,000, on the assumption that the work could be done for 1*s.* 2*d.* a cubic foot instead of 1*s.*, would be enlarged to £820,000. He thought, on the other hand, that it would be possible to proceed with the alternative scheme of the Admiralty extension for 10*d.* per foot cube. One ounce of fact was worth a whole ton of argument, and he had been so staggered by the figures submitted to the Committee that he ventured to ask permission to put himself in the box to give evidence in connection with the Railway Clearing House building in Euston Square, which accommodated 1,400 clerks, as large a number as the Admiralty and War Office combined. Those 1,400 clerks were housed in a building of excellent design, built by Messrs. Cubitt, who were among the first of builders. The right hon. Gentleman added to the item of £192,000 £440,000 for the new War Office site, and £300,000 for the building. To-day the right hon. Gentleman favoured the Committee with another figure—namely, £340,000 for the building. Why he did so he (Mr. Isaacs) did not know, but he failed to find that figure in the draft Report submitted to the Committee. Taking those three items—£192,000 for the extension of the existing Admiralty, £440,000 for the purchase of a new site for the War Office, and £300,000 for the new War Office itself, there would be a total of £932,000. From that total they must take two items representing the value of surplus land—namely, £161,000 for the land in Spring Gardens, and £42,000 for land on the War Office site, making a total of £203,000, and bringing down the estimated cost to £729,000. For that sum they would get, according to the amended plans of Messrs. Leeming, what he called a “bogus” building, and they would land the country in an excess of expenditure amounting to £160,000. He (Mr. Isaacs) read to the Committee a letter he had received from the Architect of the Railway Clearing House Building, intimating that the cost of that structure amounted only to 6*d.* per foot cube. He submitted, therefore, that if it was possible to do this in the case of the Railway Clearing House, it was only reasonable to assume that a suitable building could be erected for the Admiralty extension at 10*d.* per foot cube. The estimate, therefore, would have to be reduced by one-eleventh, and instead of £185,000 it would be brought down to £168,000. The total cost of the two establishments, if they were proceeded with on the basis he had sketched out, would be £705,000, and deducting £705,000 from £820,000, the saving to the country would be £115,000. He had thought it fair to put these considerations before the Committee, inasmuch as he felt particular interest in the subject, and having endeavoured to thrash out the whole of the figures, he thought he was entitled to ask the attention of the Committee for a few minutes while he submitted his views to hon. Members.

Mr. Isaacs

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that in estimating the cost of the Admiralty and War Offices at £600,000 for the purpose of his argument, he had made no reference to the scheme of Messrs. Leeming.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith) said, he objected to this Vote, not on the ground of the cost of the building, but because it did not provide for the War Office and the Admiralty being under one roof. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) had said that that question did not come before the Committee, but since the Committee sat, the country had been assured that the Army was not properly organized. They knew that the work of both the Army and the Navy would be greatly facilitated by being under one roof. He was prepared to vote against the estimate if a Division was challenged, because in his opinion, expenditure that did not tend to efficiency was only money thrown away. It was not a question of what the buildings cost, in the first instance. They would save money by having efficiency, because efficiency was really true economy.

MR. DILLWYN (Swansea, Town) said, he did not wish to prolong the discussion, indeed, he should not have taken part in the debate at all but for the remark of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) that he (Mr. Dillwyn) had proposed an Amendment to the Report last submitted. He did propose an Amendment. He was actuated very much by the argument just addressed to them by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Hammersmith (General Goldsworthy)—namely, that it was very desirable that the work of the two Services of the Army and Navy should be transacted under one roof. He believed that the work of the country would be greatly facilitated thereby, and that the arrangement would prove an economical one. The hon. Baronet the Member for South St. Pancras (Sir Julian Goldsmid) and the hon. Gentleman the Member for North-East Bethnal Green (Mr. Howell) had given good reasons why the Government plan should be rejected. They objected to the inconvenience which would result from it, and they objected to it on account of the danger of making the alterations upon insecure and bad foundations. The foundations of the present building had been found to be very bad; indeed, the evidence given before the Committee went to show that there were no solid foundations. He had seen something of building and of altering old houses, and he thought that when they began to alter old houses they ran a great danger of pulling the houses down altogether. Generally speaking, it was far more satisfactory to pull a building down altogether than to put up new erections on the old foundations. He had only to say further that the challenge which was thrown out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had not been met at all. The right hon. Gentleman challenged the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works to show a single architectural authority for the plan they now had before them. He (Mr. Dillwyn) had heard very many objections to the plan, and he hoped they might still hear a little more of the plan from an architect's point of view.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, that as one who had spent many years in the Public Service, he wished to press very earnestly upon the Government one point, which he considered of great importance. He was glad to see that in this building it was proposed to make very large rooms in which a large number of clerks could be employed. He was fully persuaded there would never be efficiency or economy in the Public Service until the system of large rooms was greatly extended. In the plan of the new buildings he saw some large rooms, but he thought the system could be extended a little more. He trusted that the Admiralty and War Office would bear in mind the importance of employing in large rooms all except those few who were obliged from their position to have private rooms.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea) said, he rose to ascertain from the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works whether it was a definite part of the present scheme that the Mall should be extended and opened out to Charing Cross. The point was not clear in the designs, though it was one to which considerable importance was attached by all who took an interest in the amenity of London. He earnestly hoped that this opening would now be made.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID said, that before they went to a Division there were two or three points he desired to refer to. The hon. Member for the Walworth Division of Newington (Mr. Isaacs) had given convincing proof that the Government were absolutely wrong. The hon. Gentleman had shown that the Railway Clearing House, a large building capable of accommodating 1,400 clerks, had been put up very economically upon a site less than the site of the Admiralty and the proposed additions, and yet he approved of this piece of extravagance. They would have to go elsewhere and obtain a site for the War Office. The proposal amounted to the greatest piece of extravagance he ever heard of, and he quite understood why his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) took no notice of it; it was absolutely indefensible. There were some persons who were anxious to have economy at the expense of efficiency, and he ventured to say that the argument which the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works used in support of this proposal—namely, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) was in favour of it, was a little in that direction, because the right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt), as Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his zeal for economy, sent orders to the Departments as to the amount they were to spend, leaving them to settle how that amount was to be utilized. True economy would prompt them to spend a proper sum for putting the War Office and the Admiralty upon one site. They had the site, but the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works proposed to use it for the Admiralty only. He (Sir Julian Goldsmid) maintained that the proposal was an extravagant one, because the right hon. Gentleman would have to purchase another site whenever he built the War Office. Under these circumstances, he had thought it right to bring this matter before the House of Commons. The hon. Member for the Walworth Division of Newington tried to draw a red herring across the path by telling them a good deal about Messrs. Leeming's building. Probably the hon. Gentleman did not do him the honour to listen to the remarks he made earlier in the debate; but, if he did, he must know he said he knew nothing of Messrs. Leeming, and that he was not speaking in any particular interest. Upon the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Isaacs') own showing, a suitable building for both War Office and Admiralty could be put up upon this site at a moderate cost, and, therefore, it must be bad economy to use the site for the Admiralty only. He claimed the hon. Member's vote.

Mr. PLUNKET said, that, in answer to his hon. Friend the Member for North Islington (Mr. Bartley), he was able to say that they had already in these plans gone far in the direction of having large rooms in which the work could be carried on under proper supervision. But they had not yet had the final Report of the Admiralty as to the reorganization of their staff. If the Board suggested that the system of large rooms should be carried further, he had no doubt the system would be extended. He entirely agreed with the hon. Gentleman as to the advisability of adopting the system as far as possible. With regard to the question of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Whitmore), he could answer, if the proposal now submitted to the Committee were carried out, there would be an opening provided from the Mall to Charing Cross, in the same way as an opening would have been provided if the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had been adopted. The present was really a test Vote. The Department, therefore, now only asked for £5,000; but if the Committee agreed to the Vote, he hoped they would be able to spend and ask for a little more before the end of the year. He earnestly begged the Committee not to prevent them proceeding as soon as possible with the remedy of a defective and almost scandalous state of things.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE asked, whether the plans for the War Office were being proceeded with?

MR. PLUNKET said, that nothing had been proposed on that subject. The Vote which was now proposed was based on the Report of the Committee of last year.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, it was an important item in the consideration of the whole matter what was to be done with the War Office. If the War Office was to be left where it was, the scheme was not a bad one—it would result in economy—but if the War Office was to be removed, which he believed was an essential part of the scheme, then the scheme was financially bad and unsound.

MR. PLUNKET said, that if the House of Commons were of opinion that the Government should at once undertake further expense in building a War Office, he would lose no time in making the necessary inquiries.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 144; Noes 85: Majority 59.—(Div. List, No. 116.)

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS.

(2) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £46,073, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs."

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) said, he desired to move the reduction of this Vote by £500, with the view of eliciting something with regard to the policy of the Government in the Soudan. He wanted to know whether we had really and truly abandoned the Soudan. If we had, why was there an officer at Suakin calling himself Governor General? He found that the Governor General there treated the tribes in the vicinity as rebels. He did not see how they could be rebels if we had abandoned the Soudan. He was one of those who by no means asserted that the case for the abandonment of the Soudan was made clear. There was a great deal to be said in favour of either retaining the Soudan, or in making it over to the Italians; though there was also a great deal to be said on general grounds for the abandonment of the Soudan. As a matter of fact, the Egyptian Government had proclaimed that the country had been abandoned. There were many reasons why it should be abandoned. He only hoped it was abandoned for deliberate reasons. He was bound to confess that the measure had been successful, that it had not exposed us to as very great danger as was prophesied, that the defence of the Egyptian frontier was easy as compared with the defence, for instance, of the North-West frontier of India. If we would only avoid those irritating little wars outside Suakin, the abandonment of the Soudan, however much some might regret it, might be regarded as successful; the measure had been fairly successful up to this, and would be successful altogether if we could only make up our minds to keep our hands off the tribes over the frontier. He did not desire, at this moment, to go into the policy of retaining Suakin. There might be reasons—he did not quite see them himself—connected with the Slave Trade why that town and port should be retained; but he did question the policy of involving ourselves in little wars beyond the town. It was patent to all the world that, for the last few months, the Governor General of Suakin had attacked the tribes outside the town, and got the worst of it, putting us in a very ignominious position. There could be no doubt that the Governor General of Suakin had been subsidizing and egging on the tribes—called friendly—to attack other tribes who were treated as unfriendly.

Sir Julian Goldsmid

The result was that the “unfriendly” had called Osman Digna to their assistance, and he had attacked us and beaten us. He (Sir George Campbell) could not help thinking that the Governor General had brought these defeats upon himself. The tone in which the Governor General talked of rebels and “friendly” was not the tone of a man who had made up his mind to confine himself to his own proper dominion of Suakin. His hankering after dominion had brought about the present state of things, and he (Sir George Campbell) wanted to know what the policy of the Government really was with regard to the matter. It was no use saying this was a question for the Egyptian Government. It was patent that we it was who forced the abandonment of the Soudan upon the Egyptians against their will. The Governor General was a distinguished English officer—Colonel Kitchener—and, speaking of those who served under him, that officer had said they were English officers nominated by the English Government. On several late occasions, too, the troops at Suakin had been assisted by the British Fleet. Suakin was held for us; whatever went on, there was our policy, and therefore he might fairly ask the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson) to explain what that policy was. He knew that the Foreign Secretary had in “another place” said that Suakin was held to prevent the Slave Trade. But what was the policy with regard to the fighting outside Suakin. How far had we encouraged the raids and petty wars which had gone on for months past? There was another subject which was indirectly connected with this matter, also a subject of great importance. It seemed to him very strange indeed that when we had abandoned that which he might call the natural highway into the interior of Africa—the highway of the great rivers—we should seek to enter the country by another route. We were apparently doing that by means of a new Company called the East African Company. No information whatever had been vouchsafed to Parliament in regard to the formation of that Company. He had seen a newspaper paragraph which stated what had been done, but nothing was known to the general public or to the House of Commons. He wanted to know what were the circumstances under which, and what were the objects for which, a new territorial Company had been established for East Africa? It seemed to him it was very dangerous that the country should be led into these great annexations silently, quietly, without competition, and in the ignorance of the public and of the House of Commons. He understood this East African Company had been established to exercise the rights of dominion. The idea was that the Company was to establish dominion over the great territory which led to the great lakes of Central Africa. It was but fair that hon. Members should demand that the right hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State should give them some information on this matter. Surely these territories should not be parcelled out without competition. No Department of the Government could give a contract for 100 pairs of boots, without first subjecting it to competition. Yet these great territories were given away quietly, and without the House knowing anything about the matter. He did not desire, at that moment, to question the policy of extending British dominion; he only wished to ascertain what were the facts, and what were the views of Her Majesty's Government, in regard to this matter. Having paid a good deal of attention to the politics of Africa, he would say that a great deal of evil resulted from the haphazard way in which annexation was carried out. Africa was being sandwiched, as it were, amongst the different European States. Germany got a slice, then France got a slice, then we had a slice, then the Portuguese got a slice, and then someone else got a slice, and so annexation was going on all through Africa. He could not help thinking it would be much more politic and dignified on the part of this country, if it was to take part in the scramble for Africa, to do so upon some system, that we should come to some arrangement with other countries by which our possessions should be gathered together and be made more compact. By the present accidental sandwiching out of Africa, the basis of very great complications in the future was being laid. At any rate, he hoped the Government would tell them that the policy of chartering this new Company was a deliberate one, and not one forced upon the Government by the pertinacity of the Company. He was aware that up to the present the right hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had firmly refused to recognize the territorial possessions of what he might call the fighting missionaries and traders, who had established a kind of dominion in the Lake District of South Eastern Africa. He desired to know whether the Government would hold out in this firm course? He hoped the right hon. Baronet would be able to tell the Committee that the Government were not following in the wake of the Commercial Companies—Companies which established dominion over the natives for commercial gain—or even of the missionary enterprises. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would tell them that the Government had some fixed and decided policy in this matter; that they had resolved whether they were to go forward and take a large share of Africa or not; whether, if they were to take a large share of Africa, they intended to do so deliberately; and whether they themselves were determined to decide what was to be done, and not allow Companies or missionaries to decide for them. In the hope of eliciting some information on this subject, he begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £500.

Sir George Campbell

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £45,573, be granted for the said Service."—(Sir George Campbell.)

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, his hon. Friend (Sir George Campbell) said he did not complain of the policy of retaining Suakin.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I said I did not express an opinion upon the subject.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that he did express an opinion upon it; he thought it was a very absurd policy on our part. It would be remembered that we went there because we entered into an engagement with the Egyptian Government to maintain the remnant of rule on the border of the Red Sea. At that time it was said, as an excuse, that we also went there in order to prevent the Slave Trade. There was nothing more certain than that we had in no sort of way hindered the Slave Trade by retaining Suakin, for the reason that it was very easy to go across the Red Sea in a few hours from Africa to Asia. The dhows could put in along the coast; they did not require to put in at any particular port; they took the slaves sent down to them, and in the course of the night they crossed to Arabia. That had not been controverted. The Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) fell back on the fact that whether right or wrong, we were pledged to retain Suakin, because we had entered into a promise with the Egyptian Government, but he (Mr. Labouchere) would like to know how long this promise was to continue. Were we to retain Suakin for ever? Surely there must be some limit. When the promise was made, Egypt was practically at war with the Soudanese. It was said that now Egypt was at peace with the Soudan. We ought, therefore to come to some understanding with Egypt with regard to the retention of our garrison at Suakin. His hon. Friend said—"While I do not express an opinion upon the retention of Suakin, I do protest against the little wars that go on with the tribes in the neighbourhood." The occurrence of these little wars was one of the reasons why he (Mr. Labouchere) was opposed to the retention of Suakin. In the present state of matters, it must necessarily follow that there would be little wars. One tribe came under our protection, another tribe further off attacked it, and then we sallied forth in order to defend the tribe under our protection, and so, as it always happened in the case of these military frontiers, we found ourselves perpetually engaged in little wars, slaughtering people who, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian said, "are rightly struggling to be free." Then his hon. Friend complained of the establishment of the East African Companies. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman that the Committee ought to know what the Charters to these Companies were. The Charters ought to be laid before the House of Commons before they were granted. Take the case of the Borneo Charter. That was granted, he believed, by a Conservative Ministry; anyhow, a Conservative Ministry had pledged itself so strongly to grant it, that the Liberal Ministry which followed it felt its duty to fulfil the pledge. At last the matter came up for the consideration of the House. The hon. Gentleman (Sir John Gorst) who was now Under Secretary of State for India raised the question, and he pointed out that by the Charter we did our very best to encourage the Slave Trade. By one of the conditions of the Charter we engaged to return to their masters slaves who took refuge in the offices of the Company. A more monstrous thing was never done, and yet because Parliament had not been permitted to look into the Charter, and because no one in the Public Offices had looked closely into the matter, the Charter existed. Therefore he did most strongly demand that before any pledge or assurance was given on the part of the Government to grant Charters to Companies, the House should have an opportunity of seeing what the Charter was. His hon. Friend (Sir George Campbell) said he was opposed to the system of sandwicheing out Africa, but then he proposed what seemed a monstrous proceeding—he proposed that we should take over a large portion of the country as our share. [Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL: No.] What the hon. Gentleman said certainly amounted to that. He (Mr. Labouchere) objected to this parcelling out of Africa. The hon. Gentleman suggested that our parcel should be in the South. Heaven knew what it would cost. He earnestly hoped we would not give Charters to East African Companies, or to West African Companies, or to North African Companies, or to South African Companies, and that we would give up the policy of either parcelling out Africa between the European Powers or of taking a very large slice for ourselves. This Vote covered the whole policy of Her Majesty's Government in all parts of the world outside of England. They had not had during the present Session an opportunity of discussing the foreign policy of Her Majesty's Government. Some people had said this ought to be an Irish Session, some had said it ought to be an English Session, but, in the meantime, the Marquess of Salisbury had had absolutely his own way as Minister for Foreign Affairs. No one had had an opportunity of calling the noble Marquess over the coals, and yet—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! An Amendment has been proposed to reduce the Vote in respect of certain proceedings in Africa, and the discussion should be confined to Africa.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then I will postpone my remarks upon the general foreign policy of the Government.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.) said that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) did not find fault with the action of Her Majesty's Government with respect to Suakin, but wished to know on what ground it was retained. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), on the other hand, objected altogether to the retention of Suakin, and thought we ought to have retired from Suakin as we had retired from the Upper Nile. There was a certain misapprehension in the minds of the hon. Gentlemen. The British Government did not hold Suakin: it was held by the Egyptian Government, and although it had been said that that was the same thing, there was a very important difference. What Her Majesty's Government were doing was to aid the Government of Egypt to improve the government of that country, and he believed very great success had attended those efforts. Very great praise was due to the Khedive and his Ministers for the policy they were pursuing, and for the reforms they had carried out. Suakin was the only point in the Soudan now held by Egyptian troops, and it was very important it should be so held. It was very important that piratical expeditions should not be made from that point of departure, and it was extremely desirable, both from the point of view of the Egyptian and British Governments; that Suakin should not be made the great nest or chief seat of the Slave Trade. There could be no doubt it would be a great centre and rallying point of the Slave Trade unless it was kept by the Egyptians, and he was sorry to say he believed that at this moment many of the Slave Trade operations were directed from Suakin. The Egyptian officers at Suakin were often able to get intelligence of intended Slave Trade expeditions and to frustrate them. No doubt a good deal went on in spite of our endeavours, but were it not for these endeavours there was every reason to believe that the Slave Trade would flourish much more actively than it did at present. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) asked what we were doing at Suakin. The Egyptians were doing as little as possible. They were obliged, unfortunately, to defend Suakin against the followers of the False Prophet and the Dervishes who came down to the immediate neighbourhood of Suakin. It was very necessary that the place should be both resolutely and economically defended, and owing to the admirable dispositions of Colonel Kitchener, the Governor General, it could now be defended by a very small force. The forts were strong, but it had been necessary to afford the place the assistance of some of Her Majesty's ships. It was quite evident that the Slave Trade could not be prevented in the Red Sea without the assistance of Her Majesty's ships. Ships had been employed in that duty, and advantage had been taken of their presence there to render assistance to the Egyptian troops in the defence of Suakin. It was very desirable that trade should establish itself as freely as possible, and with as little interference as possible. Great steps had been taken in that direction, but the peaceful traders were very much interfered with by the bodies of Dervishes under Osman Digna, who rendered the trade routes exceedingly dangerous, and who rendered the peaceful occupations of the country somewhat perilous. But there were signs of considerable improvement, and he thought that if the present policy pursued at Suakin could be only let alone for a little longer a better state of things might soon be expected in that region. The hon. Member (Sir George Campbell) said, that we had abandoned the great highway of the Nile, but we were trying to open up a new route to the lakes from the Zanzibar Coast. It was easy to talk of the lakes as if they were one small tract, but the Committee would surely not forget that the distances were enormous from the portion of the Nile which was occupied by the Egyptians, and the lake district which might be approached from the Zanzibar Coast. It was quite evident that any commercial or colonizing undertaking on the Zanzibar Coast was a very different matter from the extension of Egyptian rule southwards. The deliberate policy pursued had been to confine the Government of Egypt to the Northern portion of Africa. But there was no reason why the whole of the rest of Africa should be closed to European enterprize. Other nations were not insensible of the value of African markets, and there was no nation in Europe that had not made great exertions to establish its influence in Africa and to extend the trade with that country. He thought there was little hope for the trade of this country except by opening up new markets, and English merchants would justly reproach the Government if they were to refuse to give such encouragement as they could to the multiplication of markets in the great continent of Africa. The portion of Eastern Africa in which the enterprize of certain people was now seeking to push English trade was, perhaps, the most hopeful district North of the Equator with which we were acquainted. It was healthy, suitable for European settlement, and inhabited by tribes immensely superior, intellectually and in point of civilization, to those on the West Coast and those further towards the South. This enterprize had been well considered, and it was hoped that it was destined to open up new fields for English commerce, and that it would be possible to join hands with Emin Pasha, who was so gallantly maintaining himself in the interior. The hon. Gentleman opposite said he did not see why we, the Germans, Belgians, and other nations, should all be carving out slices of Africa for ourselves; but surely it was better that we should make arrangements with other European nations than that we should come into rivalry and possible collision with them; it was better that the spheres of influence in Africa should be directed from different points, and he could not but think that the policy now being pursued was not only convenient and prudent in itself, but one that was most likely to colonize Africa in the best way. The hon. Gentleman had also spoken of the Consul in the Lake District as having been engaged in hostilities. He had, on the second day before the Recess, been asked and replied to a Question on this point—namely, whether the action of the Consul was taken with the consent of Her Majesty's Government or with their dissent? With regard to the present question, he said it was inaccurate to say that the Consuls in their present positions were engaged in hostilities. They were there without any such intention. They were there to afford such assistance to British interests as they could afford by British authority; but it was only when a European Settlement was being attacked by Arabs, and was in considerable danger, that other action took place. Undoubtedly, it was not the duty of the Consuls to lend themselves to any hostile movement with armed forces. It was not for him to defend the missionaries from the imputation of being militant persons. He believed, however, that there were men carrying on a good work with great courage and at considerable risk, and that they only took up arms in self defence. But there was a great difference between missionaries and the Trading Bodies in that part of Africa, who united in their own defence; and if these had engaged in attacking an Arab stronghold, it might, to some extent, no doubt, have been in retaliation, but it ought to be remembered that it was sometimes necessary for the purpose of defence to anticipate the action of those who threatened attack. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had talked about our slaughtering people who were rightly struggling to be free. He could not consent to be led into a discussion on the old Egyptian controversy, which he had hoped had long been laid at rest. The defence of Suakin by Her Majesty's ships could hardly be called the slaughter of people struggling to be free; and such language was wholly inappropriate to the defence of a garrison attacked by dervishes. He (Sir James Fergusson) said that we were not interfering with any matters in the Soudan; we sanctioned the holding of Suakin for reasons which Parliament had fully approved—namely, the prevention of the Slave Trade on the Red Sea, which would increase and become much more active were it not for the resistance offered by England. As to the remark that it was inexpedient to encourage Trading Companies to settle in Africa, he believed this to be a legitimate form of procedure and well calculated to further the best interests of the country. It was not necessary that British responsibilities should be unduly extended; but he thought it was eminently desirable that where enterprising merchants were willing to push British trade in Africa, Her Majesty's Government should give them all proper assistance. He did not think that a case had been made out for the reduction of the Vote.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, he hoped the case of Mr. Thomas Wilkinson, who had received unfair treatment from the Consular Authorities in Madagascar, whose action had been condemned by the Law Courts of the Mauritius, would not be passed over in silence.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) said, that he must almost be regarded as an ignoramus on questions of this kind; but he could not keep silence under the enunciation of such doctrines as they had just heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir James Fergusson). The right hon. Baronet had said that the object of the Foreign Office was to allow the Egyptians to govern Egypt. That, he (Mr. Picton) thought, was a very simple matter, and one which could be arranged without a heavy expense for the Foreign Office. But then it was urged that the Egyptians would govern Egypt not exactly in the manner we desired, and that a state of things entirely foreign to our interests would arise; to allow the Egyptians to govern Egypt would be to allow them to have whatsoever Governor they pleased, even that violent Patriot whom we had expatriated to Ceylon. But it was expressly to prevent the Egyptians from governing Egypt, except in accordance with our ideas, that our forces were kept in that country. That was a state of things which was entirely unsatisfactory; and he was not inclined to keep up an expensive Foreign Office for the purpose of obtaining such a result. Then they were told that the Egyptians must defend Suakin against the False Prophet; but they were not told against what false prophet. Who was he? There were a large number of false prophets in the world—a good many on the other side of the House as well as on that side. He did not know whether Osman Digna was or was not a false prophet; but they understood that the Mahdi was destroyed, and he did not know whether he had any successor. But if the Egyptians wanted to defend Suakin, by all means let them do so. Why should we be called upon to do it for them? And hon. Members were told that it was necessary to have British vessels at Suakin to protect our trade. He did not know what trade we did at Suakin; and it was quite possible that if this policy was to be pursued we might be compelled to have more vessels than were really necessary, whatever that trade might be. Violence would never open the country to trade. Missionaries had done far more than soldiers to open up African trade. However that might be, he did not think that Africa would be opened up to trade by our extravagant expenditure on military forces in that country. It appeared to him that there had been an utterly reckless waste of human life in this work, and that an unnecessary claim had been made upon the taxpayers of the country in consequence, for which reasons, if the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy went to a Division, he should heartily support him.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had given the Committee as much information as they were entitled to claim. The right hon. Baronet had dealt altogether in generalities. His (Sir George Campbell's) own opinion was that the best course would be to hand over Suakin to the Italians; but, at any rate, he hoped that fighting outside the place would be discouraged. He thought the authorities in Suakin were a good deal to blame for what had occurred there, because they had drawn down upon themselves Osman Digna by that abominable practice of subsidizing one Native Tribe for the purpose of attacking another. He thought that the term False Prophet was entirely misapplied by the right hon. Gentleman, although he rather approved the plan of coming to arrangements with other European nations as to trade stations in Africa. He was unfavourable to our taking a large share of Africa, because he thought we had already enough on our hands; but he thought that, under any circumstances, we should confine ourselves as much as possible to one part of the country. The right hon. Gentleman told them that the only hope for the trade of this country was to conquer new markets. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had said that in order to extend British trade it was necessary to acquire new countries.

Sir James Fergusson

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: I beg the hon. Baronet's pardon. I am sure I did not use the words or anything like them.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he admitted the right hon. Gentleman did not use the words, but he had justified the policy by assuming that it was only by opening up new markets that we could hope to maintain our trade at its present level. He would not, however, pursue that matter further, but he repeated that the Committee was entitled to ask whether a Charter had been granted to the East African Company; and, if so, what powers and conditions were conferred on the Company, and what territory had been handed over?

MR. LABOUCHERE said, the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) had returned after the Whitsuntide Holiday with some extraordinary notions; he now proposed that we should hand over Suakin to the Italians. But that would be worse than giving it to the Egyptians. He (Mr. Labouchere) said, whatever might be done, let us have nothing whatever to do with it. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had said that Suakin was retained on account of the Slave Trade. He (Mr. Labouchere) thought Lord Palmerston was the inventor of that system of defending aggression, on the ground that it was necessary for the purpose of preventing the Slave Trade; he kept up a large Squadron on the Coast of Africa, which occasionally picked up a Slave-trader, but the Slave Trade was only a pretext for keeping up the Naval Force in that part of the world. The question, however, was, did we, by aiding and abetting the Egyptians in maintaining themselves in Suakin, really in any sort of way diminish the Slave Trade? [SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: Yes.] The right hon. Gentleman said they did. But had there been a single Slaver taken at Suakin. [SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: Ships have been caught in the neighbourhood.] Exactly; they must have ships cruising about the Red Sea, if they wanted to look after the Slave Trade. But were there no slaves at Cairo and Alexandria? While the Egyptians bought slaves in their own markets, we were to go down to Suakin for the purpose of stopping the Slave Trade there. He said that the whole thing was absurd, and that the fact was we had got into a mess, and did not know how to get out of it. The Military Commander out there was a brave man, and liked to bring his bravery before the British public; he engaged in these little skirmishes, and when the people came down to the sea-side, they were immediately fired upon by the ships outside. As he had said, the whole thing was a great piece of absurdity, a gross waste of money, and an outrage upon the country; because our presence at Suakin did not directly or indirectly tend to put down the Slave Traffic. But the right hon. Gentleman had really surprised him by his statement with regard to the Chartered Companies in Africa. The right hon. Gentleman said the noble mission of the Government was to aid and abet merchants in establishing forms of British government in different parts of Africa. What did the right hon. Gentleman mean by that—what were those forms of British government? Did he mean that the merchants were to go out to Africa, and that we were to aid them in establishing there a House of Lords and a House of Commons? It meant that we were to back up these men when they wished not only to trade, but to establish themselves in some dominating position which would compromise us. King Theodore said—"I know all about you. You send missionaries, then you send merchants, and then an army, and when you send an army where is the African King?" Let merchants go into Central Africa by all means; but let them go at their own risk and peril. If they wished to become martyrs, it was their own business; but they must not ask us to support them in establishing some sort of quasi-right over the heads of the people of the country. Most assuredly the Committee had a right to know whether this Charter had been given, and, if so, what was the nature of that Charter—if not, whether there was any intention of giving a Charter? He asked the right hon. Gentleman just now whether he would pledge himself to lay any of these Charters before the House of Commons, or make them thoroughly public, so as to give the House an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon them, before the English nation was pledged to maintain them in the form in which they were made by the Foreign Office?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, in dealing first with the remarks of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), he thought he might take up a line directly in opposition to him on the question of the Slave Trade. It was the duty of this country to use its best efforts in the suppression of the Slave Trade, and anything like lukewarmness on the part of the Government would be justly considered by the House and the country as a departure from the established policy of the country. Again, he did not think that the case with regard to Lord Palmerston had been correctly stated by the hon. Gentleman. The House was well aware that a large sum of money was annually expended by the country in maintaining a Naval Force for the suppression of the Slave Trade on the West and East Coasts of Africa, the Persian Gulf, and elsewhere, and if it had not been for that Force, the Slave Trade would have very considerably increased. The hon. Gentleman asked if any slave vessels had been taken in the Red Sea. [MR. LABOUCHERE: At Suakin?] Certainly not. It was hardly likely that any attempts would be made to carry on the trade at that place, when it was occupied by an Egyptian Governor, with a British vessel lying in the harbour; but vessels had been caught coming out of places along the coast in the neighbourhood of Suakin. It was the opinion of naval officers, and of all those best qualified to judge, that the maintenance of Suakin was absolutely necessary for the prevention of the Slave Trade in the Red Sea, and on that ground he trusted that no considerable section of the Committee would vote for the reduction of the Estimate on that account. With regard to the Charters granted to Companies, the hon. Member spoke as if the position was not within the knowledge of the House. The House was in possession of the terms of the Charter of the Royal Niger Company; it knew the powers with which the Company had been entrusted by Her Majesty's Government; and what he had stated was that the companies had been authorized to make Treaties with the Native Chiefs in Africa, and to carry on trade operations on a large scale, and to carry out the principles of British law and order. He had already told the Committee that they had made something like 200 Treaties with Native Chiefs, and he believed that they had introduced good order and government to the countries over which their Charter extended, and that there was every prospect that in due time they would do great good in that part of the world. It had been said that the Companies imported rum; but, as a matter of fact, the importation of that article was now only a quarter of what it was four years ago. He was asked to state distinctly whether a Charter had been granted to the East African Company. It had not been granted. The Company was only in process of formation, and if a Charter should be granted it would be no less binding than that which had been granted to the Royal Niger Company. It would provide that law and order, as the Government understood it—[Opposition cheers—]—and he hoped they understood the best form of law and order—should be maintained; the proceedings of the Company, wherever its influence might extend, would be constantly under the direction and review of Her Majesty's Government, so that nothing should be done which would not be creditable to this country.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, he was afraid he had put his question with regard to the case of Mr. Wilkinson at Madagascar too briefly, as it appeared to have escaped the right hon. Baronet's attention.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he must ask the hon. Member's pardon for his question having escaped from his memory. He was unable to give any answer upon the case of Mr. Wilkinson without referring to the Papers; but if the hon. Member would repeat his question to-morrow, he would be glad to give him all the information he had upon the subject.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 103: Majority 48.—(Div. List, No. 117.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, the Committee would now allow him to pass from Africa to Europe. Now that we knew what our policy was in Africa, he considered that there was nothing more important than that they should know precisely what was the policy of Her Majesty's Government in Europe. When the Conservatives were last in Office the policy of Lord Salisbury was to support the Turkish Empire, and to expend vast sums of money in aiding and abetting the Turk to remain in Europe. At that time the country was said to be entirely permeated by Jingoism; but at the General Election it was shown that Lord Salisbury was going entirely in opposition to the views of the country, and the result was that he was ejected from Office. It was well known that there were Gentlemen on that side of the House who were ready to sacrifice everything to retain Lord Salisbury in Office, and therefore it became the duty of hon. Members who did not share his Lordship's opinion with regard to Ireland and other parts to keep special watch, so that the country might thoroughly understand, at least, what he was doing in Europe. Last year, Lord Salisbury had done his very best to involve us in war, in order to maintain Prince Alexander of Bulgaria on his throne. It appeared from the Blue Book on the subject that Lord Salisbury had sent despatches to almost every Government in Europe imploring those Governments to join with him in alliance against Russia, and it was only because those Governments were wiser than Lord Salisbury, that we were not involved in a dangerous and costly war. This year there had been a most suspicious interchange of views between Her Majesty's Government and those Governments calling themselves the Triple Alliance. Europe was divided into three camps, and the three Powers had come to an agreement that if one of them should be attacked by Russia they would prevent France from joining that country. He (Mr. Labouchere) did not ask whether that was right or wrong, but he asked what business was it of ours? With those vast armies maintained on the Continent war was always imminent, and there was always a probability of war some day breaking out. A British Minister's duty was to keep his country free from every pledge that might entangle it in such a war. He remembered about two months ago having brought this question forward; he did not then receive a satisfactory assurance from the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The right hon. Gentleman, it was true, said that the Government had given no assurance to Italy that if she were to join the Triple Alliance we would come to her aid; but when he (Mr. Labouchere) asked that what had been done should be presented to Parliament the right hon. Gentleman spoke of negotiation still going on, and he declined to state to Parliament what Lord Salisbury and the Foreign Office were doing. Why did the right hon. Gentleman do that? Certainly it was not on account of Austria, Germany, or Italy, because the negotiations took place between them and the English Government. Was it for the House of Commons that this silence was preserved? He could not conceive that it was so. It was then on account of France and Russia that the right hon. Gentleman was afraid to make public what was being done. Now he objected to our entering into negotiations with two or three Foreign Governments which we were afraid to show to other Governments. Let our policy be open, and let it be clearly a policy of peace, and let us say that if those countries were so foolish as to go to war, we should not join with any of them. We had no business directly or indirectly in an alliance which was practically aimed at France; as was well known, she had lost Alsace and Lorraine, and it was not probable that she would always maintain peace. For his own part, he thought that France had a perfect right, whenever she was strong enough to do so, to seek to re-acquire those Provinces. [Mr. CONY-BEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): No, no!] His hon. Friend who said "No, no!" came from Cornwall, and he (Mr. Labouchere) ventured to say that if we were at war with France, and if France seized Cornwall, the hon. Member would call upon the Government to re-acquire it. One of the great evils of annexation of foreign territory by any Power was that the aggrieved country, unless thoroughly crushed and incapable of making an effort, would seize every opportunity that presented itself to regain the territory it had lost. For his own part, he should be sorry if there were an European war; but he said if they were to take sides at all, if they were to have sympathy with one or

Mr. Labouchere

